DR. KOO'S LUCID EXPLANATION OF CHINA'S FOREIGN POLICY

M. Karakhan's Appointment as Soviet Ambassador: Deanship of Diplomatic Corps: C. E. Railway's New Status: Trade Treaty with Siam

Peking, July 19.

In the midst of the many pressing affairs of State claiming his attention at the moment, the Minister for Foreign Affairs (Dr. V. K. Wellington Koo) found time this morning to receive the foreign correspondents and to answer a barrage of questions upon a wide range of topics.

Naturally the curiosity of the journalists chiefly displayed itself in regard to recent Sino-Russian developments, including the position of M. Karakhan and the handing over of the Russian Legation. The Foreign Minister confirmed the announcement of M. Karakhan's appointment as Soviet Ambassador to Peking, but said that no time had yet been fixed for the latter to present his credentials to the President. That was a matter upon which, said Dr. Koo, the President's pleasure had to be ascertained. No decision had yet been reached as to who should be appointed Chinese Ambassador to Moscow, but the matter was being most carefully considered. Questioned as to whether other Powers had been invited to follow the Soviet example and appoint Ambassadors to Peking, Dr. Koo said that steps had been taken informally to ascertain the views of some of the Powers on this matter, but until replies had been received from all of them he did not wish to say what their views were. Probably a statement regarding this would be issued by the Waichiaopu later on.

Who Comes First?

Concerning the Russian Legation and the request made in the last Note by the Protocol Powers that the Foreign Minister should act as an intermediary, Dr. Koo said that so far as the Waichiaopu were concerned they were quite prepared to use their good offices to bring about a satisfactory settlement and, personally, he did not anticipate much difficulty. The Note from the representative of the Protocol Powers was at present under study. Dr. Koo acquiesced in the view expressed by one correspondent that the situation in regard to M. Karakhan and the Diplomatic Body was "interesting," but smilingly declined to be drawn into a discussion of the respective rights of the Soviet Ambassador and the Dean of the Diplomatic Body to precedence at public functions. The matter of the Russian Consulate at Shanghai had, he announced, been settled.

C.-E. Railway's Obligations

The Chinese Eastern Railway's new status under the Sino-Russian agreement and the recent Notes on the subject exchanged between various interested Powers and the Waichiaopu formed the subject of some pertinent interrogations and the Foreign Minister was also asked to define the precise status of the conversations reported to be proceeding at Mukden between the Soviet Government and Marshal Chang Tso-lin. In regard to the latter, Dr. Koo pointed out that the natural answer was that in her dealings with foreign Powers China was represented by the Central Government, although there were occasions when local authorities, acting under instructions from the Waichiaopu, were charged with the responsibility of carrying on negotiations affecting local interests. He had not, he confessed, been apprised by M. Karakhan of any negotiations in Mukden.

Respecting obligations to foreign creditors of the Chinese Eastern Railway, Dr. Koo emphasized that the arrangement recently made between China and the Soviet Government was not intended in any way to prejudice legitimate claims on the Railway. Indeed, these claims could be made just as well now as ever they could before the Agreement was signed.

The Rendition of Weihaiwei

"We are making progress," was Dr. Koo's reply when a Japanese inquired about the rendition of Weihaiwei. "We are trying to push forward as quickly as possible, but just now," he admitted, "there are no negotiations going on."

Dealing with the prospect of a trade agreement with Siam, Dr. Koo said that China had considerable commercial interests in that country, where her nationals constituted a quarter of the population of 8,000,000 or so, and was naturally anxious to arrange a commercial treaty.

He had, he said, seen reports in the press about the rumoured "British aggression" in Tibet but, as far as he knew, there had been no official confirmation of anything of the kind.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE WINE AND TOBACCO ADMINISTRATION

Organization of the Bank

Peking, July 18.

The official report of the Cabinet meeting this morning says the Ministry of Finance brought forward the proposal that the registration of Mr. Chang Shou-ling, Special Commissioner charged with organization of the Wine and Tobacco Bank, should be accepted and that Mr. Wang Yu-chih. Tupan of the Wine and Tobacco Administration, should act as organizer of the bank concurrently. This was approved and it was resolved to ask the President to issue a mandate to the effect. It was also resolved to relieve of his post Mr. Li Kan-tien, Superintendent of Customs at Husien, and to appoint in his place Mr. Koo Chu-yuan.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHINA AND SOVIET

The Proposed Exchange of Ambassadors: Prospective Chinese Nominees

M. KARAKHAN'S CREDENTIALS

Peking, July 17.

M. Karakhan informed the Waichiaopu on July 15 that he had been appointed Ambassador in Peking, but no arrangements have yet been made for him to present his credentials.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking, July 19.

It is reported that yesterday's meeting of the Cabinet discussed the exchange of Ambassadors with Soviet Russia. The question of the procedure to be followed when M. Karakhan presents his credentials was referred to the Legislative Bureau for report. With regard to the appointment of a Chinese Ambassador, it is understood that several names were mentioned, including those of Mr. Li Chia-ao, Chinese Unofficial Representative in Moscow, Mr. Sun Pao-chi, Mr. Liu Cheng-hsiang and Dr. C. T. Wang.

The Chinese Press reports that Marshals Wu Pei-fu and Chi Hsieh-yuan have sent delegates to Peking to take part in the forthcoming Sino-Russian conference.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE BRITISH BOXER INDEMNITY

Educational or Other Purposes: Advisory Committee Now to Decide

London, July 18.

The China and Far East section of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce are much satisfied with the Government's China Indemnity Bill as amended in committee. The Bill now provides that the indemnity shall be used for educational or other purposes which the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, after consulting the Advisory Committee, decides are beneficial to the mutual interests of Britain and China. The Advisory Committee will consist of 10 persons, of whom at least one must be a woman and at least one a citizen of the Republic of China.

Firms enaged in China trade in Manchester hope that a representative of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce will be appointed a member of the Committee and also hope that the Bill will now be passed as speedily as possible.—Reuter.

Canton, July 19.

A manifesto has just been issued by the Kuomintang regarding the Boxer Indemnity. It says that the talk of railway building and river conservancy is mere camouflage to deceive the people. The fund returned should be devoted to educational purposes for the benefit of the entire people. "Chinese education is hanging on a thread and is almost on the point of extinction." A commission should be formed to study ways to apply the fund. Another commission should have powers to prevent misappropriation by militarists and reactionaries.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

SINO-AUSTRIAN TRADE TREATY HINDERED

Peking, July 17.

The Chinese press reports that negotiations are proceeding with Vienna for a new Sino-Austrian commercial treaty, but that the negotiations are not proceeding smoothly owing to difficulties with regard to the indemnity to China.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Violations of Treaty and Assaults on Foreign Life Due to Nothing But the Weak Vacillation and Self-Delusion of the Great Powers in their China Policy

By Rodney Gilbert

In the following article Mr. Rodney Gilbert gives a masterly survey of the present state of anti-foreign feeling deliberately incited by Chinese officials and how it is due to nothing but futile concessions, the ridiculous delusion of pretending that China possesses a Government, and the pusillanimous failure to defend their nationals from outrage and their lawful rights from studied violation, which has been the distinguishing feature of the Great Powers' policy to China ever since the war.

Peking, July 19.

There is much confidence expressed in political circles here that, in spite of some opposition in Parliament carefully fostered by political rivals, Dr. W. W. Yen will be the next Premier and that his appointment will soon have Parliamentary support. The Parliamentarians are not inclined to do anything for nothing these days, however, and quite apart from political opposition there is said to be a large group of legislators who are holding up the ratification of the Premier's appointment until they know what they are going to get out of it. It is explained in banking circles that the Gold Franc question in on the verge of settlement and that this too will be held up by Parliament unless the Government is prepared to do something for the Parliamentarians. One large group for instance has been investing heavily in the bonds of the 96-million loan and will obstruct both Dr. Yen's appointment and the Gold Franc settlement until the Government promises to put these bonds on such a footing that the law makers can turn over a handsome profit on their investment. The Chinese bankers believe that something will be done to satisfy the obstructionists, that Dr. Yen will then come in as Premier and that the Gold Franc question will then be settled immediately, after which will come France's ratification of the Nine Power Agreement, then within three months the tariff conference and then the Customs increase.

Will the Powers See At Last?

The Chinese are excellent at following a sequence like this well into the future when there is money ahead. They cannot see how they could fail to get their increase in the import tariffs, their special luxury tariff and all the rest of it if they were magnanimous enough to pay a just debt to France. If the Powers, however, have any understanding whatever of the nature of the situation in China now, they will make it their business to see that this sequence of events to come is rudely broken.

Foreign policy in China has already gone entirely too far in giving the Chinese to understand that they can demand and expect al sorts of favours and indulgences and give nothing in return. Legation policy has gone much too far in leading the Chinese to believe that they can default on everything, repudiate obligations whenever convenient and not only "get away with it," but be rewarded for it. During the past few years the Occidental Powers and Japan have retreated all along the line from the strong positions which they have held in this country since 1900, partly because it has been impossible to get them to work together, partly through misunderstanding of Chinese psychology and at times through a desire to win Chinese gratitude and good will. In every case the Chinese have charged whooping into the deserted trenches assuring one another vociferously that they had pushed the foreigner that much nearer the beach and that it would not be long before they would push him into the sea. The immediate effect of every concession made to China and of every show of toleration has been an increased display of anti-foreignism in one form or another.

Not Increased But Unveiled

There has been no increase of anti-foreign feeling, but there have been many increases of demonstrations of it and a vastly increased courage in making this anti-foreignism apparent. The feeling that the foreigner has no business in China except as an inferior to the lordly Son of Han, subject to his prejudices and whims, has always existed in every Chinese mind and it depends solely upon how far he thinks he can go and what he "can get away with," as to how freely and frankly he expresses this feeling and as to how far he translates violent thoughts into acts of violence. Nothing but a lack of confidence or a fear of retribution keeps this anti-foreignism in check or ever will keep it in check, and the movement which is now afoot against the foreigner in China is a much more determined one and more dangerous one than the Boxer movement because it is founded upon a much more general belief that the Occidental in this country has lost his morale, is on the run and can be put in his place at last through united and vigorous action. The slogan that has gone forth now is: "Grant nothing, pay nothing, repudiate every obligation, but demand everything." Every suggestion of weakness, or of a spirit of fairness even, at such a time as this means a multiplication of these showings of anti-foreign feeling which are already so frequent.

Open Incitement to Violence

Scores of organizations and Chinese papers throughout the country are daily making public statements and appeals, under official protection and patronage, which directly incite the people of China to violence. Every time a foreign Power meekly asserts its rights these numerous organs denounce such action as tyranny and a usurpation of China's blessed sovereign rights, but every time a Chinese perpetrates an outrage upon a foreigner it is an act of patriotism which is applauded by all the addle-pated ones from Canton to Moscow. The less Government China has, the less hope there is of her evolving a respectable Government, the more clearly she demonstrates that she cannot govern herself, the more she sacrifices all her rights to consideration, the less she does to demonstrate that she is the equal of others—so much the more do her officials and her professional agitators shout about her sovereign rights and demand "equal treatment." The louder these patriots talk the more clearly do they show how little they know about international affairs, how impossible it is for any of them to follow a logical argument to a logical conclusion and how badly their country needs that very discipline which the Powers are relaxing. A conciliatory measure of any sort now is not only an inducement to these people to preach an anti-foreign crusade but tends directly to promote chaos within the country itself. Good will can mean nothing to them but weakness, concessions nothing but retreat and conciliation nothing but an inclination to surrender.

The Bolshevik Help

The Bolsheviks are now getting the credit for stirring up all this anti-foreign feeling. This is as inexact as it is to say that Chinese anti-foreign feeling is waxing. The Bolsheviks are helping it along mightily of course but they are not creating anti-foreign feeling, they are simply giving the Chinese the courage to say boldly what they have had in their hearts all along. The Bolsheviks have not done half as much, however, as the pusillanimous attitude of the Powers towards this country, to encourage the Chinese to say what they really think of us.

The petering out of the whole Lincheng affair gave anti-foreignism a tremendous boost, the recognition of Tsao Kun under the most absurd circumstances helped it along, the rendition of the Boxer indemnities made us look simpletons in the minds of people who cannot imagine anyone giving up anything he is strong enough to hold, the virtually unpunished outrages upon foreigners by soldiers and bandits cheered the agitators on considerably and now come the Bolsheviks to preach publicly against the imperialistic West and give the Chinese the courage to think that the great foreign demon not only ought to be driven out or put in his place, but that it can be done.

The Washington Blunder

So much of what is wrong with China can be traced to foreign policy that the Bolshevik part in the present energetic movement against foreign "imperialism" seems trifling. It has become so much the fashion to give China things which she did not deserve, things which she has been daily demonstrating her unfitness to use over a period of many years, that the Chinese actually think now that the worse showing they make the more they have a right to demand. First money was poured into the Peking Government's lap without stint and without tangible security, which everyone knew would either be wasted or used to promote discord, until the Chinese came to believe that they had a right to ask for and receive such money in unlimited quantities and when their credit was ruined abroad and no more easy money came their way, they were resentful and felt no conscientious scruples about defaulting upon anything and everything. Then at Washington the Great Powers assisted China to win properties, rights and promises of still more rights which China then had done nothing to earn and has since done everything to forfeit. But a review of it all would take many pages. At Washington China was promised that a commission would visit this country to study the legal system and consider the possibility of abolishing extraterritoriality. But when the same political clique which had shamelessly broken up the Wang Chung-hui Government by clapping Lo Wen-kan into gaol and had evicted Li Yuan-hung, brought Tsao Kun forward as President and put him into office by a parody upon an election which would seem an extravagance in a comic opera, the Great Powers recognized the President as President and his following as the Representative Government of the Republic of China. Worst and least dignified of all, this recognition was deliberately traded for promises that the Lincheng case would be settled to the Powers' satisfaction —promises still unfulfilled in every essential article.

The Bessel Outrage

More recently the position of the Powers in the matter of the trade mark law has been gloriously overridden, because the Legations said to their nationals whose marks were being infringed upon: "We can't advise you to register, but we don't advise you not to register." In other words: "You're on your own." And now in the two most conspicuous cases of assaults upon foreigners that have come up for many years—the Bessel case and the Soldier Li case—every Chinese in the country who carries a weapon and yearns to demonstrate what a contempt he has for the foreigner's rights or person has been told, as clearly as Peking officialdom could say it, to "go and do likewise."

When the Bessel case first came to Tsao Kun's attention, he and his more conservative advisers were much perturbed and recommended that the case be settled in a summary fashion to anticipate a protest. Colonel Chen was to have been punished severely, apologies made by the Government to the British Legation and by Palace officers to Mr. Bessel and a generous indemnity paid. The young foreign trained officials in high office whom we educate abroad to promote better relations with China got wind of this, however, and rushed around to the Palace to make sure that no such action was taken. "Do nothing of the sort," said they, "we'll fight it out and the foreigner can say nothing." Later events bear witness to the accuracy of their judgment of the foreigner's prowess.

Tirades Unchecked.

It is hard to review all this and read the daily tirades in all the Chinese papers without being an alarmist. Against these tirades the Legations make no protest. That of course would be interference with the blessed rights of free speech fostered by the Republic—except when Wu Pei-fu or Chang Tso-lin or Sun Yat-sen gets a hold upon someone who is freely making remarks about him.

The whole weakness of the foreign position is that the diplomats still pretend among themselves, to the Chinese and to their Home Governments, that they are dealing with a grown up nation which has a Government, has sovereign rights and can put forward any good reason why it should be treated on a basis of equality. If the make-believe had been dropped five years ago and the Chinese and the world had been told frankly by those whose word carries weight that Chinese officialdom was nothing but a conglomeration of malicious children, that no Government existed that could be recognized with dignity and that any Power which contributed the moral or financial encouragement for China to carry on this dangerous farce was committing a crime against civilization, there would be no need to write alarmist literature now.

The Powers formed and published such an estimate of Russia, but it did not seem worth while in China's case, because it was said that the Chinese were not an aggressive people and could not defend themselves in open outlawry. For a year past, however, we have been admitting to one another that we are not in a position to check them in open outlawry and now have have Russia's encouragement and are preparing, beyond any shadow of doubt, if Russia sustains her moral support, to follow up with aggressive outlawry every symptom of toleration on the part of the Powers.

Another Fatal Concession

Having rewarded China for her chaos, her impudence in diplomacy and her disregard of obligations by returning the Boxer indemnities in one form or another, the Great Powers are now preparing to make good on their promises and renew China's credit by increasing the Customs tariff and funding the loans upon which China has so cheerfully defaulted at the expense of foreign trade.

If any promises ever made were conditional those pledges made to China at Washington were conditional and if ever conditions have not been met by a nation, they have not been met by China. The Customs increases proposed and the funding of China's debt at this juncture would benefit none but the banks and groups of banks whose criminal folly was responsible for the loans in the first place and would jeopardize the peace, security and prosperity of every foreigner in China. If the Powers want to help Leon Trotsky carry out his announced plan of turning Asia into a devil's cauldron, they have only to go ahead with their make-believe diplomacy in this land and give aggressive outlawry here a little more encouragement whenever Karakhan is winded.

CHILE'S TREATY RIGHTS IN CHINA

Peking's Efforts to Undermine Extraterritoriality

Peking, July 22.

A Chinese news agency reports that a Cabinet meeting this morning resolved to instruct the Minister at Washington, Mr. Alfred Sze, to protest through the Chilean Ambassador at Washington against the attitude adopted by the Chilean Consul at Shanghai in claiming extraterritorial rights, which, the Cabinet are alleged to declare, the Sino-Chilean Treaty does not concede.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

SINO-HUNGARIAN TRADE NEGOTIATIONS

Peking, July 21.

While the negotiations relating to a Sino-Austrian Commercial Treaty are proceeding in Vienna, Hungary has come forward with the proposal to negotiate a similar treaty with China. It is expected that Hungary's request will be granted soon in view of the fact that Austria and Hungary are jointly interested in some of the questions that will come up for settlement in a treaty with either country.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

RAILWAYS FIRST OR SCHOOLS?

Heated Discussion in Peking on Uses of Russian Boxer Indemnity

Peking, July 15.

A commission, composed of delegates representing the Ministry of Communications, Marshal Wu Pei-fu and various Ministries, has been formed to consider how the Russian Boxer Indemnity should be used. At a meeting of this commission yesterday the question was discussed at some length and the meeting then adjourned.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

The Committee to discuss the purposes to which the remitted portion of the Boxer Indemnity for Russia should be devoted held its first meeting on Sunday, reports a Peking telegram. Yang Tien-shi for the Cabinet, Chou Chuan-chin of the Waichiaopu, Chang Yu-shu for the Chiaotungpu, Tang Chung of the Ministry of Education, Chen of the Ministry of Finance and Lao Chi-chang representing Loyang (Wu Pei-fu) were present.

Mr. Tang Chung stated that there were three difficulties to be overcome if the money was to be used in constructing railways. Russia might not consent, as she wanted the money to be devoted to educational purposes. The students would surely object, as it was owing to the efforts of the educationalists that this indemnity was remitted. After deducting the balance of the third year loan and that of the 11th year loan, as well as what had been earmarked for the diplomatic service, only three years' payments or a little over $3,000,000 would be available. As the date was so distant and the amount available so small, Mr. Tang submitted that it would not help railway development at all.

Wu Pei-fu for Railways

Mr. Lao, Marshal Wu's delegate, rebutted Mr. Tang's argument, saying that if Russia did not agree, the Waichiaopu should firmly press for her consent; if students should object, the Ministry of Education must try to remove their objection, and in his, Lao's, estimate, the amount would certainly be much larger than $3,000,000. He asked if the Ministry was opposing his proposal?

Mr. Lao's vehement manner created a feeling of uneasiness in the minds of members present. Mr. Chou Chuan-chin, of the Waichiaopu, quickly declared that, according to usual practice, delegates of various Ministries were only acting as the mouthpieces of the Ministers, and, when anything had been discussed, they should report what took place to their respective chiefs; therefore, this meeting was yet at too early a stage for any member to talk of opposition or approval.

Mr. Yang Tien-chi, of the Cabinet, then said:—"Since the Committee has no power to decide this question to-day, let us adjourn our meeting until we have reported our discussions to our chiefs."

The meeting terminated without reaching any result.

SOVIET INTEREST IN RUSSO-ASIATIC BANK

Large Secret Purchase of Shares Giving Control over C. E. Rlwy.

London, July 19.

"The Times" learns that the Soviet Government has acquired a dominating interest in the Russo-Asiatic Bank by the purchase of a large quantity of shares through intermediary Russian financiers in Paris with the object of giving the Soviet complete power to dispose of the Chinese Eastern Railway which by law belongs to the Russo-Asiatic Bank.—Reuter.

At the Cabinet meeting on July 22, the question of raising funds for flood relief purposes was discussed. It was decided to refer the proposal to levy a customs surtax to the Waichiaopu and the Ministry of Finance for decision. The Ministry of Communications was authorized to levy a surtax on railway traffic to meet the cost of rebuilding the bridge over the Yellow River.

WASTING MONEY IN AVENUE FOCH

July 19.

WE heartily welcome the letter from "Green Bonnet" in our correspondence columns to-day and we hope that the public generally will lose no time in raising a strong protest against the intention of the two Councils to metal the whole of Avenue Foch. For those who may have overlooked the correspondence on this subject in Thursday's Municipal Gazette we reproduce it herewith. On June 26 the Secretary of the French Council wrote:—

As a result of the conference which the members of your Council had on Saturday last with their colleagues of the French Council, I am directed to inform you that the Municipal Administration have considered the abolition of the riding track in Avenue Foch on the south, and requests your Council to be so good as to adopt the same measure on the north.

I take the opportunity to point out that traffic has increased considerably in the Avenue Foch by reason of the development of the western district of both Settlements, and that the total width of the Avenue is barely sufficient for traffic.

To this the assistant secretary of the Council of the International Settlement replied on July 10:

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter of June 26, and, in reply, to inform you that the Council is prepared to carry out its share of metalling the existing riding track in Avenue Foch, and to state that it is proposed to carry out the work in the early part of 1925.

First of all we deny in toto the premises on which the proposed abolition of the riding track is based, namely, "that the total width of the Avenue is barely sufficient for traffic." About a year ago, if we remember rightly, it was decided quite properly that the amount given to the riding track did not leave space enough on either side for one vehicle to overtake another. A strip was accordingly cut off the track on north and south, with the result that there is now ample room on each metalled band for two rows of vehicles of any kind. The present writer uses the Avenue Foch at least twice a day, sometimes oftener, in the so-called "rush" hours, and to say that its width is barely sufficient for the amount of traffic is, with all respect, a pure figment of the imagination.

But we are told that we must look ahead to the days when motor-buses will be running on the Avenue Foch. By all means let us do so. We maintain that they will make no essential difference to the ease of movement in this thoroughfare. Occasionally one encounters a motor-lorry, which is far more unwieldy than any motor-bus and more annoying to the ordinary driver, owing to the normal disregard of the people on it for anybody except themselves. Yet there is rarely any difficulty in overtaking it. But the point to be emphasized is that the traffic in Avenue Foch is, and is likely to remain, essentially high-class traffic. There are no Chinese manufacturing quarters, served or likely to be served by it; wheelbarrows and handcarts, which are the greatest cause of obstruction, are conspicuous by their absence; the drivers who use Avenue Foch are pre-eminently of the class who are most careful—the existence of a few "road-hogs" does not alter the fact that motorists as a class are the most circumspect in the management of their vehicles because they have most to lose by behaving otherwise—and with the ribbon of riding track in the centre, there can never be any confusion between east and west bound traffic, for each current of which there is already ample space for two lines of traffic, where indeed but one usually appears.

We say without fear of contradiction that the abolition of the riding track is wholly unnecessary and would be a wicked waste of money, most urgently needed elsewhere. It is well known that the P.W.D. grant for road-making was severely cut down in the Budget for 1924 of the International Settlement; and that was a considerable time before anything was heard of this Avenue Foch scheme.. If the Council has money to squander—and it certainly has not—let it be spent on widening the western exits of the Peking Road or in opening up a new trunk road from east to west through the northern district, which would take off Chinese traffic from Nanking Road. To spend it on Avenue Foch, which is more than enough for any need that can be foreseen certainly for some years to come, is simply wanton. That being so, we maintain that the claims of the men who get up early to ride deserve full consideration. Their numbers are considerable. There are many men who keep a pony because it is, on the whole, the cheapest, easiest and best form of exercise and from every point of view they are to be encouraged. If urgent necessity could be shown for metalling all Avenue Foch, the riding fraternity would have to bow to it. But there is no such necessity and the project to which the two Councils have agreed deprives a very large number of people of the only exit to the country left to riding men and uses up, for absolutely illusory gains, money of which there is not enough for vitally important projects. Fortunately the correspondence between the Councils shows that the work would not be begun till early in 1925. That gives six months for the reconsideration of an ill-advised, unnecessary and wasteful project, conceived and decided upon in half as many weeks.

CAN CHINA BE A REAL REPUBLIC?

July 21.

IN our Diamond Jubilee supplement there was an acute article by Dr. Wang Chen-ting on "Whether representative government in China is possible." There is no one who is better qualified to discuss this question than Dr. Wang. He was a democrat in the days when China was by no means a safe place for democracy. He has seen the realization of hopes that once seemed as insubstantial as the fabric of a dream. When Aaron was excusing himself to his brother Moses for leading the people of Israel into idolatry he explained that the multitude brought to him their earrings and ornaments of gold and he cast them into the fire "and behold, there came out this calf." Who could have foreseen that this would have been the result of such a simple action? So Dr. Wang and his friends, 14 years ago, cast their lives and their fortunes into the revolution and, behold, there came out this Republic. Who could have anticipated that it would be so different from the ideal which they had in mind? And now, after 13 years' experience of Republican government, Dr. Wang doubts or, at least, admits that doubt is permissible, whether representative government in China is possible or not. To make this an accomplished fact he now pins his faith to education as formerly he believed in republicanism. Give him education, compulsory and universal, and he will yet show you China a happy land with a government truly representative of her people. Well, we do not wish to be prophets of evil, but we would point out that the idealist never actually attains his promised land or, if he does, he finds it populated with sons of Anak and cities walled up to heaven. "A man's reach must exceed his grasp or what's heaven for?" Moreover we have a feeling that if China had a government truly representative of her people she would be much worse governed than she is at present and that is saying a good deal. Let anyone visualize the great, toiling and, for the most part unthinking, multitude that comprises China's millions and we think he will be compelled to admit that the more truly a government represented its amorphous mind the more impossible that government would be.

There is a Chinese proverb which says "It is not possible to express in speech all that one thinks, nor to put in writing all that one would say." We imagine that Dr. Wang, who is one of the most far-seeing men in China, has not put in writing all that he thinks, or even, on occasion, might say. It is being daily demonstrated to the world that while democracy—government by the people—is a great ideal and one that this generation must stand or fall by, it yet has very distinct limitations.

It is, perhaps, demonstrable that ten men are ten times as strong as one man, but it by no means follows that ten men are ten times as wise as one man. Indeed, if the one man is the right man, we might be safe in saying that the opposite is the truth. In times of national emergency nations are swift to realize that democracy involves divided counsels and the danger of mob action. They therefore appoint a Dictator to hold office while the peril lasts. The General in command of his troops and the Captain on the bridge of his ship are further examples of the fact that in critical situations one man is better than two and action is better than speech.

This does not mean that we are arguing for a return to autocracy. In ancient times the King was the man who was chosen by the people as the most fit to govern and defend them. If Chinese history is true, it was on these terms that the first Kings of this land held rule. It was a sound system and held within itself the seeds of true democracy. Its root principle is that you find the man with the gift of governing and put him in the place of power. It matters not a jot by what name you call him; King, President, Prime Minister; it is all one. The revolution bewildered the Chinese people by giving them a brand new set of names for a very old system and ever since the more they change the government the more it is the same thing. And so the people must be educated. Yes, but what are they to be taught? Will science or philosophy or belles lettres help them to a better administration? Scarcely. There must be something moral, something ethical, instilled into the teaching. Something that will raise the national standard of honour and teach the boys to play the game at school and play the man when later they go out into the world. When Chinese schoolboys are taught that it is more disgraceful to make a fortune by the old game of squeeze than to wear a pigtail, the dawn of the new day will be visible on the horizon.

NEW ROADS FOR OLD

July 22.

IN our Saturday's issue a correspondent quoted the case of a doctor in England who had successfully claimed from some local authority for damage to the tyres of his motor-car caused by the state of the roads; and the writer asks whether it would not be reasonable to claim from the Shanghai Municipal Council for similar damages to motor-cars arising from pot-holes, patches of loose stone and other evidences of unrepaired roads. In the cause of public amusement we should exceedingly like to see some enterprising motorist take the Council into the Court of Consuls. Whether he would succeed in his action is another matter. Frankly we do not think he would. In the first place we do not know exactly what was the state of the roads in England on which the doctor had his tyres damaged. There are many local authorities in England, some of them keep their roads very well, others not at all so. In Sussex, for instance, there was a delightfully casual practice—still in vogue only ten years ago and probably still obtaining, for Sussex is slow to change—of putting down patches of undressed flint and leaving the traffic to grind them into the road. In Shanghai, the Council would probably argue (1) that the roads at the worst could not injure a car, on which point we should certainly hear some heavy cross-swearing; (2) that they, the Council could not help themselves owing to the necessities of sewer-laying and other forms of public service; and (3) that they were spending up to the full limit of their available revenue in road repairs. As regards the last point it is interesting to see from the annual report that, in the year 1923, the Council spent Tls. 598,876 on road and footway maintenance; while the amount paid in licence fees by all kinds of vehicles from motor-lorries to sedan chairs was, if our addition is correct, Tls. 598,630. Of course the users of vehicles ought not to pay the whole cost of road maintenance, especially in a town where the bulk of the inhabitants prefer not to use the sidewalks. But the Council could argue, if taken into court, that whatever vehicles paid in licence fees went into road upkeep.

Far be it from us to defend anyone at whom bricks may be thrown without fear of a libel action, and least of all any public department. But we are bound to admit that on the matter of roads there are two sides to the question. Their condition is patent to everyone, the reason for it less so. As with many other troubles that afflict the world to-day, the war is not a little to blame. During it, there was no possibility of obtaining the requisite materials for great quantities of public work of all kinds that would normally have been done year by year, which has meant accumulations to be worked off subsequently. The contrast between the number of square feet of road surface opened up by the departments and public companies during the years of war and since is most striking. Again we have to remember the very large increase of population that has taken place during the past ten years. In the report that appeared in the Municipal Gazette of June 19 last, Mr. Harpur, the Commissioner of Public Works, wrote:—

The population of the Settlement has increased by approximately 200,000 since 1913, and, during this time buildings have been erected to the value of Tls. 94,000,000, covering 44,314 Chinese houses, 604 mills, godowns, etc., 1,505 other foreign buildings and 7,700 miscellaneous buildings, a total of 54,123 buildings in the Settlement alone. The public services have had to cope with the demands which this development has brought about, as well as with a great deal of extra Settlement development for which I have no exact figures.

In the five past years, we read, 250 miles of trench have been opened, whereas the total mileage of roads under the Council's control is only 140.

Mr. Harpur's report was specially directed to the question of "better co-ordination of effort where road opening work is requisite in connexion with the public utility services"—or, to put it more simply, whether it would not be possible to give notice that a certain strip of road would be closed at a certain date, and, if public companies wanted to do anything on that strip, they must do it then. One gathers that, in this respect, public companies might do more than they do. Every year they are asked to inform the Public Works Department what work of an extensive nature it is proposed to do during the ensuing twelvemonth and this information is usually given. But, the report continues, the actual work sometimes differs from the original proposal owing to various causes; also, when very large mains are required, twelve months' notice is not always sufficient to enable full consideration to be given to all the interests involved, and, since most of the public service companies must themselves have a fairly good knowledge of their probable major requirements two or three years in advance, it is desirable that this office be acquainted with these requirements as early as possible, since they may have a very direct bearing on drainage, sewerage and road work covering two or three years of construction.

The inference is strong that the Council might spur on the public companies to think more of the public and less of their shareholders. And this feeling is intensified by the fact that there is hardly a road in Shanghai which it would be possible to close altogether, owing to the fewness of trunk roads and the narrowness of those actually existing. Another consideration which has to be remembered is that while all road-surfacing devolves upon the Public Works Department, its resources in plant and labour are limited. A public company dig up the road and when they have finished and filled in the trench they notify the P. W. D. who relay the surface. The company pay, but the Department has to find the men and material. In England or America it is possible, in a pressure of such work, to borrow steam-rollers or whatever may be needed from the next town. For Shanghai there is no next town, and plant must be taken off some other point for the job at hand. Incidentally that fact supplies another argument for not metalling the Avenue Foch. That work being wholly unnecessary, in no way whatever demanded by the state of the traffic, would mean not only a waste of money, but a needless distraction of plant, every piece of which is required for urgent work elsewhere.

Mr. Harpur's report is not, it must be confessed, encouraging.

I see no prospect of relief from road work in the near future, he writes. The doubling of the tramway tracks in Broadway and Broadway East will cause temporary inconvenience to, and diversion of traffic, for, though considerable progress has been made in the widening of East Seward Road, it is not—except for freight traffic—a satisfactory relief road to Broadway. The condition of the track in Bubbling Well Road and Avenue Road also calls for early reconstruction. Railless tram extensions will necessitate several miles of feeder cable, and I think, too, that it cannot be long before additional pumping mains will be required by the Waterworks Company for the northern and western districts. The heaviest part of the sewerage works should be over in two years or thereabouts, but so long as the town expands, extensions will be constantly required.

It is an old adage that you cannot put more into a pint pot than it will hold and that is precisely what we are trying to do in Shanghai. In many directions new arteries might be constructed which would afford immense relief to our over-laden thoroughfares, if we could only get across the boundaries. But we are hemmed in by many local authorities who for the fetish of sovereign rights, in reality wholly unaffected, or from sheer dog-in-the-manger obstruction resist improvements by which none would benefit more than their own people. But it certainly must not be inferred that the Settlement authorities are doing nothing either to maintain and improve road surface or to open new thoroughfares. Something of that work we hope to show in another article.

July 23.

Few persons in all probability are aware of the name of the stuff of which roads are made in Shanghai, still less of how it is made. There is a general idea that an ordinary macadamized road is laid and a coating of asphalt spread on the top. But this method is altogether out of date and its uselessness for Shanghai roads has been effectually proved. It cannot stand up against our traffic—of which more presently—and once the surface is frayed rain gets through and the familiar pothole quickly appears. The material of which roads are now made, wherever there is a reasonable prospect that they will not have to be torn up again in a few months, is asphaltic concrete, the wearing properties of which have proved excellent. For example, the centre of Bubbling Well Road between Thibet Road and the Race Course is laid with asphaltic concrete and everyone who drives that way knows how beautifully smooth it is. The sides of the road have not yet been laid because they will presently have to be dug up for the sewerage scheme, nor has the road westwards of the Race Club, which awaits the leisurely process of relaying the tramway track. The writer has seen a block of asphaltic concrete cut, for a test, from the centre of Peking Road, and after more than three years' wear, the surface is as smooth as if it had been newly laid. It is rather tragic to read in the P.W.D. annual report that of 122,134 square yards of road surface laid in 1923, seventy per cent. consisted of surface reinstatement of trenches.

We do not know that the Public Works Department would exactly welcome personally conducted parties of tourists at their yard in Sinza where the asphaltic concrete is made; and as it is essential that the work should be conducted at the highest possible temperature and it is exceedingly dusty, we are not sure that tourists would flock to see it. But certainly those who are really interested would be welcome to see the process: indeed the permanent departments generally are almost pathetically grateful when ratepayers take an interest in what they do. "We put all this in our annual report," say they, a trifle bitterly. "But we know that nobody ever reads it." Great heaps of Ningpo sand and finely crushed granite from the Pingchiao quarry fill a large portion of the yard. This is the body, so to speak, of the asphaltic concrete, which is made in a vast and lofty machine, of furnaces, revolving drums, lifts, mixers, weighing machines and shutes. At one end of this machine an endless chain of little dippers scoops up the granite chips and sand and conveys them to the first revolving drum where they are heated as in Nebuchadnezzar's burning fiery furnace. Thence they are conveyed by an automatic lift to the top of the machine; and because the revolving drum tends to separate the bigger chips from the small—let the reader take a bowl of sand and gravel and stir it vigorously round and round with his finger and he will see how—the mass must pass through a mixer. From the top of the machine it is dropped in nicely weighed proportions, together with liquid asphalt, into another mixer and here it is churned and turned and twisted and tossed, until there is as perfect a distribution and combination of all particles as can be obtained. And then it drops down another chute into a motor-lorry below and so away to wherever a road surface is being laid, where coolies spread out the glowing mass with flat rakes as smoothly as they can, and a steam roller, a final coating of asphalt and a layer of sand complete the road. Heat is, as has been said, an indispensable part of the work. All processes are conducted under intense heat and the asphaltic concrete drops into the motor-lorry at a temperature of 250° degrees Fahr., nor, even on a long journey, will it lose more than ten degrees or so. In this condition it looks, in consistency, rather like the unboiled Christmas pudding which children stir, making wishes the while; but if only hot enough it is quite dry and a spade put into it comes out clean. Once the temperature goes down the asphaltic concrete becomes sticky and lumpy and below a certain degree it will not "lay" properly. It may be mentioned that special non-conducting shoes were obtained from America for the coolies who spread the asphaltic concrete as a protection against the heat. They will not wear them, preferring their own contraptions of felt and rags. Other employers of Chinese labour, mutatis mutandis, will have noticed the same obstinate idiosyncracy.

The laboratory is an essential part of the asphaltic-concrete works. Here the material is subjected to perpetual tests to verify its ductility and the extent to which it is liable to penetration by liquid. Just as there is no such thing known to science as a perfect liquid, so there is no absolutely impenetrable substance: but the asphaltic concrete put down on the roads affords a very fair substitute. Neat little glass cases are shown of material carefully graded from the biggest pieces of granite at the bottom, through all component parts up to the top dressing of asphalt; and if a piece of roadway is found to be wearing badly it can be made in the chemist's hands to "thaw and resolve itself" into every one of these parts, so as to show of which part there is too much or too little. Experiments are continually being made in new materials or for the possible employment of by-products which will mean a saving in costs.

The ultimate roadway is as solid and durable as common sense can desire and the requisite economy dictate. There is, however, one kind of traffic against which no substance yet discovered will stand up. Nothing will resist the cutting and grinding power of wheelbarrows—especially when tilted on one side—and handcarts. Measures have been taken by the Council within the past few years to induce the handcart owners to use wheels with a wider rim. But it is the consistent and merciless overloading of these carts for which no width of wheel can compensate, that does the damage. And of this we submit that the police ought to take notice. When we see a handcart which can only just be forced to move by dint of men pulling on the wheelspokes as well as lugging in front and shoving behind, that surely is a vehicle technically out of control. And its owner ought to be prosecuted. Motor-lorries too are habitually and grossly overloaded and as they increase in numbers, early and drastic notice should be taken of the fact.

July 24.

If our readers have patience for yet one more article on Shanghai's roads we believe they will not find it uninteresting. Hitherto we have dealt with the conditions which lead to continual tearing up of the roads and forbid hopes of much relief from this state of affairs for two years to come; and with the excellent material of which roads are made wherever what may be called some security of tenure is obtainable. But the beginning of all troubles, alike in congestion of traffic and of intermittent diggings up and layings down, is that there are not enough roads of adequate width to carry all the men and material that must move along them. This fact is, no doubt, generally recognized and from time to time suggestions are advanced for new outlets. For example, a year or two ago, strong advocacy was exerted for the widening of Kiukiang Road from the Bund to Thibet Road. The cost would have been colossal and, inasmuch as at least a large part of the traffic taken from the Nanking Road by this means would rejoin the main stream in Bubbling Well Road, it would have afforded no proportionate relief. What, perhaps, is not generally recognized is that it is the Chinese traffic using the main roads of the Central District which so terribly overcrowds them—traffic bound for regions which those roads do not directly serve, in the sense of being immediately in line with them, and with whose necessities the Central District ought not to be burdened. The problem is to distract this traffic to other roads if such can be found; and in many directions there is a vast amount of work going on, demolitions, road widenings, extensions, the immediate purpose of which may not be recognized, but with an aim in view that should presently prove of very great value. The Municipal Report for 1923 notes that during the present century Tls. 4,344,197 has been spent on land for road widenings and extensions. Of that amount over one-fifth was spent last year alone. "If the present rate of progress can be slightly increased and maintained for four or five years," says the report, "the cumulative effect of the improvements will be noticeable, particularly if special effort is directed towards the provision of an east and west thoroughfare north of Soochow Road."

If we turn to the map of the International Settlement, it will be seen that the area about where the Soochow Creek enters the Huangpu is rather like a wasp's waist. North and east lie industrial and shipping regions; northwestward the important mill district of Markham and Gordon Roads, ever stretching its busy hands further and further west. At all hours of day and night these regions must be in communication and vast quantities of heavy traffic pass over the Garden and Szechuen Road bridges and through the Central District, because they have no other adequate road. Now to this traffic is presently to be added all that will centre in and radiate from the new Chinese Post Office, whose parcels business, demanding the use of large motor lorries, has grown in recent years beyond all expectation. Incidentally this district immediately north of Soochow Creek and between the Settlement's western boundary and Woosung Road is the most densely populated of Shanghai. Yet through this congested and narrow area two great arteries are not only possible but are actually in course of construction, and in these lies hope of relief.

There are certain strategic points carefully to be noted. The first of these lies at the eastern end of Avenue Road, where it squeezes past such a rookery of mangy little houses as never ought to be allowed in a self-respecting city. But now at last, after such a tale of delay and obstruction as might daunt the most ardent road-planner, these are to go and a decent thoroughfare will be opened through to Thibet Road. By this and the bridge that bears its name one arrives at Haining Road. This latter at its eastern end makes an acute and awkward angle with Woosung Road, but between that street and the parallel Chapoo Road land has been obtained which will allow a straight course from Haining Road into Yalu Road. The latter ultimately "dies" on the northern boundary of the Wayside district, but a continuation is planned which will carry right through to the Point.

For the other artery let us begin first in Ward Road. Travelling westward, we find that one great gain already has been scored in the setting back of an awkward angle where Muirhead Road crosses, giving a straight passage into Seward Road and thence to Tiendong Road. But now comes another strategic point. The last-named road disappears into a shocking slum known as Tongdongkaloong which extends from behind the temple of the Queen of Heaven on North Honan Road practically to the North Chêkiang Road. Now if Tongdongkaloong were opened up, there would, with other acquisitions of land actually made, be a straight road through Alabaster Road into North Thibet Road. Even as matters are, the opening of the new Honan Road bridge will afford a way out for traffic from Tiendong, Seward and Ward Roads and thus enable the police to divert vehicles away from the Garden Bridge and behind the General Hospital. For these arteries that we have been describing new railless tram routes are projected, which should have the effect of freeing Nanking Road from cars now improperly burdening it, which are only used by Chinese, whose real objective and interests are far away to the northward.

"Je grignote" was Marshal Joffre's brief description of his tactics in dealing with the long, long German line. So do the Municipal Council and the P. W. D. nibble away at the unlovely masses of Chinese rookeries which would seem expressly placed to defeat construction of trunk roads. Here a bit and there a bit; and the real importance of each acquisition is not, perhaps, so much in itself as in its influence on a region a couple of miles away. The effect of these tactics cannot, of course, be expected to make itself felt in under four or five years, and the obstacles thrown in the roadmaker's way by absentee landlords, divided ownership and the like are almost heartbreaking. But a very great scheme of trunk-road-making has been begun and the ultimate benefit of it must be most welcome.

M. GROSSE

July 25.

We are very sure our readers will agree with us that the handing over of the Russian Consulate by M. Victor Grosse to the Chinese, for the Bolshevik authorities, should not pass without some public appreciation of the very fine work that he has done. For over fourteen years M. Grosse has represented Russian interests in Shanghai. In former days the charge was probably not more onerous than that of any other Consul-General. But no one who had any business with M. Grosse would fail to appreciate his courteous and ever willing helpfulness; among his colleagues in the Consular Body he quickly acquired a deserved reputation for ability and judgment; and it may also well be mentioned that his knowledge of Chinese language and literature and of oriental characteristics is of a very high order.

It was not, however, until China's breach with the last vestiges of the old Imperial Russian power that M. Grosse became, if we may so put it, generally known and publicly observed. The position of the Russians in Shanghai was unique. There were already some thousands of them and they were indeed as sheep having no shepherd. Nominally under the protection of the Chinese Government, they were in a town where no Chinese official could function. The problems which such a state of affairs at once projected were almost numberless. M. Grosse went to Peking to interview the authorities both Chinese and foreign and eventually the arrangement was made whereby he acted in Shanghai as joint Commissioner for Foreign Affairs, deputizing for the Chinese, while M. Ivanoff sat at the Mixed Court with a Chinese Magistrate for all Russian cases. The late Sir Everard Fraser was largely instrumental in putting this arrangement through, but its originator was M. Grosse. Like Columbus's egg, it looked simple enough when explained, but its accomplishment was due only to great tactfulness and skill in negotiation. It has worked extremely well and while we certainly do not underrate the orderliness of behaviour of the Russian refugees, who in the most trying and pathetic circumstances have conducted themselves extraordinarily well, the community of Shanghai owe a larger debt of gratitude to M. Grosse than perhaps they are aware for the ability with which he has managed the affairs of his unhappy countrymen. In recent months those affairs have become particularly difficult and anxious. We will not go into details, but situations have arisen not once nor twice, which but for M. Grosse's combined firmness and sympathy might easily have resulted in a very awkward manner. He has been severely blamed by some of his fellow countrymen for handing over the Consulate. But it needs very little reflexion to show that it was impossible for him to do anything else. In a position of great difficulty he has discharged his duties well, giving to them all the thought and energy he could command, and he leaves surely with the good wishes of all that he may recover his normal poise during the few weeks of holiday that he takes before again devoting himself to Russian affairs in a capacity which will not be the less onerous for being purely non-political.

It will be interesting to see how the Soviet representatives conduct themselves in their new charge. We are told that they are most anxious to avoid anything like friction with the governing body of Shanghai, and we may well believe it. So far as the Consular Body is concerned, we do not see that they have any official standing in Shanghai, at least they cannot partake in its discussions; and the only control they can exert over their fellow countrymen is just what the latter choose to allow them and no more. Short of stirring up open revolution—which, to do them justice, we doubt if they wish to do—they have no alternative but to endeavour to gain public confidence; and that will be no easy job, as it is hardly necessary to say that even those who have recognized the de jure Government at Moscow have by no means given it their confidence. From the all-important standing point of the refugees we see little prospect of relief by the substituting of the Bolshevik officials for M. Grosse. The former have published an amnesty, but it is very open to question whether the Russian community put the slightest faith in it. The disposal of the refugees is likely to remain China's responsibility still, in which case the newly formed Russian association of which M. Grosse is to be chairman will doubtless have a useful part to play.

HATS AND HISTORY

July 25.

IT is curious how often headgear has symbolized some movement in history, or some school of thought. There are few people, perhaps, who would regard the silk hat, that emblem both of die-hard conservatism and of the Victorian "non-conformist conscience," as having its origin in Republican Puritanism. When Benjamin Franklin went over to France as the first representative of the New Republic in America, he wore a modified form of the steeple crown head dress of the Pilgrim Fathers. Paris copied it and the hat underwent a gradual metamorphosis until it emerged as a cylinder, which respectable Christendom has worn ever since. Fiery British exponents of what they regard as liberty show their contempt for the existing order of things by appearing on every possible occasion wearing cloth caps. In fact, caps have for ages symbolized socialistic views, from the red cap of the French revolutionaries to the tweed head covering of Keir Hardie.

Again, look at the Chinese Revolution. It was accompanied by some very wonderful changes in the matter of headgear. The true republican of China retained to a great extent the body garments of his ancestors, though he cut off his queue, that badge of Manchu servitude. But in his head covering he showed all his adherence to the new faith that was to bring forth a new heaven and a new earth in Old Cathay. The ancient round cap with its knob on the top disappeared and its place was taken sometimes by a cloth cap, sometimes by a billy-cock but mostly by a cleft hat of a washed-out hue.

Now we are told that the Turk is about to cast away his fez as an outward and visible sign that he is to emerge from Oriental mediævalism and take his place among his brothers of the modern West. He has been told by his government that he is at liberty to cover his head with any sort of hat he likes or with none at all. What, one wonders, will be the effect upon the mentality of the inhabitants of that much-tried country. It will afford a study in the psychology of hats, which should be even more instructive than the psychology of clothes. May be the Turk sans fez will develop into a meek and mild sort of individual who will prefer being swindled by foreigners to bastinadoing them and who would rather caress the wily Greek than curse him. Why the hat should so often be used to symbolize historical changes in outlook it is impossible to say. Perhaps because it is worn so near the seat of mental operations. But may be some up-to-date Carlyle will thrill the world ere long with a masterpiece on the Philosophy of Hats.

PLAGUE IN CHINA

July 26.

AT a time of national peril in 1910-1911, when an epidemic of pneumonic plague was raging in Manchuria and the north of China which eventually caused the death of 50,000 people, the Manchu dynasty rendered a great and lasting service to China by establishing the Manchurian Plague Preventive Service under the able leadership of Dr. Wu Lien-teh. Owing to the efficiency of this Service, when there was another outbreak in 1920 the mortality was not more than 8,000, and since then the disease has been successfully held in check. Consequently the latest Annual Report (1923-1924) consists mainly of a review of the work of the past. There is one paper in it, however, which extends our knowledge of the disease. As long ago as 1907, and again in 1911, cases of plague occurred which seemed to prove that the disease started in the marmot or tarabagan, but the evidence was not conclusive. Dr. Wu Lien-teh and his colleagues by their recent experiments have placed the matter beyond doubt. This very creditable piece of work is significant as it indicates that in Manchuria as long as there are tarabagans with the disease there is always the danger of outbreaks there of pneumonic plague.

Bubonic plague, is not so appalling as pneumonic plague but in the long run it destroys more lives, especially in regions where it is endemic. Since 1896 eleven million people have died from it in India alone. It is a rat disease and is conveyed from diseased rats to human beings by the agency of fleas. A most important report has been made recently by Dr. F. Norman White, who was in Shanghai a few months ago, to the League of Nations Health Organization of which he is a member. Hitherto it has been held that the germ, the bacillus pestis, discovered independently by Kitasato and Yersin in 1894, was the cause of all forms of plague. But Dr. White, impressed by the striking differences between pneumonic and bubonic plague, advances the hypothesis that in pneumonic plague the plague bacillus does not act alone but is aided and abetted by some other pernicious microbe which produces the distinctive symptoms. This remains to be proved. At any rate, whether the theory is accepted or not, Dr. White argues that from the point of view of sanitary conventions and preventive measures, the facts reported by him afford ample justification for regarding bubonic plague and pneumonic plague as two separate and distinct diseases. This is most important to business men as well as to physicians, because the disorganization of trade and commerce for which plague has been responsible probably exceeds in amount that which can be attributed to any other epidemic disease. Further, Dr. White contends that bubonic plague is seldom transmitted from man to man but is mainly spread by the grain trade, the rats with their fleas being transported with the grain and remaining with it in stores and godowns. Break the association of rats and grain, and the control of bubonic plague would be readily assured. There should be rat-free buildings for the storage of grain; periodic fumigation of ships; fumigation of infected or suspicious cargo from infected storehouses; and the fumigation of the lighters and barges which in so many ports are used as the means of communication between ship and shore. It is urged that measures of this kind would be less irksome and far more effective against plague and arouse much less opposition among Orientals than some of the present anti-plague measures, such as the disinfection of houses, etc.

It is also urged that more should be done by municipalities to secure the co-operation of the public in the campaign against plague. As many persons as possible should be persuaded to join in the extermination of the rats by poisoning and trapping. It is even suggested that to stimulate popular interest an appeal should be made to the sporting instinct, as in Formosa, where a "Rat Lottery" has been instituted. In return for each rat brought in, a ticket is given which entitles the holder to participate in a lottery; prizes are drawn on the receipt of so many thousand rats. It is believed that in other places also if the first prize was a very considerable sum, and the drawings were made with sufficient ceremony, very useful results would be made from the enlistment of the gambling propensities of the Oriental on the side of public health. In Shanghai this suggestion will be regarded by many good people as of more than doubtful propriety. Not even to ward off visitations of plague would they consent to the institution of a public lottery; others, not so strict, but wearied by the constant discussion of moral questions, would also be against it. Besides our Municipal Health Department is doing remarkably well in its warfare against rats. It is gratifying to know that Shanghai, although it may be in communication with ports where there are cases of bubonic plague, enjoys a remarkable freedom from the disease. It has had no human case of plague for eight years and no plague-infected rats for three years. It is the opinion of Dr. White that we are justified in assuming that while rat-fleas in Shanghai are capable of spreading plague among the rats, these fleas bite human beings only in very exceptional circumstances.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

Ponies or Cars

Shanghai once was a great place for the man who was keen on riding but who had not got much money, for good ponies were cheaper than three hours in a café, wide stretches of country were open to him for a gallop and long riding roads for a morning constitutional, whilst he could have his pony brought almost to his doorway. Ponies now have soared to the price of real motor-cars, the old riding country gradually is being given up to the builder and the riding roads are becoming fewer every year. At last Avenue Foch is to go and without being selfish one can say that it is a great pity. Hundreds of men—and ladies, too, nowadays—regularly go out in the morning for an hour or two at hacking and vow that it is this that keeps them fit through the summer. The Avenue Foch track was very convenient for most of these people, for it ran close to either the home or the stable in the case of nearly every rider. Now it is to be metalled throughout its length and width and no longer will it be passable for ponies, for the admitted reason that the motorists want it. Something that will compel a rider to walk his pony for a mile or so at the end of a ride is not a bad thing, but even that purpose is not served in this case, for it is simply impossible with most ponies that are kept and trained properly for country work even to walk them over a hard road with motor-cars dodging all around them, and if a pony has a tendency to be a little skittish in the neighbourhood of a motor-car, any Chinese chauffeur always will assist in driving him completely wild by blowing his horn continuously and with more force the nearer he gets to the pony. Another trouble is that a man may have two hours to spare in the morning, but he cannot manage more and if he cannot afford a motor-car in which to get far out into the open and meet his pony there, his morning ride is going to be practically an impossibility.

Those Shipping Profits

The Crown Colony of Hongkong appears to be in an extremely flourishing condition, if we take as a criterion the Treasury financial statement for the month of March which has just made its appearance in the "Government Gazette," and which shows the balance of assets over liabilities to be $18,443,853.65. We are not so much concerned with that statement, however, as by the revelation that the sum of $2,220,493.91 is still shown under the heading of "Shipping Control Account." There seems no doubt that these are the two million or so dollars which were responsible for the passing of the now famous Indemnity Ordinance, for the litigation brought by a number of shipowners to recover some of the money from the Hongkong Government, and for the statement made in the British Supreme Court for China recently by the unfortunate Mr. Moller that his bankruptcy was largely attributable to the action of Hongkong in keeping all the profits made while the ships were operated for the Shipping Controller. It is not our intention again to comment on that litigation or the justice or otherwise of the Hongkong Government's attitude in passing the Indemnity Ordinance, but rather to express wonderment that so large a sum can be carried on the books of the Colony apparently indefinitely. It will be remembered that at one time there was a serious Government project afoot in Hongkong to use the money to remedy the housing shortage, or to build hospitals, but the scheme seems to have fallen through. As, since that scheme was mooted, Hongkong has said that it only operated the ships under orders from, and for, the Admiralty, and that any claim the shipowners might have would be against the Imperial Government, the doubt arises as to whether there is not another rift in the lute and whether the Home Government itself is not casting covetous eyes on the money. It certainly seems strange: Hongkong has disclaimed responsibility for requisitioning the ships; has got the profits and refuses to hand them over to the owners of the vessels; and does not itself use the money on any of the many excellent purposes to which it might be put. The fate of those two million dollars will be watched with great interest by more than one, ourselves included.

A Modest People

The trouble of a condensed history of anything is that it is extremely difficult to know what to leave out and to write paragraphs intended to be comprehensive in such a manner that they will convey a general impression and not appear to be meant for a few only. It was scarcely possible to make our Jubilee Supplement any larger than it was and it was impossible to put within its pages a full history of Shanghai, but admittedly one fact was left out of which at least a brief mention might have been made. It has been brought to notice that even when we gave a list of the foreign mercantile firms in Shanghai in the early days we omitted any mention of the Parsees who were here as early as anyone and whose descendants still are carrying on. Evidently the historian let his mind wander on the Western strain only. Yet really the Parsees themselves are somewhat to blame, for their very modesty. Who, indeed, if ordered to write a short essay on the Parsees' part in the Shanghai world, could turn out much of a story without long and searching inquiry? They are such an industrious, conscientious and capable people that they are able to boast that there are very few amongst them who can be classed as paupers, yet, singularly, they seem to keep very much to themselves and other nations and sects know little of them. Bombay ranks amongst the greatest cities of the world, and Bombay would not have attained to anything like its present greatness had it not been for the Parsees. They stand high in business and in all the professions and they are wonderfully keen on sports, yet again, how many of us really know much of them? The two best known in Shanghai must be M. J. Divecha and C. H. Bhoora, and that because they are such clever cricketers. Well, it is now admitted for a known fact that Parsee merchants were amongst the earliest settlers in Shanghai and they have done more than the share which should go with their numbers in building up the great city as we now know it. It is further reiterated that, if they are not heard when Shanghai takes a little exercise with its golden trumpet, it is because they choose to make so little noise about their prosperous business concerns and their good works. And that is no fault.

The Russian Children

One of our correspondents to-day raises a question which must enlist all sympathies, namely, that of the Russian children whom we see offering things for sale about the streets. But between the most natural desire to get them off the streets and knowing how to do so, there is a problem difficult to solve. No special fund would exactly meet the case. These children of to-day would go; others, to-morrow, would take their place—it might indeed be an incentive to parents to send them out. Indeed the force of appeal exercised by these little people excites inevitable suspicion as to the reason for their being there. For we live in a suspicious age. What has first to be ascertained is to whom the children belong and what is their condition, and it is not easy to say who is to do that: the authorities admit no responsibility towards the refugees and it is almost too much to ask that the already gallantly labouring Refugee Relief Committee should undertake it. But of one thing we are pretty sure, namely, that donations to this latter organization will be better expended for the benefit of destitute Russians than could be done in any other way. Meanwhile, it may be immoral to suggest giving money to the children themselves. But a few small coins in this way will not harm anybody and though it will not take the children off the streets, it will shorten the time they have to spend thereon..

The Strike at Shameen

The Canton Government has an excellent opportunity of proving that it is ready to discourage anti-foreign agitators in the strike of servants that has occurred at Shameen. In consequence of the bomb outrage during M. Merlin's visit, and, we may well believe, in pursuance of the Consular Body's recent note to the Canton Government on conspirators known to be plotting in Canton against foreigners (such a note would not have been sent without good reason for it), it was enacted that all Chinese coming on to the island must show passports. That is not in the least unreasonable and we do not for a moment think that the said servants, if let alone, would have raised objection to an order which would contribute to their own safety as much as to that of foreigners—for when bombs are flying servants may get killed as easily as their masters. The inference that they have been intimidated by agitators is irresistible. The Canton Government may have its differences with the foreign Powers; but we decline to believe that men like Dr. Sun and Dr. Wu Chao-chu connive at the plots of bomb-throwers and terrorists and we look to them to see that the Shameen servants are allowed to return to work without delay.

Where Scotland Scores

Sentencing Samuel Mason, an Edinburgh-born man, to two years' hard labour for fraud, Mr. Justice Greer, at the Bedford Assizes recently, stated that Providence had been kind to Mason in giving him the original advantage of having been born a Scotsman, but he had chosen to follow a life of crime. This would appear to open up an entirely new field for discussion as regards Scotsmen, and one which cannot lightly be disposed of. One must give Mr. Justice Greer credit for having expressed what he really meant, and for being more or less unprejudiced, for he himself is a native of the Isle of Mona and presumably holds that slightly pronounced feeling of superiority (possibly justified) over Sassenach and Scot and Irish and Welsh that is the hallmark of every true Manxman. Admitting that the Scots are a fine race with fine traditions and fine prospects, it is a little difficult to fathom His Lordship's mind in considering that a man born in Edinburgh has a natural advantage over other non-Scottish Britons. If the man had had the good fortune to be born in another city of Scotland we could name ....However, assuming, in fact admitting, that Scottish birth is an advantage in life's race, it would seem only just, in order to give other species of Britons a sporting chance, that the Scot should be handicapped. We feel sure that some equitable system of handicapping, to cover most phases of life's existence where there is competition, could be devised, and that the Scots, secure in their traditions, their natural ability and their sporting instincts, would welcome such an innovation. The whole matter, of course, is a fit and proper subject for a Royal Commission unadorned by Scots; and if rightly composed, its findings and its dicta should give members of other British nationalities an equal chance of securing the best jobs.

Is Native Labour Cheap?

The average foreigner with no experience of the Far East usually has the impression that manual labour in China is the cheapest in the world and that anything manufactured or produced in China must necessarily be considerably cheaper than a similar article made elsewhere. In past years, there probably was every justification for this impression, and possibly still is in certain instances, though it is strongly to be feared that the Chinese labourer—or at least those of him employed at great centres such as Shanghai and Hongkong—is fast losing, if has not already lost, his former reputation of giving a day's work for a day's pay. A contractor's overseer, who years ago had considerable experience in construction work in the U. S. and in England, and who since has been engaged in connexion with a large building in Shanghai, has stated definitely that in his opinion a gang of 12 Irish or Italian labourers in the United States could, without undue exertion, do any piece of work in half the time it would take 100 Chinese labourers. That appears at first sight to be a drastic statement, but a slight study of the present-day Chinese working man at work soon gives one the feeling that the worker is doing as little as possible and doing it as slowly as possible. There are, of course, honest, industrious labourers in China as elsewhere, but it needs only for one to watch, for a short time, a body of Chinese labourers engaged on constructional work or in any other employment where output does not regulate pay, to be convinced that the majority of workers have that appearance of lassitude which comes only from a keen desire to avoid as much work as possible. A typical instance was reported in these columns some days ago in connexion with the re-laying of the tram-car tracks, and this case is by no means an isolated one. Perhaps before long we shall see foreign employers of native labour following the custom of many Chinese employers, and instituting a system of piece-work with payment strictly by results. It works well in Europe and America, and there is no reason why it should not be equally effective here. It surely would result in a day's work being given for a day's pay, which seems to be the exception rather than the rule at present.

Kuala Lumpur's Lead

Congratulations once again must be extended to little Kuala Lumpur on achieving what we cannot do in Shanghai, though ours is the greatest city in the Far East, the Model Settlement and the second port in the world. Last year Kuala Lumpur organized what for short was called an Agricultural Show, but actually it appears to have been a model for Wembley to work upon, for it embraced an agricultural show, horticultural show, dog show, trades exhibition, rubber exhibition, baby show, public health demonstration, poultry show, flying and sports carnival. It was a great success, as of course it was almost bound to be, and, encouraged thereby, the committee built up a still bigger exhibition, which was opened some few days ago and has set all the Malay States and the Straits Settlements talking. If one can judge by the newspaper accounts, the success of the exhibition mainly has been due to wholehearted co-operation on the part of everyone. In the dog show there were no "black-eared setters" running wild and causing havoc, nor were there any young ladies who trailed around behind the secretary for two hours, asked the same question over and over again and then accused him and all his associates of lack of organization. Everyone seems to have taken an interest in each of the sections, from polo to babies, dogs to daisies, bulls to needlework, and the result has been most happy. It seems extraordinary that in Shanghai we cannot arrange even an agricultural show, whilst Kuala Lumpur apparently is to have a great combined exhibition annually. Probably not one per cent. of Shanghai's population have any idea of the number of really splendid cattle in and near the Settlement, any more than they believed there were so many well-bred dogs until they saw them, and even now they have not seen the half of what could be put on exhibition.

Songs of Atkins

A gentleman at Home has conceived the idea of producing, for the pleasure of the present generation and the benefit of posterity, a book containing the words and music of the majority of the songs and rhymes so popular with the British "Tommy" during the war; and as there is a likelihood of many of these, conceived, composed and sung under conditions to which there probably never will be a parallel, falling into oblivion, the effort is both opportune and praiseworthy, and there should be a big demand for the collection when it is printed. It is, however, more than probable that many of the more popular songs will either have to be entirely omitted or considerably abridged. Tommy Atkins never mixed his composition of songs with an excess of prudishness, and for that reason many of his most popular productions or protegées reflect that freedom of thought and speech which come from men when they are gathered together as soldiers. Still, taking that into consideration, there should be sufficient songs (fit for a drawing room audience) to fill a fair-sized book, and the näive humour of such classics as "The Quarter-Bloke's Lament", "If You Want to Find the Sergeant-Major", "Wash me in the water that they wash the dixies in and I shall be whiter than the whitewash on the wall", "Plum and Apple, Apple and Plum", "Fred Karno's Army," etc., is well worth permanently recording. It is to be feared, however, that some of Tommy's prime favourites which, without being really indecent, are just a little too risqué for cold print, will gradually sink into the realm of things forgotten, possibly never to be revived; though there are a few that will live for long, whether recorded in print or not. One cannot imagine, for instance, the tribulations of the "Lady from A ....." being forgotten for another forty years; the aversion of the aged pauper to Christmas pudding will be recalled for ever wherever British soldiers foregather; the beautiful Miss Adams will live with the Army for all time; and if, as must be the case, the most popular of all Army songs is omitted, many past and present soldiers will echo with fervour the last line, "Isn't it a blinking shime?"

Licences for Bicycles

During the past fortnight the Chinese newspapers have given full prominence to hints of a proposal for the licensing of bicycles within the Settlement, and without exception the suggested license has been opposed. Naturally, Chinese interested in the trade, which has of late grown to considerable dimensions, have been loud in their protests, declaring that such a tax is unheard of in other countries, the bicycle being something of a necessity to the poor man and being, so far as traffic is concerned, a harmless vehicle giving the authorities no trouble at all. There is sure to be further noise, to which the dealers will be chief contributors, when it becomes known that the Council proposes to establish the tax. As will be seen from this week's Municipal Gazette, the French Council has already decided in principle upon the licensing of bicycles, and the Municipal Council has come to a similar decision from the point of view of traffic control. The proposal cannot come into effect until it has been approved at the annual meeting of ratepayers, so the Chinese immediately concerned will have plenty of time in which to get accustomed to the idea. That the recommendation will be adopted goes without saying, for the manner in which most Chinese use these machines, especially when groups of them go joy-riding after office hours, distinctly adds to an already complicated traffic problem. Owing to its comparative cheapness, the bicycle is bound to come into greater popularity, and the need for such a check on its proper use as a small licence fee will ensure will become greater as time goes on. The fee will be small, of course, and there is no occasion for dealers to get alarmed at the prospect of any possible injury to the trade. There can be none.

Calling the Police

Circumstances attendant upon recent activities of the burgling fraternity in the French Concession give one to wonder whether the police force of that Concession is not in need of augmentation. On Tuesday we published an account of a burglary that took place about 300 yards from the French Central Police Station in which it was stated that the police, although notified of the occurrence at 2 a.m. and of the fact that the burglars had just left and could not be far away, failed to send a representative till 6.30, although a request had been made that one be sent at once. That statement has not been denied, so we feel justified in assuming its correctness. In another case, which happened a few weeks ago, a lady living quite close to a French police station telephoned for an officer to be sent at once to arrest a thieving, bullying coolie, who was in her garden and who showed no great inclination to leave. A Chinese detective arrived 45 minutes after the request had been made; and the coolie had gone. While most residents of the Concession realize and appreciate that the police authorities have no easy task in maintaining law and order in the large area under their control, it certainly would appear, from the cases we have quoted, that the force is not as full as the requirements of the concession demand. The only alternative explanation is that the occurrence of a burglary or the need of an immediate arrest are not considered incidents such as to justify speedy police action or the departure from a routine more concerned with the convenience of the police than the rights of householders. That explanation no one would wish to accept. While on this subject, we may be pardoned for referring to another matter, not wholly irrelevant. It is very much the exception, rather than the rule, for any official on night duty at a French police station to understand English. Admitting that the Concession is French, it cannot be denied that the language most commonly spoken in it (apart from Chinese) is the various varieties of English, and it conceivably may occur that a householder who speaks English but little French, and who is urgently in need of police assistance, may be debarred from that assistance owing to the police officer on duty speaking French but little or no English. What we may feel is that the French Concession is now very big and if the police are not enough for all its dutes their numbers should be increased.

A Pedicab Nuisance

It was not to be expected that the pedicabs would appear as by the wave of a magician's wand, solve the traffic problem and prove to be an unquestioned boon and blessing. The first day they were out one of them became somewhat bent and before they had been on the streets a week they were the cause of, or at least the excuse for, a strike. Those, however, are small matters and do not call for the appointment of a Commissioner of Rickshas. But something has developed that could conveniently be checked before it becomes any worse. If it were possible to lay an asphalt track a mile wide across the Sahara Desert, keep it clear of any other living thing, and then put a Chinese on a bicycle and set him pedalling across, he would ring his bell the whole way. To be fair, it must be added that a chauffeur in a car under similar conditions would blow his horn at least every hundred yards. The pedicab coolies—full apologies are offered in advance if they have some other title—have bells on their machines and they are serenely happy, for they can add yet more noise to the nerve-trying chorus of our streets. Of course, when a fare is in the boot the bell has to be rung continuously, for one never knows when a miner will jump up out of the deep-level bores of the Tramway Co., the Waterworks Co., the Gas Co., the Electricity Department, the Telephone Co. and the Public Works Department, but for a few days the coolies looked sad when at rest for they had not then discovered an excuse for using the bell in such circumstances. Now the solution has arrived. When not engaged, the coolie pedals slowly along the road, close to the kerb, ringing his bell continuously. Approaching a foreigner, he works the trigger with the speed of a maxim-gun in a tight corner, and so continues until he attracts attention. Bells are not allowed on the ordinary ricshas, but if this sort of thing is to continue the next strike will be on a demand for "bells for all."

State-Owned Shipping

Among the many important matters discussed at the recent International Shipping Conference in London was whether State-owned ships engaged in trade ought not to be subject to the ordinary rules of law as to proceedings in connexion with such matters as collisions, salvage, and freight questions. The United States is, of course, the biggest ship-owning state in the world, and it is interesting to know that even in the U. S. this matter of the almost complete immunity of state-owned ships from the legal proceedings or penalties to which privately-owned vessels are subjected is being viewed in a spirit of frankness. One of the most influential shipping journals in the U. S. the "Nautical Gazette," readily admits that that country was placed in an embarrassing position at the Conference when the question of this immunity was raised. A Shipping Board representative, who was present at the Conference as an observer, and not as a delegate, pointed out that the Board declared early last year that it would not claim immunity for its ships; but (to quote our contemporary) "it must have been humiliating for him to realize that the delegates had fresh in their minds the case, only a few weeks old, of an Argentine company which sued the Shipping Board for the recovery of overpaid freight and the Board, knowing the weakness of its position, took refuge behind the claim for immunity which the courts had no option but to concede." It may be pointed out that although the U. S. Shipping Board did issue a declaration of its intention to waive immunity, such immunity would be waived only in cases where the claim was for less than $3,000. After referring to this, the "Nautical Gazette" concludes by saying that "whatever virtue there may be in such a policy of waiving immunity is nullified by the $3,000 limitation, for shipowners and shippers are not likely to start suit when only such a small amount is recoverable and where immunity claim is likely to be advanced where a greater amount is in dispute." "It is lamentable," concludes our contemporary, "to see a representative of the United States placed in such a position before the leading shipowners of the world, and the sooner the Board adopts real business methods in its operations the sooner will American ships be able to command respect on the ocean highways of the world."

THE MILL-HANDS

Shall we wander in our dreaming
As the evening hooter booms,
To the gates where they come streaming
From the carding-rooms and looms?
Shall we watch them as they scatter
When their daily toil is done?
Listen to their noisy chatter
As they seek the rest begun?

See the watchmen in their turbans
As they check them through the gate,
Where they pour from the perturbance
Which the wheels of Fate create?
See some kiddie. . . a mere minor,
With her basket on her wrist?
Know, that cruel laws confine her
To a daily grind for grist?

Shall we pause to hear them haggle
With the barrow coolies, there;
Ev'ry loud-pitched tongue a-waggle
To obtain a squarer fare?
For his "silver," they cry "copper."
For his "coppers," proffer less
Or disgusted with his offers
Leave him to his farelessness.

Note! How well they cloak their feeling
Strolling off along the street?
Not a vestige of appealing
At what seems a neat defeat?
For they know that soon, relenting,
They will hear his urgent voice
Calling out to them, consenting
To the bargain of their choice.

See! Now all is smiles and laughter
As they clamber up to ride,
Mother, grandma, aunt and daughter
Joking, jostling, side by side.
And the coolie joins in concord;
And the barrow squeals in glee;
As they rattle gladly homeward
To a fond squalidity.

Thus, we leave them lest we foster
Thoughts that can but fail to please,
Lest we linger having lost the
Dear securities of ease.
Shall we wave them to their seeking
For some hovel with its dirt,
Quite contented if its reeking
Leaves our household without hurt?

F. W. H., Shanghai.

THE destruction of the Peking roads through the laying of the tram lines on the main streets has now reached a point where serious action is required. The heavy rains have washed away great quantities of the stonefacing of the roads and left the steel-rails in the air, so to speak, which is very dangerous to traffic. It is also felt that a rigid inspection by independent experts of the cement standards carrying the power cables should be made before cars are allowed to run, as otherwise there may be tragedies from the breaking of the wires which have had no independent inspection or test since their erection.

A Canton despatch to Peking tells of the difficulty that has arisen over the premises formerly occupied by the Russian Consulate in the British Concession of Shameen. When the Soviets desired to take it over along with the consulates elsewhere in China, the fact came out that it had been forfeited to the municipality for the failure to pay back rates and taxes. The property is now rented to a French concern and it is not seen how it can be handed back to Russia. The question is further complicated by the fact that the Canton authorities fail to recognize the Sino-Russian Agreement signed in Peking whereby Russian State property was to be returned.

NEWS FROM THE OUTPORTS

SIEGE OF KUEILIN RAISED

How News of the Armistice Reached Beleaguered City: Famine Narrowly Averted: Wily Defenders' Safeguards Against Southern Treachery After Truce

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

The last chapter of the story of the heroic defence of Kueilin by Marshal Lu Yung-ting against the Southern mercenary, Gen. Shen Hung-ying, is told by our own correspondent. News of the armistice on June 26 has already been announced by Reuter, but the following also tells of the rescue, by our correspondent, of Mr. E. H. Carne from bandit hands. Mr. Carne and four other missionaries left Wuchow in the hospital launch Roanoke in the hope of evacuating the besieged foreigners. The party were captured by bandits. Messrs. Jaffray and Miller were released to negotiate for ransom money. Mr. Ray subsequently escaped. Mr. Carne had the misfortune to remain a prisoner for several weeks, until upon the arrival of our correspondent at Chaoping, following the conclusion of hostilities at Kueilin, he himself negotiated for the missionary's release and endured innumerable hardships in proceeding with the party carrying the ransom money to the mountain stronghold where Mr. Carne remained a prisoner. He was so ill that he expected to die.

Kueilin, Si., June 24.

It is now 75 days since the city was besieged. At that time it was stated that there was enough rice on hand to feed the populace and the soldiers for about 30 days. After the first month had passed the city granaries were opened and rice that had been stored for years, some of which was mouldy and mildewed, was sold at a fair price to all those who could afford to buy, while congee kitchens and free rice depôts were opened here and there throughout the city. These places have been thronged daily by the city's poor. At present fully 10,000 men women and children, hungry, gaunt and starving line the streets daily waiting for their scant allowance. The rice supply in the city is almost exhausted, and only two ounces daily per person is now being distributed to the destitute.

Reports of numbers dying from starvation are current, though they seem exagerated.

Truce Called.

June 26.

On Tuesday proclamations issued by Marshal Lu announced that an armistice had been arranged and fighting was to cease at noon to-day. The news came at a time when it was least expected. The shortage of food in the city was driving the people to desperation and rice riots were being feared, while the heavy rains and swollen streams were holding back the relieving forces expected from Hunan. It looked as if the outer forces were slowly gaining the advantage, but at noon on Tuesday the old cannon ceased to fire and at 11 o'clock on Wednesday morning the last rifle shot was heard.

Soon the besieging forces stationed in the surrounding villages who had placed a tight cordon around the city for 77 days began to withdraw, while their companions stationed nearer the city fell into friendly conversation with the soldiers on the wall. On Thursday morning before daylight these also retired. Shortly after when pedestrians were permitted to ascend the wall and look over, what a picture of indescribable desolation met their gaze. The whole section of the city skirting the walls was a mass of ruins. Here and there a huge pile of broken brick and charred timbers was all that was left of what a month ago was as a prosperous store or a thriving godown. Near the place where the wall had been blown up a large mass of stone and mingled débris from which emitted a deadly stench marked the spot where on the morning of the explosion two score of the storming squad were buried by the falling wall.

Prospects for the return of peace and prosperity seemed bright and hopes ran high when suddenly a change was noticed Marshal Lu accompanied by his bodyguard and a few officers came out in person on a visit of inspection. The old Marshal seemed to be distrustful of the tactics of his shrewd enemy, for at once orders were given that the breach in the wall should be better fortified and strongly guarded, while new stone barriers were ordered to be erected across the street outside of the city wall, and soldiers were sent out to occupy strategic points. Buildings near the wall which Gen. Shen's soldiers had occupied and used from which to launch attacks on the city were put to the torch and completely gutted and thus rendered useless for further operations. The big field gun which for the past weeks had shelled the enemy positions was also taken out at dusk and placed ready for action.

These war-like preparations were not at all comforting to a war-weary populace and many of the well-to-do classes began to leave the city fearing further fighting was to take place. Quietness however still prevails, though there is a feeling abroad of uncertainty and fear. The troops of Gen. Shen have retired on all fronts a distance of 30 to 60 li away from the city and are now resting on their arms evidently hoping that Marshal Lu will evacuate the city and leave it to them for their future camping ground. But the old warlord has no thought of leaving the city which he has so ably defended for the past 77 days. The time is being spent in better preparing himself against a further attack, and in looking for the Hunan re-inforcements which have been expected for so long.

The Rev. Mr. Carne's Rescue

Later.

We were besieged for 77 days. For 50 days we did not take our clothes off save to bath, and then dressed again immediately ready for any emergency. Letter carriers were not permitted to enter the city, and for over 80 days we did not hear from our friends in the outside world. Our outgoing letters too were detained, until friends became alarmed.

A few days after the siege was lifted we were permitted to leave the city and start for Wuchow by native boat. When we reached Chaoping the place near where the kidnapping of the missionaries on the Roanoke had taken place we learned through a messenger that had just come out from the mountain that Mr. Carne, the remaining captive, had been suffering from fever for about a week; that he had not eaten food for two days and was so weak he could not rise from his bed. I therefore addressed myself to both civil and military officials and told them I must go into the mountains to the rescue of Mr. Carne and take with me medicine and food. I could not leave a fellow worker alone in the condition in which Mr. Carne was at that time, and urged the officials to at once supply the $4,000 ransom money which the robbers were demanding for his release.

Guns for the Robbers in Lieu of Cash.

I also told them it would complicate matters considerably should Mr. Crane die while held a captive in the mountains. I think the real delay was that the officials were secretely hoping that the Mission would put up part of the ransom money and therefore they were holding off and quietly waiting. However, they saw I was determined to enter the mountains in person. The officials immediately called a meeting of the Chamber of Commerce, Self-Government Association, and various guilds in the city as well as village elders, and most of the money was forthcoming within 12 hours. The balance was made up of guns and automatics which were sent in to the robbers as security for the balance of the money which was to be paid over within two weeks.

In speaking to the officials they showed me a letter written by the robbers in which they stated their willingness to release Mr. Crane if the ransom money was forthcoming, and naming two men in Chaoping whom they were willing to meet at a stated place in the mountains and talk over details. This letter I secured and still have in my possession. I therefore secured these two men and with coolies carrying the ransom money and a chair to carry Mr. Carne back, I started for the mountains. I also sent two small boats up the Fu river and the little Su-Hsing river that joins the Fu on the east some 15 li above the city. These boats went away inland to the nearest point to the robber rendezvous and waited there until Mr. Carne was carried out.

Departure for Bandit Stronghold

We left Chaoping on Saturday afternoon, July 5, and tramped until nearly midnight, up mountains, across valleys, through the long grass, wading, fording, climbing, slipping, sliding, falling. Our little torches went out occasionally and left us in the darkness, while the torrential rains soaked us to the skin, and the swollen mountain streams at times were too deep to cross over. We lost our path once or twice, and eventually when we neared the robber haunts we had to secure a guide to lead us to the place where the brigands had congregated. We found the robbers in a small village. Every house and hut seemed full of them, and the largest mud dwelling where the robber chiefs were gathered with their men must have contained 100 bandits, armed to the teeth and ready for action. They had been notified 20 minutes before by a runner that I was approaching, unarmed, and coming in with medicine and food for Mr. Carne, and that silver for his release was following in the rear. Three of us arrived at the village together, and the first sound of our approach called forth a savage yell from half a dozen robber throats, but I marched right in among them as if I had the whole British Army behind me, and asked them if Mr. Carne was dead or alive. They said he was alive but ill, that it had been difficult for them to secure suitable food and that in consequence Mr. Carne was not well.

The robbers said Mr. Carne's condition was worse because he was melancholy. They said they had captured four missionaries, but two had been let go and the third escaped, and this had left Mr. Carne alone: and they said that under these conditions anyone would feel dejected. Mr. Carne was held under guard in a lone hut near the summit of a huge mountain further inland and although it was midnight and I was drenched to the skin, and the rain was still falling in torrents, I asked to be taken in to him at once so that I could look after him. This request the robbers refused as they said his condition was not sufficiently serious. As the money had not yet arrived nor the guns handed over, I must stay there until the morning. I asked therefore for a change of dry clothing which was promptly given me though it seemed difficult to get clothing that was large enough for me to wear.

Brigand for Bed Follow.

I had not had anything to eat since noon the day before, but I was tired and had too much on my mind to think of eating and so lay down on the proffered bedboards without blanket or covering. My underwear that I had not changed was soaking wet and as there was nothing but the heat of the body to dry it. I caught cold from which I am still suffering. A robber very kindly lay down on the bed with me with his cartridge belt, crammed with ammunition buckled round him ready for action. The cold cartridges poked me in the back or ribs every time we turned in bed. He was kind however, and we fell into conversation, and as we talked he fanned away the musquitoes that were bothering us badly.

Free at Last.

The next morning when the money had been divided and the guns handed over and examined I was permitted to start out to meet Mr. Carne, one of the men going along to act as guide. I met Mr. Carne being carried out accompanied by a robber escort. He looked weak and haggard. The long days of fever had told severely on him so that he clothing was soiled, his socks were worn to shreds, his hair and beard was long and dishevelled, and he showed plainly that he had been a captive for six weeks. He said a few days previously he felt so weak and hopeless that he feared he would die in the mountains and he had then prepared some parting tokens which he had hoped would be found by friends after he had passed away. However, the very sight of another white face among the desolate hills and the glad news that he was to be set free and carried out to civilization, soon brought cheer to his heart and smiles to his careworn face.

We returned to the robber headquarters and bade them good-bye. We reached Chaoping the same evening and the day after started for Wuchow where our arrival a day later brought joy and rejoincing to the many loved ones who for many weeks had been praying and longing for our safe arrival.

BANDIT RISING IN WEST CENTRAL ANHUI

The Big Sword Secret Society and Its Hold on Liuanchow: Soldiers Demoralized by Supposed Bullet Proof Nature of Insurgents

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

Luchowfu, An, July 17.

A rather serious bandit uprising causing a vast amount of alarm to the neighbouring towns and cities has occurred at Liuanchow in West Central Anhui. At the time of writing that city is held by the bandits in spite of attacks by several thousand soldiers. It is reported here, at Luchowfu, that the city of Liuanchow has not been looted, and that the foreigners there are well treated by the bandits. Great alarm was manifested in the city of Luchowfu when the bandits were reported as successfully fighting the soldiers and advancing toward this city. A general exodus from the city took place for one or two days assuming the proportions of a panic. It was somewhat of a novelty to see a city of 70,000 people in a panic, and with thousands forsaking their homes and property at the reported advance of a few hundred bandits.

Some of the foreigners who make their homes at Luchowfu had already gone on their summer vacation. Of those left several had prevously planned to leave at the time the alarm was at its height. Owing to the excessive crush on the boats and the exorbitant prices charged as a result of the desire of so many to excape, the foreigners delayed departure. We had a few days of excitement when the bandits were reported to be nearing the city, but by remaining quietly at work were able to persuade the Christian Chinese that it was not a time for panic. Plans were laid to aid the hospital in any way possible in case the fighting should come this way.

Big Sword and Red Sword.

The story of the rising as gathered from the civil officials here runs somewhat as follows.

Some weeks ago a branch of the secret society known as the "Big Sword Society" became too active in opposition to some government officials and after an examination of one of the members of the society two soldiers were sent to the village causing the trouble. The soldiers were badly man-handled and the authorities decided to surround the village and punish the leaders. These leaders escaped and gathering their followers together held the soldiers at bay. They then set out to raise a revolt for they claimed that they were going to protect the people from mistreatment by the military officials. The city of Liuanchow was on guard against an attack from the group for some days, but failed properly to guard one point in the walls at which the bandits entered the city. They took control of the city government but apparently very little looting was done. Another secret society is reported to have joined the revolters. This organization is known as the "Red Sword Society" and its members are reported to be more disorderly than are those of the "Big Sword Society."

The movement is being carried out by working men, the leader being reported to be a man by the name of Shy-siao-san. The members are very superstious, burning incense and carrying charms when going into battle. They believe their charms can stop the soldier's bullets and hence are brave and somewhat fanatical, while the soldiers are reported to be rather demoralized when facing them. As to the number of these so-called bandits it is hard to say. They called for 60 or 70 tables when given a feast after capturing Liuanchow, thus indicating about 500 men at that time. Many more are said to have been aiding them since their successes have been achieved.

Panic at Luchowfu.

For a few days the movement was such a success that people here at Luchowfu feared a rising within the city as well as an attack from without; this led to a hurried exit on the part of thousands who escaped to the country or to Wuhu out of danger.

The bandits have been attacked by various groups of soldiers. Magistrate Yuen of Luchowfu has played a conspicuous part in striving to put down the rising. The local military commander is reported to have refused to take out the soldiers under his command, giving as his excust the non-payment of the soldiers. Magistrate Yuen, in spite of the fact that he is civil magistrate, and although he has no considerable number of soldiers in his command, took his own body-guard out and courageously sought to settle the bold disturbers of the peace. This is not the first time that Magistrate Yuen has shown himself vigorous in suppressing disorder and in administering the laws effectively. In fact this capable magistrate has proved a strong and able administrator, just the kind of man that could save China to-day.

Negotiations in Train.

At the time of writing representatives of the bandits are in this city to talk peace with the officials. They demand that they shall not be punished for their attack on the peace of the community, as the price of their surrender. The Anhui military governor is reported to have offered pardon to all who now withdraw from association with the bandits.

Yesterday, July 16, a somewhat extensive attack was made upon the bandits by various groups of soldiers. A number of soldiers are reported killed and no great gains made.

So far as this city is concerned business is utterly disorganized and while excitement has subsided very few people are returning yet and the streets have a strangely deserted appearance.

THE CHINA CONSORTIUM

Renewal in Perpetuity Approved by British Government

London, July 23.

In the House of Commons to-day, replying to Mr. D. G. Somerville (Conservative), Mr. Arthur Ponsonby, Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, said that the Government approved the recommendation of the Advisory Council of the China Consortium in favour of renewal in perpetuity, subject to the right of any group to withdraw at 12 months' notice. He had reason to believe that the recommendation would be approved by the groups.—Reuter.

All American Missionaries Now Out of City

Peking, July 16.

An American telegram reports that all the American missionaries have now left Kueilin with the exception of the Rev. Robert L. Bauson and his mother, who remained of their own accord.

Another telegram says that an unconfirmed report states that the British missionary, Mr. E. H. Carne, has been released. Mr. Carne was the only one still in the hands of the bandits of the four British and American missionaries who set out from Wuchow to make inquiries regarding the missionaries at Kueilin.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

IT is persistently reported in Peking papers that the boy Emperor is about to depart on a tour in Europe. The latest rumour is that he has been for two days closeted with Mr. Johnston in the latter's house in the Yao Chi-hutung working out a plan to facilitate his departure abroad on which his heart is set.

THE BLESSINGS OF A REPUBLICAN CONSTITUTION IN KUANGSI

A Province the Prey of Any General with Troops Enough to Down a Rival

From a Correspondent.

It would be almost impossible, and a sheer waste of time to try to sort out the characters in this story. But the picture is worth consideration as a specimen of what China has come to be under a republic.

Nanning, Si., July 1.

The last half year has been a time of much anxiety in Kuangsi. The year opened with a hope that the old Marshal Lu Yung-ting would again extend his control over the whole province, and that we should at last have peace. Nanning was his, and all the North and West of the province. The West River commanders were thought to be not unfavourable to his cause, and there remained only Wuchow with its part-Cantonese garrison, and the district round Kueilin, which General Shen Hung-ying has always looked on as his special domain. Marshal Lu went in person to Kueilin and thence into southern Hunan in an attempt to come to an arrangement with Ma Tsai, and get some material help from Wu Pei-fu to round off his plans of unification. But no satisfactory issue came of his expedition, and his return to Kuangsi saw Shen Hung-ying in the field in force—supported it was generally thought by aid from Dr Sun. Lu and his fighting general Hon Choy-fung were shut up within the walls of Kueilin. The siege was closely pressed, and Shen was able at the same time to spare strong detachments to march on Laochow, to meet all the forces which the news of Lu's misfortune brought hurrying from Nanning. Nanning itself and the Paaksik and Lungchow rivers were almost denuded of troops.

Yunnan Robbers' Opportunity.

There was general anxiety, as it was realized that if the robbers chose to seize this opportunity to come out, there was nothing to prevent them looting at will. Towards the end of May these fears were realized, and Paaksik, the centre of an immense opium trade, was occupied for some days by strong bands of robbers who appeared from the mountains on the Yunnan frontier. General Lao Wa-tong hurried back from Nanning at once, and the robbers fled before him: but not without taking off with them goodly booty in silver and opium, amounting it is generally agreed, to quite a million dollars.

Meanwhile bad news came from Laochow. The Kueilin relieving force under Lu Fu-cheng and Tang Ho-ming were defeated and divided by Shen Hung-ying. Tang retreated towards the Red River, and Lu fell back towards Nanning. Small detachments of the latter's defeated troops appeared in Nanning, hungry and much the worse for wear. These troops and about 300 men under Pai-Shap-i, in whom then no one put much faith, were all that were left to defend the city, and the merchants felt very uneasy about the future.

Then suddenly a new factor appeared in the situation. General Wong Shiu-hung of Wuchow, forced it appears by pressure from Canton, conspired with General Lei Chung-yan who occupied the middle west River district (Kuaiping and Kuai-yuen), to attack and occupy Nanning. We had heard rumours of such a move in Nanning for some time but no one took them very seriously till the morning of June 23, when it was generally reported that the invaders in force had reached Wangchow, only a little more than a day's journey from Nanning.

A Panic Almost Laughable.

At once a panic that was almost comical in its intensity seized the city. No fighting was anticipated, and the prospect of a change of government caused no alarm: but it was thought very likely that the medley of troops in the city would take the opportunity to loot before making good their escape. One amusing incident occurred which shows well how great was the panic A coolie in the Muk Hong Kaai slipped on the wet paving stones and fell with a clatter. The nearest shops at once closed their doors with a bang, and immediately the sound of doors hurriedly closed swept like a feu de joie along three successive streets.

Fortunately these fears were not justified, and the situation arranged itself with really marvellous simplicity. The Chamber of Commerce held a meeting, and decided to send a message down to Lei and Wong, inviting them to take charge of the city. The soldiers of Lu's party left for Lungchow, the sting of defeat somewhat eased by a gift of $30,000 from the Special Tax (i.e. Opium Tax) Bureau. Pai Shap-i remained in the city to keep order during the interregnum, and on the morning of June 26, with much blowing of trumpets and flapping of banners, the invaders entered the city and took possession. Not a shot was fired, not a shop looted: there was not even a non-combatant killed. Later in the day Pai Shap-i, also handsomely rewarded for his help, crossed the river, presumably on his way to join his chief Lam Tsun-ting in the Limchow area. Never surely was conquest more admirably arranged.

Harmony As Yet.

Future events no one dares to predict: there are theories and rumours by the score, and it would require a capable mathematician to calculate all the possible combinations. The new rulers in Nanning Lei Chung-yan and Wong Shiu-hung are apparently working in complete harmony. They studiously refrain from usurping any official title, and though Dr. Sun is known to have been behind the movement, not one of his flags has appeared on any of the launches bringing up troops. The nominal Military Governor is still a soldierless general Chan Kwan-pui, who was left here as the representative of Lam Tsun-ting, the titular Tsung Sz-ling. Shen Hung-ying though victorious is apparently making no effort to push on to Nanning, and it looks as if the present holders of Nanning are prepared to resist his advance if necessary. General Wong is reported to have some thousand troops between here and Laochow. Luk Fu-cheung is at Moming (90 li north of Nanning) with a force at least 2,000 strong The old Marshal Lu himself is still very much alive in Kueilin, and there are persistent rumours of the appearance of Ma Tsai with large forces on the Hunan frontier. Let him read the riddle of all this who can. Meanwhile all that can be said is that whatever the intentions of the present rulers of Nanning, they have begun well and have earned many good wishes by their moderation in their first venture.

MUTINY OF SCOUTS IN THE PHILIPPINES

Ringleaders and 238 Minor Offenders to be Tried by Court-martial

Manila, July 18.

The Army will try by court-martial 15 of the ringleaders in the strike at Fort McKinley on a charge of causing a mutiny and 238 others of the Scouts on a charge of joining the mutiny. The maximum penalty is death, but this is not inflicted in time of peace and the probabilities are that the leaders will get long prison terms.

The trial of the 238 minor offenders will be en masse and will be, it is said, the largest court-martial in the history of the American Army. The trial will open on July 25.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

TIBETAN BORDER ANXIETIES

The Strong Hand Removed And What Now? Central Asia's Richest City to Win

From Our Own Correspondent.

Tachienlu, Sze., June 30.

Chen Hsia-lin, the border commissioner, left the Tibetan Frontier one week ago to-day. In more than one sense it has been a very anxious week. What will happen, what can happen, what must happen, and strange to say, so far, nothing in particular has happened. The first alarm came in this way. Two days after Chen left a number of Tibetans gave chase with the object it was stated of bringing the Commissioner back to the Border. Chen, to all intents and purposes, had finally left the frontier; in fact had said good-bye. To come back again, it was maintained, meant nothing but disaster to the city and border. It was some relief to discover the following day that the Commissioner's third wife had borne him a son and that the chasing Tibetans were conveying the good news.

The next alarm. General Lan's men had crossed the Tung and were approaching Tachienlu by the Ya Ja Gen. People with wealth immediately sought a safe depository for their earthly goods. The Chinese merchants passed several sleepless nights, but nothing untoward happened and now we have news to-day of the impending arrival of Sen Chao-lan, who is on his way to arrange peace between the opposing forces. He has apparently been successful so far and there is now every prospect of an immediate and peaceful settlement.

A Mighty Emporium.

Commercially, peace must come and come very soon. Should the present chaotic military situation continue, hindering as it does, import and export trade, business will and must seek some other avenue, and Tachienlu may one day find, through no fault of its own, that the Tibetan trade is going to India or Russia or out through Kansu or Yunnan. At present this Chinese city is perhaps the greatest trade emporium in central Asia. Caravans of 500 and 1,000 animals continually leave this town for the far interior of Tibet.

Tibetan merchants can understand some things—Chinese puzzles are an exception—but this present internecine warfare, its duration, purpose, and outcome, are entirely beyond their comprehension. We hear the province is preparing for another friendly feud. The Lius are all in it and personally fighting for the unification of this great populous, wealthy, turbulent province. The high snow mountains of Tibet cast their long shadows over Szechuan. From those rugged mountain heights the placid lama, the woolly nomad, the patient merchant, look down on a scene of hopeless warfare, senseless carnage, useless bloodshed, and he knits his brows and asks, "What is it all about? when will it stop? who will win? will it help trade? who pays the bill?"

While he muses on these different questions he finds his indispensable tea getting shorter and shorter and then, to our horror we discover, that the lama-nomad-merchant's interest in Szechuan's fighting forces is personal and selfish. He can do without some things, not without tea. The lama simply can't pray minus tea. He can scoff scornfully at the sweetening influence of the society of ladies, but he meekly bows before his Chinese tea. The nomad will wear anything and sleep anywhere provided he does it on a bundle of Chinese tea. The merchant will travel over the mountains of Asia to purchase a caravan of Chinese tea. There are Tibetan merchants in town just now who have come from the Indian frontier to the Chinese border to buy tea and there is none in town. The Chinese merchants are smoking a lot of tobacco and the Tibetan traders are snuffing a lot of snuff, but this somehow fails to open the road or clear up the political-military situation. Micawber, with all his patience and his propensity for waiting and his weakness for punch would assuredly have gone mad long ere this.

Despotism for Peace.

Chen Hsia-lin has gone and his going may mean the opening up of the road to China and the opening up of Chinese trade. The Border administration may now pass automatically from the hands of the Hunanese to that of the Szechuanese. Chen's long regime on the frontier has in many ways been a time of peace and prosperity. New roads have been built and old roads have been widened. An absolutely, perhaps ruthless rule has dominated the border and Chen has at times acted unwisely, but on the whole, the merchants, Tibetan and Chinese, have laboured under no misapprehension regarding Chen's position and authority. We have this somewhat despotic general to thank for eight years of comparative peace and quietness.

FOREIGNERS RESPECTED BY SZECHUAN BANDITS

Escort Frightened to Retrace Steps Alone for Fear of Losing Rifles

From Our Own Correspondent.

Mienchow, Sze., July 2.

Things are now what we in West China call "quiet." You can travel—with a big escort. A bevy of schoolgirls going home recently reached their destination within all but a few li; but as the remainder of the journey was dangerous they were given an escort who charged the girls 600 cash, rather a large sum if you are schoolgirl.

The Consul-General has given instructions that all travellers must procure an escort, and so like loyal British subjects we all obey.

Not long ago a traveller found it necessary to go from Anhsien to Chongba; and so he asked for the privilege of an escort. The authorities provided him with a dozen men carrying rifles. Just before they came to Hsiangshui they reached the bandit region. From the tops of the hills the brigands hailed them, "Hi! you there! Who are you? Stop!"

"It's So and So going to Chongha," shouted back the escort. There was a halt of five minutes while the information was passed up to headquarters, after which permission was given to pass on.

"Now," said the traveller, "we are safely through you may all go back." There was consternation in the ranks. "We can't go back; we are going to take you to Chongba." "But this road is quite safe, you need not come." "We must, look at these (pointing to their rifles). If we go back the bandits will take them." So on they went to Chongba, and returned in due course with the foreigner who really turned out to be the escort.

BOLSHEVIST GAMES IN CHINA

The Attempt to Grab Seniority by Making Soviet Envoy an Ambassador

London, July 19.

With reference to recent Sino-Russian diplomacy, "The Times" points out that the position of Doyen of the Diplomatic Corps in Peking is likely to hold other than honorific significance and asks whether the Powers can acquiesce in the devolution of such responsible and delicate functions upon M. Karakhan, who, the paper asserts, is openly exciting Chinese hostility toward the Treaty Powers.

"The Times" describes the recent events as "familiar Bolshevist methods."

In conclusion, the journal declares that the Chinese are provoking Japan — although the unrepentant author of the Twenty-One Demands has just become Prime Minister—by intensifying the boycott of Japanese trade. They have requested the Powers to discuss the increase of Customs duties promised at Washington without a pretence of having fulfilled the conditions on which the promise was made. The answer has disappointed them and the conference with the Bolshevists in which the application of the agreement is to be worked out in detail, seems likely to disappoint them again.—Reuter.

SIDE FIGHTS IN CANTON

Dr. Sun's Men Fall Out Among Themselves for the Spoils of Office

From a Correspondent.

Canton, July 14.

Many parts of Kuangtung were subjected to guerilla warfare the last few days. Aside from battles in the southern districts in Yenping and Hoiping, where Dr. Sun Yat-sen's troops suffered a reverse at the beginning, fighting among nominal followers of Dr. Sun themselves has also taken place. In Kaukong, a West River town, Dr. Sun's mercenaries, one faction led by Pao Wing-kwong and another led by Ng Sam-king, fought for the privilege of controlling the gambling and opium traffics there. So far they have only made trouble outside the town, and the Merchants Volunteers of the town and those from the neighbourhood have been watching the situation and the populace to prevent lootings from these bandit-troops.

In Kuangling, the retiring magistrate was leading 700 to 800 of his former troops against his successor, a Dr. Sun's appointee who had sought to occupy the post without first taking into account of the funds his predecessor had been advancing from his own pocket to run the district government.

In Yingtak and Tsangshin, the mercenaries from Yunnan and Hunan last week succeeded in ousting magistrates appointed by Dr. Sun's civil governor. In Shuntak, however, Dr. Sun did not lose face. His men sent to defend that district arrived at Yungkei and Kueichow amid the welcome of the town guards and inhabitants there. Districts along the West River above Shiuhing were not altogether favourable to Dr. Sun when last heard from, and some of General Chen Chiung-ming's men arrived at Loting. Dr. Sun despatched troops from Shiuhing up the West River late last week. Report has been current in Canton the last few days that more Hunanese mercenaries were coming to reinforce Dr. Sun in Kuangtung.

PROSPECTS OF PEACE IN KUANGSI

Terms of Settlement Being Discussed: Arrangement of a Neutral Zone

Peking, July 21.

The peace negotiations between Generals Shen Hung-ying and Lu Yung-ting, following the withdrawal of the former's troops from the siege of Kueilin, are making satisfactory progress, according to information obtained from military quarters in Peking. The withdrawal of Gen. Shen's troops was the result of mediation on the part of Gen. Ma Chi, Marshal Wu Pei-fu's special representative in Kuangsi. Most of Gen. Shen's command are at Hsingan and Kuangyang, while Gen. Tung Yao-wen has been sent to Chuanchow to meet Gen. Lu's delegates and discuss terms of settlement, including the immediate arrangement of a neutral zone between the two forces pending a final agreement.

Gen. Chang Teh-cheng, Chief of the Kiangsi Yichun troops, who returned to Honan a few months ago, has now gone back to Kiangsi and is established at Tayuliang in accordance with instructions from Marshal Wu Pei-fu.

Gen. Sun Chuan-fang, Tupan of the Fukien-Kuangtung border, has asked the Central Government to place Gen. Chang and the Yichun troops under his command in the event of Gen. Sun being instructed to move into Kuangtung.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Tokio, July 18.

As the supplementary budget for Y. 266,000,000 has passed the extraordinary session of the Imperial Diet, the total budget for the 13th fiscal year of Taisho (1924-25), amounts to over Y. 1,704,000,000 of which the expenditure on the restoration of the Imperial Capital of Tokyo is over Y. 255,000,000.—Eastern News Agency.

A RED AMBASSADOR TO CHINA

Diplomatic Body Not Excited: Japan Most Interested But Unlikely to Take Action

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Peking, July 17.

Now that it is definitely established that Mr. Karakhan is to be the first Ambassador to China, everybody is wondering what will happen next. Does Mr. Karakhan claim the deanship of the Diplomatic Corps on the grounds of diplomatic usage? How does the Diplomatic Corps regard this contingency? Will Japan follow the Soviet example? What is to become of the concert of the Diplomatic Corps? These and similar questions are being asked in Peking to-day.

It must first be understood that China, although undoubtedly pleased to disturb the diplomatic concert, has offered to exchange Ambassadors with all the leading nations represented in Peking. It can be taken for granted that Great Britain and America at least do not deem the time ripe to acquiesce in such a proposal. What of Japan, the country which is most closely concerned in the Soviet manœuvre? Japan has more interests tied up in the future of China than any other country, and cannot afford to regard this latest development in the international relations of China with anything but the liveliest curiosity. But such a change as China suggests to Japan depends altogether, as with other countries, on the attitude of the home government, and must be attended by the usual procedure of proposals relating to its foreign affairs. There is no ground for supposing that Japan will indulge in any acrobatic diplomatic feat such as was done at the new Albanian Court before the war—when there was an unseemly scramble for the deanship—to forestall the Soviet for the honour of having the first accredited Ambassador to China, notwithstanding the oft-repeated rumour that the Japanese Minister has Ambassadorial credentials in his pocket ready to be produced at a moment's notice in advance of Mr. Karakhan's. Mr. Yoshizawa would not now be on his way to Saghalien if that were so.

Importance of the Dean.

Not that the deanship of the Corps is unimportant to any country having dealings with China. It has in fact an importance peculiar to China. In no other country is so much responsibility vested in the dean. In no other country is there such a nicely-balanced concert among the Envoys. Whereas in most capitals, the honour merely gives the possessor certain rights of precedence on ceremonial occasions, and the privilege of paying compliments or condolences in the name of himself and his colleagues, in Peking the dean is on many occasions the instrument through which the Corps speaks on international affairs. As a result, he is brought very closely in touch with the Chinese Government.

It would be distinctly advantageous to Japan to have this honour, seeing that it would carry with it a status additional to that of Ambassador or Envoy. That she is showing no particular anxiety to make a bid for it presupposes in itself that Mr. Karakhan as full-fledged Ambassador will not be the doyen of the Corps.

There is every reason to presume that he will not make the effort. From quarters closely in touch with affairs at the Soviet Mission, I gather that Mr. Karakhan is not interesting himself in the question at all, and that he will not depart from this attitude. In view of his evident determination to do all he can to embarrass the Powers, this is rather surprising. To judge from his violent tirades against other countries, he is bent on helping China to wreck all her treaties with the "imperialistic Powers;" and it would seem to be the logical thing for him to be as truculent with the Legations as he is with the countries they represent.

Legations Not Worrying.

If by some wild stretch of the imagination it could be supposed that Mr. Karakhan was the doyen of the Corps Diplomatique, we should probably be introduced to some startling innovations. For one thing, the language of the Corps, which is mainly English, would have to be changed to Russian, not on the grounds that Russian is the only International language, but because Mr. Karakhan (it is said) speaks that language only! But before that happened the Corps would have reverted, except in the exigencies created by the peculiar status of the Legation Quarter, to the loosely-joined condition of the Corps of other capitals.

The reason why the Legations are not worrying themselves over Mr. Karakhan's status, however, is that with many of the Ministers he has no official status at all. Most of the Governments represented in the Quarter have not recognized Russia, and it is therefore idle to suppose that they could ally themselves with a Soviet Ambassador in any form of official discussion with China. It is doubtful, indeed, whether they could discuss as Envoys any matter pertaining to affairs in which their Governments are involved, even ceremonial matters.

Soviet's Peculiar Ways.

Apart from the question of the division of the nations in their attitude toward Russia, there is the issue involved in the Soviet's defiance of established international practice. The Soviet makes no distinction between an Ambassador and an Envoy Extraordinary, nor does it agree with the internationally-held view relating to the status of Consulates. According to Moscow's opinion, a Consulate should enjoy the same immunity from entry and seizure as a Legation, an illustration of which viewpoint was recently afforded in Berlin. When a country does not conform with practices which have prevailed over a century, that country must obviously be treated according to its own peculiar notions; and in the less important countries, individual action will undoubtedly take the place of collective representation in international affairs when the Soviet is admitted to the various Legation groups.

In regard to Peking, this will also apply eventually, except in respect of the Legation Quarter about which the Diplomatic Corps intends to secure the guarantees which held with the Tsarist Government and must hold with any successor calling itself the heir of former rights and privileges before the Soviet can be admitted to the Legation Quarter.

POLITICAL TROUBLES IN THE PHILIPPINES

Renewal of Campaign by Legislature Against Gov.-General Wood

Manila, July 24.

Secretary of the Interior Agoncillo, instructed by Governor-General Wood, has refused to obey a summons by the Senate to appear before it to explain why he had allowed Governor-General Wood "to encroach on the prerogatives of his Department." This action is expected to lead to renewal of non-cooperation between the Legislature and Governor-General Wood.

The prospects are for another long and bitter campaign by the Legislature and the vernacular Press against the Governor and American sovereignty.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

SERVANTS' STRIKE AT SHAMEEN

Passport Regulations to Keep out Bad Men: Agitators Controlling Strikers

Peking, July 16.

Consular reports from Canton throw further light on the walk-out of Chinese employees at Shameen.

It appears that the measures, which (presumably on account of the recent bomb outrage) the Shameen authorities have decided to adopt with the idea of imposing restrictions upon Chinese entering the Concession, have met with anything but a favourable reception from those they most nearly affect.

The new regulations, which are said to be the outcome of a conference between the French and British authorities, were adopted by the Shameen ratepayers at a general meeting, convened by the British Consul-General, and are to come into effect on August 1. They provide that every Chinese entering Shameen after 9 p.m. must show a passport to the police at the entrance to the Concession and this passport must be accompanied by a photograph of the person to whom the permit is issued.

Led, it is thought, by agitators eager to stir up trouble, the Chinese employed in Shameen, who would mostly be domestic servants and office workers, withdrew in a body at 6 o'clock last night by way of a protest against the restrictions.

July 17.

A telegram from Shameen reports that all the Chinese employees on Shameen had left the island. The strikers did not as a group approach the British and French authorities with any demand or make any notification of their intention to strike. At first the strikers were only employees of the British and French, but the others were forced by agitators and all had to join the movement.

The strikers stationed pickets at the two bridges leading to Shameen and are threatening that anyone who attempts to enter Shameen will be shot. Chinese purveyors of foodstuffs near Shameen have been compelled to cease taking supplies to the island. The only Chinese in Shameen on the 16th instant were the Municipal police and they were being threatened and it was believed that they would shortly leave.

Organizing Food Supplies.

On the 15th instant the British and French authorities formed three commissions to deal with the question of food supplies, transportation and cooking. A large amount of foodstuffs was due to land at Shameen from the British steamer Lianghsan on the 16th instant. Volunteers were being enrolled to attend to transportation. The Hotel Victoria was doing a large business as a restaurant.

The British and French men-of-war were giving valuable help in transportation work. For the moment no great inconvenience was being felt by residents of Shameen, but if the strike continued for any length of time, it was expected that the women and children would be taken to Hongkong.

Another telegram, also sent on July 16, says that all Chinese, including clerks, servants and police, struck work at 6 p.m. on June 15. Volunteer militia had been organized to assist the local authorities in maintaining order. It was impossible to estimate the probable duration of the strike, but it might last several weeks. The waterworks were being operated by volunteers. The electric light from the city was not interrupted. The mails were being delivered and food supplies were arriving from Hongkong.

The Strikers' Demands.

A Hongkong telegram to the Chinese Press reports that the strikers had made four demands on the British Consul-General if the latter wanted them to return to their work in Shameen; they were:—Abrogate the 12 new regulations; restore all Chinese employees to their former positions; no reduction of wages on account of the strike; and close the iron gates on both the East and West bridges at 12 midnight. On July 18, the British Consul-General sent his interpreter to inform Dr. C. C. Wu that all these demands could be accepted if the workmen would agree to fix the closing time of the two bridge gates at 11 p.m. as a precaution against the robber menace. The workmen at once agreed. As soon as a formal reply from the Consul-General was received, all strikers would return to their respective avocations; and the incident was expected to be closed on July 19. —Reuter's Pacific Service.

This message seems very open to doubt—Ed.

No Settlement Yet.

Shameen, July 19.

There is no settlement yet of the Shameen strike. Negotiations are proceeding slowly.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Business at a Standstill.

Peking, July 18.

The police at Shameen on the evening of July 18 joined in the strike, according to further foreign official telegrams. At the request of the British authorities Japanese volunteers are patrolling a section of the island. The number of strikers is now estimated at 1,200. The union of sampanmen has proclaimed a sympathetic strike, and other Chinese industries are expected to do likewise. Since July 16 all business at Shameen has ceased.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Agitators' Terrorism.

Canton, July 21.

It was hoped to see a solution of the strike after the interview between the municipal authorities and the strikers held last night. But the strikers still strongly insist on their demands and say they will continue they strike unless their requests are accepted. Thus nothing has been arranged after all.

The strikers are keeping a sharp watch on people who pass the entrance to the settlements of Shameen and prevent any Chinese from passing. Since the strike has begun, anyone found smuggling provisions into Shameen by sampan and selling them has been violently dealt with by the strikers.—Eastern News Agency.

Strikers' Ridiculous Demands.

Peking July 21.

Consular telgrams in regard to the negotiations now proceeding for a settlement of the Shameen strike report that the striker's demands include the rendition of the police administration of the Concession, the recall of the British Consul-General and the cancellation of the new restrictions upon Chinese entering after nightfall. The last mentioned demand seems to be regarded by the strikers as a sine qua non.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

4,000 WAITRESSES OF CANTON

Because Some Were Frail Must All Be Barred from Tea House Delights?

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

Canton, July 14.

The 4,000 or more waitresses in Canton who have just been deprived of their jobs by a police order forbidding their being employed in the tea-houses and restaurants will appeal to Mrs. Sun Yat-sen, wife of Dr. Sun, to use her influence in getting the prohibition lifted. The waitresses, while admitting that some of them have flirted with patrons of these public places, believe that the sin of a few should not cause all to suffering. They declare that waiting at table and pouring tea are a legitimate and pleasant form of employment for them and that many of them depend on their jobs for a living. Some waitresses receive as high as $35 a month as their wages, while a majority get about $21.

One of the reasons for stopping girls working in these public places has been the discovery of misconduct among them. That some teahouses are trying to get the prettiest girls possible to pour tea in order to improve their business, no one would deny; but members of the Women's Union in Canton regard the police order as too harsh. It is understood that Dr. Ng Chimoy, a woman physician and president of the Women's Union, Mrs. Liao Chung-hoi, wife of Governor Liao, as well as Mrs. Sun Yat-sen, will be appealed to by the waitresses. Reasonable persons in Canton expect that the order will be cancelled but that more rigid regulations may be made governing the relationship between the working girls and the patrons of the tea shops.

TELEGRAPH POLES SUBMERGED

And Houses Disappearing Hourly: Flood Devastation in Hunan

Some of the difficulties of travel during the floods around Chuchow (Hu.) are graphically described by a correspondent who found that what would ordinarily be a trip of a couple of hours on a slow train required four days and three nights for its completion on account of the high water. He writes as follows: I left Changsha North Station at 11 o'clock one morning, and reached I-chia-wan at one o'clock that afternoon. Here the train was held up and we were informed of the flooded tracks ahead. I called baggage coolies and walked 10 miles to a point called Peingosian, two miles from Chuchow. I noticed that the high water had risen over the track in two places during that walk, to a depth of about four inches, but when I came to Peingosian the water grew deeper and deeper until in the distance it coud be seen that the telegraph posts were half covered.

I spent the night at Peingosian and the next morning about ten o'clock walked three miles from this point to engage a sampan and rowed back in the sampan over the tracks. The baggage coolies and I started to row towards Chuchow, but were checked by a hill. We could not get the sampan into the Siangkiang because the current was too strong. We landed at four o'clock and walked to the Chuchow Custom House, which is situated on the top of a hill. My friends took me to a large boat to spend the night, for there was no way of making a journey at so late an hour and no information as to conditions in the direction of Pakuanpu on the Chuchow-Pinghsiang Railway, six miles from Chuchow.

Disappearing Houses.

The next morning at 11 o'clock the water level was 12 inches higher than the day before. The house tops at Chuchow were subsiding into the water as most of the walls were of mud. Only about 30 houses, and those on the hill, could be called intact. The boatmen were frightened as the rafts from up river came down stream rapidly. Some boats, mine among them, went astray as the ropes were broken, but my own was fortunately rescued by friends. By the courtesy of the resident officer I was able to spend the night at the Custom House. Reports began to arrive that trains were running from Pakuanpu, as one man had walked from there to Chuchow. The next morning I took a sampan to row to Chu-Tingpu, two miles beyond Chuchow. We passed over the tops of the telegraph poles, so that gives some idea of the flood level. After Chu-Ting-pu I walked, for the water ended at the tracks and after four miles came to Pakuanpu where we awaited the train which left for Pinghsiang at 8.30 p.m. The water continued for some time at flood level.

THE FLOODS IN NORTH CHINA

Peking in Danger of Flooding: Nanyuan Race Course Under Water: Many Houses in Chinese City Collapsed: Conservancy Bodies' Want of Clear Policy

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Peking, July 16

An Indian legend has it that the rain god uses a sieve, but the recent experiences of people residing in northern China would attribute an all-embracing bucket as the particular perquisite of the presiding genius of the rainfall. Rain, rain, rain—even our thoughts have been drenched in rain for the last eight days. There have been intermissions, it is true, but they have been comparatively so slight as to be almost unnoticeable. I am just taking advantage of one of these intervals, because it seems to have in it an atmosphere of liberation and normality.

Peking was startled three days ago by the report that the Yungting river, which converges with many other rivers, on Tientsin, was overflowing its dykes some eight miles southwest of the capital. It was prophesied that we should have a visitation similar to that of 1890, when six feet of water, it is said, covered the west part of Legation Street. Engineers, foreign and Chinese, hurried out to Marco Polo bridge, but the danger was found to be only in the terrified apprehensions of the villagers.

15 Inches in Eight Days.

Three days have passed since then, with rain accumulating in alarming volume in the low-lying sections of Peking and the southern environs of the city. At Nanyuan, which is growing into a residential district for foreigners, the race course is entirely under water, and all communication with Peking interrupted owing to the washing away of a considerable part of the road. In Peking itself, hundreds of Chinese houses in the Chinese city have collapsed, while inches and sometimes feet of water have gathered in the hutungs and in the courtyards of houses on the highest levels of Peking.

It is said that the average annual rainfall for Peking is 19.15 inches, but in the eight days ending yesterday we have had no less than 15 inches; and with the torrential rains last night and this morning, the record for the last nine days should approximate what one would expect for a whole year.

Tientsin Now Saved.

Tientsin has been worse off than Peking, and throughout yesterday foreigners in the capital were anxiously awaiting news from that city. Apparently, the threat of wholesale floods has been averted. The trouble in Tientsin has always been that it has to channel too much water to the sea, and engineers and others are again raising the question of the necessity for some scheme whereby the flood waters of the Yungting river could be diverted to the sea in a direct easterly direction, thus relieving the port of this extra pressure.

Lack of Co-operation.

But hitherto there has been a singular lack of co-operation among local conservancy organs in facing the problem of flood prevention in the metropolitan province. And this is not the only stumbling block. Apart from the money trouble, probably the biggest obstacle is the adamantine attitude of the people against the provision of any works which will relieve the situation. China is the land of small holdings, farmed by the poorest agricultural population in the world, and even were they guaranteed compensation for the flooding of their land, they are so close to the subsistence level that any change, especially a change bringing them into proximity to flood waters, rouses in them overwhelming fears for their livelihood. Many of the farmers in areas that would have to be canalized in any attempt to introduce a system of scientific flood prevention would give their lives rather than see any such works put up in their vicinity. It would be a repetition of the history of the introduction of railways to China.

Government Relief Measures.

Peking, July 16.

General Feng Yu-hsiang sent his pioneer corps to assist the railway and conservancy people in their efforts to meet the emergency. Attempts are being made to turn the flood waters into the Hsiaochingho.

The Tsaoho has also overflowed Kaopeitien. This is what caused suspension of the Peking-Hankow train service. In the western suburbs, in the vicinity of the Agricultural College at Lotochuang, the flood waters to-day are upwards of four feet in depth. Supplies of wood in stock at Papoushen have been swept away. Thousands of the poorer class dwellings have been severely damaged and hundreds of people are homeless. The Government is taking energetic measures to render relief and repair damage.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking's Allocation of Relief Funds

Peking, July 17.

A mandate says that the people of Chihli, Kiangsi, Fukien, Hunan and Chêkiang have suffered grievous loss of life and property owing to the recent floods. The Ministries of Finance and the Interior have been ordered to communicate telegraphically with the provincial authorities concerned with a view to immediate aid, for which purpose the Ministry of Finance will allocate the necessary funds.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Creditable Emergency Measures at Kalgan.

Peking, July 18.

A member of the staff of the British Legation, who was at Kalgan when the flood occurred, speaks in high terms of the measures taken by the Chinese there to cope with the emergency. The flood rose suddenly at about 4 a.m. and soon after daylight soldiers and police armed with rifles and bayonets were posted at intervals throughout the stricken area, with orders to prevent looting by shooting if necessary. People whose homes had been destroyed and who were unable to find a shelter and food elsewhere were quickly rounded up and placed in enclosures near the railway station, men on one side of the line and women and children on the other. These refugees passed through the railway gates in entering the enclosures and each person received two loaves of bread on entering. The Tutung and the Magistrate personally supervised the work of reconstruction, which was carried out quickly and efficiently.

It was estimated that a thousand people were drowned. Three hundred bodies were recovered lower down the river where dams formed barricades against the flood. A Chinese hotel and a Russian boarding house were swept clean away and the occupants drowned. At a police station with a tower the flood waters began to rise quickly and 11 of the 12 occupants hurried into the tower. The force of the water, however, caused the tower to fall and the 11 men were lost, the one who was unable to reach the tower only being saved.

People who were injured were taken to the Mission Hospital where they received quick attention.

Relief for Chihli Sufferers

Gen. Wang- Chen-ping, who has been in Peking for a few days making a report to the Government concerning the floods at Tientsin and other ports of Chihli province, returned to Tientsin this morning.

The Governor of the Metropolitan Area, the Commandant of the Peking Garrison and the Superintendent of Metropolitan Police have arranged to send three cars of foodstuffs to Fenghsan, the Western Tombs and the Western suburbs for the immediate relief of flood sufferers.

An emergency meeting of the exectutive committee of the China International Famine Relief Commission, held yesterday afternoon, decided to organize a national campaign throughout China in order to raise funds for the relief of the floodstricken areas, which include Kuangtung, Fukien, Hunan, Kiangsi and Chihli. Urgent telegrams have been sent to the affected districts and the Committee is gathering information as to the number of persons in need of relief and the condition of the crop

It is estimated by Mr. C. J. Todd, the Commission's Engineer, that in the Peking-Tientsin area alone there are something like 100,000 square miles under water.

The Commission is endeavouring to get the co-operation of the Chinese Red Cross Society and kindred organizations and it is hoped that the headquarters of the national "drive" for funds will be established in the Chinese Red Cross Building in Peking.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Hankow in Danger of Being Washed Out.

Hankow, July 18.

Hankow is threatened with flood owing to the abnormal rise of the river. During the night the river rose six inches, bringing the water over the bund.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Tientsin, July 18.

The flood water is receding. The authorities are optimistic. It is thought that the danger to Tientsin is over.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Tientsin Again in Danger

Tientsin, July 21.

The flood menace to Tientsin has returned owing to the fact that the flood waters west of Tientsin have now registered 22 feet. The danger is aggravated by the refusal of the Chinese authorities to cut the dyke of the Peiyunho so as to allow the flood waters to the sea north and south of Tientsin.

The local volunteer corps has been called out for to-night to patrol the concessions and dykes.—Reuter's Paclfic Service.

Further Floods in Hankow

Hankow, July 23.

The depth of water in the Yangtze here has already reached 47 feet and 7 inches with the consequence that all the foreign concessions have become flooded. Works for the protection against floods are now in progress and the water in the concessions is being pumped out day and night.—Eastern News Agency.

Famine Relief Commission's Investigations

Peking, July 20.

The head office of the China International Famine Relief Commission, which is carrying out an investigation to determine the severity and extent of flood distress, is in receipt of the following information:—

Metropolitan Area:—From personal investigation conducted by Mr. Liu Hsi-lien, member of the Metropolitan Committee of the Commission, the Yungtingho south dyke has suffered a third break between the two already reported, and the water is flowing through all three breaks. There are 1,200 refugees near the river. No reports are yet available of victims on the other side of the flood. In Liangshan alone 71 villages are flooded.

Reports from various sources, both Chinese and foreign, indicate serious flood to the East of Peking, particularly at Tungchow, Paoti, Shangho and Sanho, due to breaks in the dyke at Peiyunho. The greatest damage was probably in Tungchow where the water reached a height of seven to eight feet on level ground. At Paoti half of the district is under water. The break occurred at Shangho and Sanho. Shunyihsien and Wu Tsinghsien are also reported to be flooded.

Chihli:—In Chihli province outside the Metropolitan Area the worst disaster occurred at Kalgan. Five thousand refugees are reported to be in Kalgan city alone. All the grain shops were on low-lying ground and there is undoubtedly a food shortage in the city.

An agent of the Commission reports from Tinghsien that the Shaho overflowed its banks on July 13 at Hsinlihsien, resulting in flooding that hsien. Many villages were destroyed and thousands are homeless in that region.

The Tsumaho, to the south of Peking, is also in flood. The city of Chochow is entirely submerged, and Hsinchenghsien is also affected.

Fukien:—No fresh news as to conditions has been received from Foochow, but a wire from the Governor of the province has been received in which assistance is asked for.

Hunan:—According to Mr. H. C. Roberts, Secretary of the Hunan Committee of the Commission, who is now in Peking to report on conditions, the worst flood in the memory of natives has occurred in the south, central and northwest sections of the province, where several of the rivers rose simultaneously. Owing to the steep hills the water rushed on to the low regions with tremendous force, causing great damage to property and loss of life. The suffering is nearly general throughout the province, and the loss of the autumn crops will necessitate considerable relief in autumn and winter.

The Commission is taking steps to co-ordinate the work of all organizations of a national character in order to prevent overlapping and to assure early and adequate relief to sufferers.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

KUANGTUNG FLOODS

Local Canton Merchants Gift of $5,000 for Sufferers: Nanyang Bros. Relief Expedition

Mr. Chung Bing-hun presided at a meeting of Cantonese merchants held on July 16 to organize relief for flood victims in Kuangtung.

Mr. Chan (according to the Chinese press report) said that practically the whole of the old Kuangchow Prefecture was inundated. After giving a detailed account of the bursting of dykes, flooding of villages and the resultant suffering of the people, Mr. Chan informed the meeting that he had received telegrams from the Nanyang Bros. Tobacco Co. at Canton, stating that apart from contributing $5,000 to the relief funds and lending another $10,000 to the flood relief committee, formed by the Merchants' Volunteer Corps, the company had itself sent a relief expedition to the flood districts with $20,000 subscribed by the company and $20,000 by two of its directors.

The meeting in discussing the situation regretted that, while in 1915 many benevolent institutions could take independent measures of relief, the state of unrest at the present time made such private efforts impossible. The meeting, however, thought the Volunteer Corps was the best medium through which relief could reach the people in distress; and it finally voted the appropriation of $3,000 of the Association's funds to be remitted to the Canton Office of the Nanyang Bros. to supplement the company work. It is understood that the company's relief expedition is accompanying the Volunteer Corps' Relief Committee, so there need be no apprehension about its safety.

FLOODS IN KOREA

Communications Interrupted

Tokio, July 22.

Heavy rains for three days have resulted in severe floods throughout Korea. There is serious interruption of communications. Conditions are especially bad between Seoul and the Manchurian border.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

ICHANG INTIMIDATION

Peking, July 23.

A Japanese telegram from Ichang quotes a foreign informant as saying that the Wanhsien Junkmen's Guild has passed a resolution that henceforth the transportation by water of salt, copper, sugar and paper exports and of cotton and two other articles of import must be carried by junks. The resolution adds that compradores of steamers acting contrary to the resolution would render themselves and their families liable to death.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

AMERICAN BISHOP FOR FOOCHOW

Syracuse, N. Y., June 24.

Bishop Wallace E. Brown of the Methodist Episcopal Church will sail from San Francisco on September 30 for Foochow, headquarters of the area to which Bishop Brown was assigned at the recent general conference of the Church following his elevation to the Episcopacy.—Reuter's American Service.

THE income of the Kiaochou-Tsinan Railway for the first half of this year amounted to $4,644,615, an increase of $475,220 over that of the same period last year, but still $630,000 below the high mark attained by the Japanese.

HUPEH FLOODS: GRAVE REPORTS

Serious Loss of Life and Crops: Hankow City in Hourly Expectation of Inundation

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Wuchang, July 19.

Last week, Governor Hsiao left his yamên for the first time since his illness. The day was spent on a tour of inspection, in which the Governor visited the offices of the chief military and police officials and inspected the barracks and the mint. During the present week, the Governor was absent from Wuchang for two or three days. He left for down-river in a launch, and the native press contains two speculations as to the cause of his goings. One is, that he went to Huangkang, to visit the tombs of his ancestors and give thanks for his recovery, and also to worship the Iron Buddha at Tanfeng and pray that the excessive rains may be stopped. The other rumour is that the Governor paid a hasty visit to Loyang to confer with Wu Pei-fu on military matters.

All the counties along the banks of the Yangtze report serious floods, with inundation of fields and destruction of crops, together with losses of lives and property. Huangmei, Chishui, Huangkang, Lotien, Hanchuan, Chiayu, Chienlu, all report large areas under water. The above named places practically cover the line of the Yangtze in Hupeh from the Kiangsi border on the east to the Hunan border on the southwest. The river level has reached the height of the bund on the Hankow concession, and will soon be over the road if the water continues to rise. The stream of the Yangtze is swelling up the mouth of the Han River, and a freshet from the upper Han is expected to arrive downwards. When the two volumes of water meet, it will inevitably flood over into the native city in Hankow.

Tea-shop Blaze.

Last Tuesday, at 3.30 a.m. a fire broke out in one of the tea-shops in front of the Yellow Crane Tower over the Hanyang Gate of Wuchang. The fire was caused by the burning of incense to keep away mosquitoes. A strong wind fanned up the flames, and several adjacent buildings caught fire, including another tea-shop and a photographer's. Fortunately, the wind changed, and owing to this and to the assistance which was rendered by many neighbours in bringing water, the flames were put out. A good deal of property was rescued from the burning buildings; but the mob seized the occasion to do some looting and a great deal of bedding, clothes and other articles were stolen.

Shanghai Lawyers' Again.

A telegram has been received from the Lawyers' Guild in Shanghai, urging certain measures of law court reform to be carried out in preparation for the abolition of extraterritoriality. It is recommended among other things that in each county a number of subsidiary courts be set up, in order to facilitate the means for people who wish to have recourse to laws. Two or three major courts are also to be set up in each county. Soldiers who commit civil crimes are to be brought under the jurisdiction of the civil courts. Prisons are to be inspected by the officials, and means taken to improve them. Last (but certainly not least), the salaries of law officers are to be increased by 20 per cent, in order to encourage them in the execution of their duties.

DR. Tsai Yuan-pei, Chancellor of the National University at Peking, telegraphing to Peking from Paris, declares that there is no such a coin as the gold franc, nor is there any exchange rate of this mythical coin quoted in France (says the Chinese press). If the Chinese Government should agree to pay anything in gold francs, Dr. Tsai thinks, there would be no end of trouble in trying to make the payment. It would be impossible to mint gold francs in China. Dr. Tsai advocates the fixing of a rate of this coin either in sterling or silver that is fair to both countries in order to end the dispute.

TIPS FOR INTENDING TRAVELLERS HOME BY THE TRANS-SIBERIAN

Avoid Cameras, Type-Writers, Jewellery and Anything Likely to Excite Bolshevist Suspicion and Greed: Take Little Baggage and Less Money

Peking, July 16.

Messrs. Thos. Cook and Son have received from the Rev. J. C. Keyte, Minister of Peking Union Church, who recently journeyed Home by the trans-Siberian route, an interesting letter giving an account of his experiences. The Rev. Mr. Keyte prefaced a comprehensive budget of tips for prospective travellers with the explanation that the line will probably be constantly improving and "when the Wagon Lits run their cars through much of this may be unnecessary." Meantime it represents knowledge which would have saved us a good deal of trouble—especially at Moscow and Riga if we had known it." He then goes on to give the following "Notes re-trip from the Far East viâ Siberia, June, 1924":—

Passports and Baggage

Russian visa to passport at Soviet Mission, Peking cost Mex. $12.50.

German visa to passport at German Legation, Peking cost Mex. $11.

Baggage.—Not more than 72 lbs. allowed (two poods). If more is inevitable, register through—for the Russian trip—at Chita as otherwise it may be charged double or treble at Moscow, where the first Russian weighing takes place.

Advise not taking more than as follows:—One large Japanese Gory or other light-weighing portmanteau or suit-case, for stuff not needed on trip or which need be opened only once or twice en route; one suit-case which can be handled easily for change of clothing; one basket or small case with things for the night and use during day etc.; one food basket.

Avoid camera, typewriter, jewellery, pamphlets, letters. The two latter will be carefully scrutinized, though they are not prohibited. Books—there is no prohibition of ordinary reading material.

Bolshevik Eye on Money

Money, not more than 200 gold roubles worth of foreign money can be taken out of Russia (even though brought in from China with the passenger, since no system of certificate of what is brought in is at work). The surplus has to be converted into Russian Roubles on the border station at a loss of 15 per cent. If it is necessary to carry cash over this amount—rather than traveller's cheque, etc.—make sure of changing the surplus foreign money into Russian gold roubles or chervoynetz at Moscow at the proper rate. You can sell these all right either at Riga or any later European big city. (Two hundred gold roubles equals about £25 or U.S.A. gold dollars 100.)

The trip needs £60 (or G.$300), if you go second class. If first class—about £75. (Many of the incidentals are the same in either class). Chinese money will go up to Manchuli. Japanese money is useful at first. 50 Yen will be needed and five of them in small change.

Russian Money

The gold rouble is worth 2/6, or rather more than the Mexican dollar. The denominations (paper) are one, three and five. After the five gold roubles you come to the "Chervoynetz," which is equal to 10 gold roubles. Chervoynetz are freely sold in London, June 1924. About half the money needed should be taken in chervoynetz and the rest in gold roubles. Get all the small change you can—it will not be much. The silver Romanoff roubles are used as far as Verkne Udinsk. (One silver rouble equals 75 kopeks (cents) of the G. R.) Do not take many, as they are only worth 40 kopeks after Verkne Udinsk—the Russian and Far Eastern Republican border. Silver Romanoff kopeks are useful up to the latter place, though it needs 250 instead of 100 of them to make a gold rouble.

Chinese dollars can be used as far as Manchuli. At Manchuli money exchange!—on the station—get rid of the last Japanese and Chinese money.

Food and Food Basket

At certain points there are no diners and a food basket is needed. On the main Russian trip the one meal is 12.50 to 3.00. A two-course meal is served for G. R. 1.30 with an extra .20 tip, equals 1.50 for a good satisfying meal. But if you go to the car outside these hours you get a specially prepared meal at about G. R. 3.50.

After Chita one buys good bread, butter, milk, ham, sausage, etc. Vegetables and fruit are absent. Hot water free at the stations. For the food basket from China:—

Coffee (George Washington for choice) and/or tea and/or cocoa. Kettle (with a handle that hinges and goes under the sea), cup, saucer, plate (enamel) tea or coffee pot, knife, fork, spoon, tin-opener, corkscrew. half-dozen small milk, half-dozen small meat pastes, 1 jam (because no fruit), 1 butter (up to Chita) half-dozen sardine, two tongues and small tins cheese, sugar. Dish cloth, etc., bottle to hold water for cleaning teeth.

Booking Tickets

At Peking book to Manchuli. After Mukden second is possible all the way but up to this point book first. At Mukden go to waiting room with porters to wait train. At Changchun look for hotel porter or guide to help you to buy the platz-kart (berth ticket) to Harbin. Cost Yen 4.80. At Mukden porters need Japanese money, 6 sen a package. At Changchun the Russian porters need a yen if they take a lot. For the two cases described above—half that amount.

At Harbin.—The easy way is to write, before leaving Peking, to the Hotel Moderne to be met. Let the hotel man buy your ticket to Manchuli, change your money into roubles, etc., and see to your luggage. You put in four hours as the hotel guest and they advise you. Charge perhaps 10 Mexican dollars.

Otherwise: Leave luggage at left-luggage office, drive to the Wagon Lits office in the hotel and buy tickets and platzkart to Manchuli. Change money—if possible at the International Bank—they will sometimes help travellers even after 3 o'clock. Otherwise try the Moderne Hotel. Get Russian money as advised above. If by any chance this exchange of money is not effected in Harbin, it can be done on the station at Manchuli, though the exchange may not be quite so good. You need G. R. 300 worth—say 15 chervoynetz and 150 in gold roubles.

Manchuli Squeeze Pidgin

At Manchuli. Porters here are good. Take number of the brass check, follow luggage into Customs Hall and leave porter with it. Go to money exchange window and find out what time the ticket office for Chita opens. If you speak Chinese, you may get a clever Chinese who will buy your ticket for you. Go to the station buffet. If time to spend, a droshky drive round "the town" will take half an hour and two gold roubles. When the Customs are finished with you and you have your ticket your porters will take the luggage to the Chita train. Give him at least a yen or gold rouble. Do not let the ticket office clerk bully you into changing your gold roubles or Chervoynetz back into silver Romanoff roubles. This is evidently a "squeeze pidgin" with the exchange shop men.

After Manchuli there is a passport examination on the train and later a customs examination on the train. You need not fear giving up the passport to the officials on this Siberian trip. They examine and return later.

At Chita. Let your porter take you to the Verkne Udinsk booking office. Get ticket and platzkart. You may have to stand a long time in the queue. Then, seven yards away, is the Verkne Udinsk to Moscow office. They have not second-class tickets, so they issue you two third-class ones. The whole Chita to Moscow ticket, second class, costs 130 gold roubles.

Chita's One Englishman

There is only one English-speaking foreigner in Chita (June, 1924), a Mr. John A. Cook. He is glad of the chance of meeting his fellow countrymen and would not mind at all if you wrote ahead and said that you were coming. If he comes to the station to meet your train, your troubles will be taken off your shoulders. You will find the porters at Chita expensive. One gold rouble for taking your luggage off and another some hours later for putting it on. If you wish to go into the town and have time, use the left luggage office. (We found these offices good all through the trip.) The buffet at the station is good.

First Class Well Worth It

First Class or Second? After Mukden second class is quite possible but ladies must clearly understand that there are no ladies coupés. If you go first-class you can reckon on having only two in the coupé, much more spacious than the second-class one, and a private toilet. On the second the toilets are kept as clean as is possible under the circumstances, but the cars have evidently suffered. The coupés hold four and are clean and good, though dust is inevitable. We were a party of three men alone to Omsk when the fourth place was taken by a Russian lady doctor who fortunately spoke French. From Moscow to Riga we had the fourth place taken by a lady and a child of four. For anyone not in good health the extra money for going first is well spent.

At Verkne Udinsk there is a very searching customs examination on the train.

In the Red Capital

At Moscow. After weighing luggage you are free to leave the station. Either go to a hotel (Europa, Select, or the expensive Savoy) and let them look after your booking, etc., as far as they can or Drive to the station for Berlin, the Windau Wagsaal (pronounce Vagsaal Vindau). Get the driver to take you to the extreme left of the building as you face the entrance. You will find a small door inside of which is the left-luggage office. Leave your luggage and then make for the English Mission (Anglisky Missen) in the Povaskaiya. They open at 9 a.m. but if, early, you can wait there. Here you will get letters to the Latvian and Lithuanian Consulates. The Lithuanian is a few doors away—No. 24—the Latvian is in the Mashkov Perenlok No. 3. They are called respectively the Lithen and the Latish Missen.

Then to the central booking office for the railway in the centre of the town, the Ilyanka (Centralnaia Stanzia Dlia Righi) where German will help, though you can manage to indicate Riga in English.

The Useful C.P.R.

But a better way is to have written from Peking or wired to the Russian Canadian American Passenger Agency, No. 3 Teatralny Proezd, Moscow, to say that you are coming—leaving Chita on such and such a date. The Canadian Pacific Railway man (with the C.P.R. gold band) will then meet your train and take this off your shoulders. In fact even if you have not written it will be best to go there first, after dropping your luggage at the left-luggage offices of the station at which you arrive in Moscow and make for the C.P.R. (which joins with other lines under the Russian, Canadian, American title as above) and put yourself in their hands. Mr. Ross Owen is the manager.

The train gets into Moscow at six in the morning and the Riga train leaves at six at night. You need plenty of time at the station in the evening as it is very full.

Searching Customs Inquiry

At Babash, the Russo-Latvian border station, there is a searching customs examination and you are closely questioned as to the money you are carrying with you (as per above). Everything is taken out of the train and whilst you follow your luggage to the Customs Hall the carriages are searched.

At Zilupo the first Latvian station the customs examination takes place on the train. Very easy.

In a White Man's Country

At Riga you arrive at 6 a.m. The morning train for Berlin goes out at eight. If you have been with the C.P.R. at Moscow their men will meet the train at Riga and see you through. If you wish to go by the slightly better train at 11.30 p.m. you should drive to the Hotel Petersbourg. A delightful place. Reasonable charges and the porter speaks English. A day for a bath and a sorting out of luggage and a stroll through this charming old town is well spent.

The train on the Riga to Berlin trip is examined at Kovno. Customs passports, etc. for the Latvian-Lithuanian border. The same process is repeated at Eydkunen, the Lithuanian-German frontier. A sleeper from Eydtkukhnen to Berlin cannot be procured at Riga but the C.P.R. will wire their man to meet the train and will give you a note for him and he will get you this.

Riga to London.—You can book tickets right through if you wish. They are good for three months, and arranged for stop-overs.

Berlin to London. No need of note here.

PEKING OFFICIAL'S OPIUM TRADE

Smugglers in His Employ with Large Quantities of the Drug on Them

Peking, July 15.

The International Anti-Opium Association says that within the last ten days the Chinese press has given publicity to reports of the smuggling of opium from Suiyuan to Peking.

One smuggler named Li Hsuan-yang was arrested at the Hsichih-men with 320 oz. of opium in his possession. He declared that he was one of a gang of 30 men employed by a Peking official to bring 30,000 oz. of opium from Suiyuan. All expenses and a good salary were paid to each man. A second culprit named Chang En-fu was captured a week later with 208 oz. of opium in his possession. He declared that he was in the employ of the same official, and that the latter had 17,000 oz. of opium stored at Szupingtai in the Western Hills.

The Association says it is greatly to be deplored that the press names the smugglers, but does not name the official who is responsible for the traffic. It might turn out to be the same official who did an extensive traffic in Jehol last year. The International Anti-Opium Association has declarations from Gen. Wang Huai-ching, received through the Waichiaopu, that he is doing his utmost to prevent cultivation and traffic in Jehol and Suiyuan, and Gen. Wang has here an excellent opportunity to make an example of the official concerned. Probably, however, the smuggling coolies will be heavily punished whilst the ringleader will go free.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

SCARCITY OF WATER AND FIRES IN HANGCHOW

When Will the Water-works Be Built?

From Our Own Correspondent.

Hangchow, July 19.

The Provincial Local Government Association meets on August 1 to deal with urgent and important provincial problems now that the Assembly is not in session.

There has been a another big fire, involving the loss of some $70,000. It started in a shoe shop the day after the shoemaker had insured his property for $2,500. The saving of property from fire is a real problem here because of the scarcity of water, for the water-works project has never been realized. The latest plan is for the Electric Light Co., which pays a 25 per cent. dividend, to start on the scheme.

The British Consul is at present here on official business.

The Chamber of Commerce is in consultation with the various guilds of the city regarding the site at the Lake, between the Yong Chen Men and Tsin Po Men, where there are some 200 mow of land, for the Hangchow Exhibition, to be held next year or later. The Exhibition is to be national and on the lines of that held at Nanking some years ago.

The British Consul, Mr. Hughes, of the A. P. C., Dr. Duncan Main and the Taoyin lunched with the Commissioner of Finance to-day.

CANTON INCOME TAX ON OFFICIALS

And More Charges on Opium Sellers: 800 Smoking Dens Now Under Control

From a Correspondent.

Canton, July 12.

The Canton Government's latest war tax items are an income tax on the earnings of the officials and a surtax on opium smoking dens. It is believed that there will be no strikes following the enforcement of these two items. Some Canton newspapers comment that the official income now-a-days does not confine itself to salary, from which the government may easily deduct the tax, but also includes official gifts and blackmail and "engineering fees" for preventing a private piece of property from being declared government lands, and that these should be reported and taxed as well. The pending surtax on opium dens will be effective soon, notwithstanding the complaint of the den-keepers, who met at Tin Tin Tea-House last Sunday, that they are bearing enough war burdens. Dr. Sun's opium sale office now controls 800 smoking dens in Canton City alone. One Ho Tai-kung has offered to guarantee to Dr. Sun $24,000 annually, provided that he be appointed director in charge of the collection of this surtax.

Under the auspices of the Kuomintang Political Party, more than 600 ricsha and cart coolies in Canton met on the evening of July 6 at the headquarters of the party, in order to take preliminary steps to organize a strong coolies union. There are nearly 10,000 cart and ricsha coolies in this city, as the ricshas alone number 3,500 and each supports two coolies, one for day and another for night service. At the meeting, Mr. Tom Ping-shan, a Chinese Bolshevist and a member of the executive committee of the Kuomintang, addressed the coolies.

War time in Canton is affecting the theatrical people to no little extent, and the past year, which ended June 30, for the theatrical people begin their contracts yearly in the middle of the year, saw only 12 companies on the road, instead of 36 or more as seen in previous years. Last year the companies could not go into the inland districts for their tour, and the performances had to be confined to only Hongkong and Canton. Even in Canton not all the theatres were open all the time. The new annual formation of companies will begin during the next few days and the shifting and placing of actors into their permanent positions should be complied by July 19 or 20.

NANNING TAKEN BY DR. SUN'S MEN

Captured Without Blow Struck: Rich Opium Revenues

A correspondent in Nanning writes that on June 25 an army, commanded by Generals Wong and Li, who have gone over to Sun Yat-sen's side, entered Nanning, taking it without striking a blow. They came up the river on 25 motor-boats and countless other craft. Others came by road. The city was quiet when she wrote.

The opportunity was taken while Lu Yung-ting was shut up in Kueilin and Generals Tan and Lu Fu-chang were unable to move. Lu's men escaped to Lungchow and Liu's troops were allowed to leave. This small remnant left for Liemchow near Pakhoi.

There was very little panic: but there are fears for the inevitable ding-dong warfare in the future.

The rich opium revenues of Nanning are the prize and the cause of this never ceasing trouble and unrest.

A Peking telegram to the Chinese press reports that Sir Francis Aglen, Inspector General of the Customs, paid into the Bank of China and Bank of Communications $3,500,000 on July 19, making up $5,000,000 in all with former payments, for the purpose of redeeming the drawn bonds of the six per cent. domestic loan in September next.

AMERICAN MINISTER IN TSINGTAO

Chinese Desire for University: Tsingtao's Prospects Under the New Regime

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Tsingtao, July 16.

On July 12 late in the afternoon, Dr. Jacob Gould Schurman, the United States Minister to China, accompanied by his entourage and their ladies, arrived at Tsingtao. A programme of events in honour of the Minister had been previously arranged. A luncheon was given to the Minister and his party by the Tsingtao General Chamber of Commerce, at the Strand Hotel on the 13th at which some 70 guests attended, including Mr. Kao En-hung the Governor, Admiral Wen, Mr. Walter Adams the U. S. Consul, the chiefs of the various departments, and the leading gentry of the City. Mr. Sui, Chairman of the Tsingtao Chamber of Commerce, delivered an address of welcome which was interpreted by Mr. D. Y. Lin, the popular Forestry Chief.

Mr. Sui expressed the gratitude of the people of Tsingtao for the efforts made by the American Government, in winning back this beautiful city for China. He emphasised the commercial possibilities of Tsingtao because of the many advantages it enjoys over other commercial ports in the Far East. He said that the reason why Tsingtao had not progressed was the comparatively recent date of its retrocession to China, the Japanese military regime following Japans military operations against the Germans, the havoc wrought by speculations subsequent to the creation of the Stock Exchange, and the enormous losses suffered by Tsingtao during and following its retrocession to China owing to the abnormal conditions prevailing at that time. But under the able and energetic administration of Mr. Kao En-hung, the speaker said he was confident Tsingtao would be increasingly prosperous. He urged American capitalists to invest their surplus money in Tsingtao and concluded by pleading that the balance of the American Boxer Indemnity would be best used for the establishment of a University in the ideal site of Tsingtao.

Following the toast to the health of President Coolidge and Dr. Schurman, the latter was called upon to speak. He said he was greatly impressed with the natural beauties, the excellent harbour facilities and railway shops, the splendid buildings, the well-kept and spacious roads, the general cleanliness and the unsurpassed climate of Tsingtao. What he had heard was more than confirmed by his trip. He dwelt in glowing terms on the great commercial possibilities of Tsingtao. It was not long ago that it was the most talked of place in his country and the Minister was highly gratified that it was so well managed. With regard to the proposed University, he assured the Chamber that although its government could only act in an advisory capacity he would give the scheme his moral support. On the night of the 13th., His Excellency, Governor Kao, gave a dinner in honour of Dr. Schurman. There were present Admiral Washington, Mrs. Schurman, Mrs. Washington, the Misses Schurman, Mr. Walter Adams, U. S. Consul, Mr. and Mrs. P. Jernigan, Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Collins, Dr. and Mrs. F. L. Hawkes Pott and all the leading officials of the local government and their wives.

Governor Kao in welcoming Dr. Schurman said:—

We are greatly honoured by Dr. Schurman's visit to this city. We welcome him not only as a genuine friend and wellwisher of China but also as the distinguished representative of the great American Republic. Dr. Schurman is a renowned statesman and an experienced educator, who for many years was the President of one of the leading universities in his own country. It is natural that Dr. Schurman should take a great interest in the development of higher education in this country.

When we come to think that the province of Shantung, which is known as the cradle of Chinese civilization, has not yet had an institution for higher technical training, it becomes evident that there is a need for the establishment of a university for offering courses in different branches of engineering, mining, agriculture and forestry.

As to the location of such a university, I might say that, it would be difficult to find a more suitable place in other parts of this province than Tsingtao. The delightful climate here is known throughout the East. It is easily accessable both by land and by sea.

Dr. Schurman in reply praised the efficient administration of Governor Kao. He was pleased to find that Tsingtao "has been so well kept up" and in referring to the proposed university scheme for Tsingtao, the American Minister made a stirring appeal to the idle rich to respond to their sense of duty.

Peking, July 17.

Dr. Schurman's departure from Tsingtao was delayed by bad weather from the 14th instant to the 16th, when he left there for Newchwang. He expects to arrive at Newchwang on July 18.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

DROUGHT BROKEN IN SHANSI

Some At Least of Harvest Saved: A Bad Fire in Taiyuanfu Some $70,000 Loss

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Taiku, Shansi, July 11.

The long drought has been broken, at least locally, and a great feeling of relief is experienced by the people. There were two fine showers on Monday the 7th, the one in the afternoon being especially heavy. Again, on yesterday, there were copious rains, and a gentle shower has been falling this afternoon. The storm of yesterday was accompanied by a curious phenomenon, namely, several hours of continuous, incessant thunder, the like of which had never been heard here before. While these rains come too late to enable the staple autumn crops to be sown, it will be possible to put in vegetables and the more quickly maturing light grains. Already the farmers are flocking to the fields whenever there is an hour of sunshine. Although there has been no general rain over the province there have been local showers in practically every quarter.

On the 5th there was a serious fire on Hemp-market Street in Taiyuanfu. Including buildings torn down to check the progress of the flames, some 17 shops and one dwelling were destroyed. The fire department was on hand early, but gave a general impression of inefficiency. Fortunately. some soldiers were on hand and did valiant and effective work. The fire broke out in a carpenter's shop. The total loss is estimated at between $7.000 and $8.000. These interior cities are but ill equipped for effective fire fighting.

JAPANESE STEAMER SUNK OFF GOTO ISLANDS

Sole Survivor Rescued from Raft After a Week Without Food or Water

Tokio, July 19.

The Nippon Yusen Kaisha's coastal steamer, Matsuyama Maru, from Keelung to Tokio, is reported missing.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Tokyo, July 21.

The N. Y. K. S. Matsuyama Maru, which left Keelung on July 9, sank on July 11 west of Goto Islands with all hands, numbering 57, except one stoker, who was picked up by the trawler Chihaya Maru.

The Matsuyama Maru, which was an old vessel, began to sink after leaving Keelung with sugar and general cargo. Efforts to pump the water out were ineffective and finally she was abandoned on the night of July 11, according to the story of the survivor, who existed on a raft for a week without food or water.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

DR. Sun Yat-sen is said to have ordered Mr. Eugene Chen, Chief of the Air Adminstration, to provide aeroplanes for a number of Russian military officers who are to reconnoitre the East River front.

A BRIGAND HUNTER OF KUEITEH

Excellent Work Done by General Liu of Kueiteh Over an Extensive Area

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Kueiteh, Ho. July 14.

In the past two weeks your correspondent has taken several trips by motor car to various places in this eastern part of Honan and has therefore had good opportunity to see how local conditions are at present. Before going down to Zungcheng in the extreme east of the province we had received notice from one of our Chinese friends there that we should be careful about going as the brigands were very bold and bad. He told us that a post of 100 militia stationed in a country village had been rushed by them and had suffered several casualties besides losing over ten of their rifles. Under the circumstances it seemed advisable to get advice on the subject so we 'phoned into the military yamên to try to get an appointment with General Liu. It happened that he was just, at the time, having a meeting to beseech for rain, so we were told he would make an appointment with us later.

True Chinese Courtesy

Then occurred an example of real Chinese courtesy such as is very pleasant to meet with in these days for a day later the General himself came out in person to the hospital to see us and to see what we wished to see him for. He gave us assurance that Colonel Kuo had sent troops out there and that it would be all right for us to make the trip to Zungcheng.

We found on going to this place that this advice was true. One man I saw who had just walked across from Hsia-ih to Zungcheng through the robber territory told us that fighting had been going on for several days with quite a few casualties on the official side who could not be said to have scored any victories. He told, however, that the regular troops had not yet come into action but only the locals were employed. According to him Magistrate Cheo of Hsia-ih had been accused of being in league with the robbers and so he had been given orders to prove his integrity by getting into the forefront with his men in the operations of clearing up the robbers. Also many of the Red Tuft Spear Society men had been employed on the job at 15 coppers a day. In spite of their reputed invulnerability these men had suffered quite a number of casualties.

Escape of the Kidnapped

Another man living in the country north of Zungcheng told us that over 20 persons, men, women and children who had been kidnapped from their homes had been able to escape and return home as the brigands were having their time fully occupied defending themselves. It seemed to be the idea that the regulars were going to let the locals do the fighting until the brigands' ammunition was used up and then they could go in and make an easier cleaning up. A very good idea too, since there is certainly great slackness on the part of the local authorities in allowing these robber bands to get together and terrorize the country the way they do. But it does not need much of a prophet to foretell that this part of Honan is not going to continue as a brigands' paradise if General Liu remains in charge for he seems very alert and fully alive to his responsibility.

Colonel's Kuo's soldiers of this 1st. Mixed Regiment also are not afraid to tackle this question, as was seen from their actions against robbers south of Kueiteh when they suffered quite a few casualties but smashed up the bandit organizations in doing it. The old official road from Kueiteh to Zungcheng forms a very good motor-road and it certainly is a great change to go sliding over the distance in a few hours instead of the weary jolting of a day and a half in a Peking cart. There has been more rain in the Zungcheng district than there has been farther west so the autumn crops are more ahead and are looking better.

No Bandits but Poor Crops

Our next run was out through Ningling to Suicheo, a distance of some 35 miles. There had been a shower of rain but not enough to improve much the fearfully sandy road west from Ningling, which was a source of great distress to the little car. There are now no robber bands in this neighbourhood, but the autumn crops, millet, kaoliang, beans, hemp, etc., are all very poor indeed. Following upon a poor wheat and barley harvest it will make it a very hard winter for the poorer folks to face.

Ucheng district has usually been a bad one for robbers being so close to the Shantung border but we found things very peaceful on the occasion of a trip out there following our return from Suicheo. General Liu is Commissioner for the extermination of bandits in all four provinces which adjoin eacn other at the Kueiteh prefecture, namely, Honan, Shantung, Kiangsu and Anhui, so that the brigands cannot escape his kind attentions by simply skipping over the border of one province into another as in the good old days.

Copper Still Dropping.

The copper exchange is still going down and we now get 210 coppers to the dollar. Labour of course is costing more in coppers than it did—a day labourer getting 30 coppers a day. Eggs are nearly 18 cash a piece, nearly two coppers, the high price being caused by the fact that many thousands are being shipped out on the railway. A very young chicken ready cooked costs 30 coppers and prices of other things run along the same line: dearer than they were but still cheaper than most places on this little old earth.

EXHIBITION AT HANG-CHOW

To Be Held on the West Lake: Chekiang Residents Discussing Ways and Means

The Chinese Press says that the promoters of the West Lake Exhibition held a meeting at the Ningpo Association Building on Saturday, which they invited all natives of Chêkiang to attend. Altogether came 24 people representing four old prefectures, Shaohsing, Wenchow, Huchow and Kashing besides the Ningpoes. General Li Chengwu presided.

Mr. Yuan Li-teng reported his trip to Hangchow. He and his party arrived at Hangchow on Saturday week and went the next day to interview Mr. Hsia Ch'ao, Chief of the Constabulary Bureau, who told them that he had chosen a site for the exhibition at a spot outside the Chingpu Gate, and its area was over 90 mow. They replied that as nearly 1,000 mow formed the site of the Nanyang Industrial Exhibition at Nanking held before, they should think that at least 300 to 500 mow would be required for the West Lake Exhibition. Next they talked about funds. Mr. Hsia said that the Provincial Government had already authorized the increase of the price of salt, to which increase the Salt Commissioner, Mr. Tu, had obtained the salt merchants' consent. Should the exhibition committee want to float a loan, the Provincial Government would also agree to buy a portion of its bonds.

Then they went to see Tupan Lu, Civil Governor Chang, Finance Commissioner Chang and Industrial Commissioner Wang, discussing the same subject and obtaining the same opinion. Further the officials hoped that people's public bodies would all render help to make the Exhibition a success.

Suggestions were made by Mr. Tsao Mo-kuan, representing Shaohsing and Mr. Lin Yen-fu representing Wenchow, as to the advisability of framing certain fixed modes of procedure. Mr. Yu Ya-ching pointed out the fact that the idea of holding this Exhibition originated from the Chêkiang provincial authorities, and the natives of Chêkiang in Shanghai promised their help afterwards. At last, Messrs. Yu Ya-ching, Yin Chu-fu, Chen Lan-hsun, Lin Yen-fu and Tsao Mo-kuan were nominated a Committee to draft a manifesto expressing the views of the people.

PEKING, July 15.—Dr. Koo presided over the meeting of the Cabinet this morning, which was attended by all the Members of the Cabinet. The official report of the meeting says that it was resolved to appoint Mr. Li Cheng as Chief of the Trade Bureau.

FIGHTING OPIUM IN SHANSI

Governor Yen's Description of Methods Employed: Special Trouble with Morphia

Peking, July 17.

In view of the forthcoming conference of the League of Nations on opium, the International Anti-Opium Association is endeavouring to obtain statements and opinions on the subject of opium in China from a large number of the High Officials and Leaders. The Association hopes later on to publish these in pamphlet from, but for the present the following letter received from Governor Yen of Shansi is worthy of early publicity:—

"Shansi Governor's Office,
Shansi, July 10 1924.

The International Anti-Opium Association, Peking.

Sir,—I am much impressed by your efforts on behalf of the anti-opium campaign and find it impossible fully to express my greatful appreciation. As I am Governor for the Shansi Province only and thereby restricted by my professional rights, I am not capable of commenting on, or investigating the cause of opium recrudescence throughout the whole country of China. My statement therefore applies to Shansi alone, which I know best. Shansi has been a most miserable victim of opium, and even now, although opium cultivation has been stamped out for several years, the conditions are bad, owing to the numerous addicts and the amount of smuggling which is almost impossible to suppress. This smuggling from neighbouring provinces continues although thousands of culprits have been put in gaol.

The Plague of Morphia.

An even more pernicious evil is that of morphia pills, the manufacture of which morphia is so extensive in foreign lands. None is produced in China. The people use these pills instead of opium and the ease with which they can be carried and smuggled into Shansi makes it almost impossible to prevent, however strict the inspection. In the campaign for opium suppression these morphia pills are a great hinderance.

As opium is the curse of this country and ruins the health of the people, I am determined and ready to give my whole strength to bring about the total suppression. At first I gave my attention to the enforcement of the law against opium, and every year there are about 20,000 culprits arrested, but this is only a temporary measure, which does very little good for the addicts. I am strongly of the opinion that a more fundamental measure should be devised, for unless the peole are stirred by human and moral feelings suppression cannot be completed by the mere enforcement of law.

Education of the People.

To this end I educate my people by teaching them that opium smoking is a disease which ought to be cured, and induce them to make a strong determination to cure themselves without the employment of the law. I also instruct the smugglers that smuggling is a bad practice, and pardon them for the first offence. If caught again they are severely punished. Based on this policy I make a thorough investigation of the numbers of smokers and smugglers, and hold all my officials responsible for reforming them.

During recent years I have established a system of village reform. Each village appoints a "head man" and every 25 families an "overseer," and every five families, a "head neighbour." These are responsible for the behaviour and instruction of the people and those obstinate to them are punished by law. Since this system was established nine-tenths of the opium evil has been stamped out. I have every reason to believe that total suppression of opium in Shansi is within reach, and is only delayed by the cultivation and smuggling from other provinces. I submit this brief report, hoping you will always assist me by suggesting further methods of improvement.

Yours Sincerely,
(signed) Yen Ssi-shuan"

THE WUCHANG ZOO

Torture Chamber for Poor Collection of Wretched Animals

One of the latest schemes for the improvement of Wuchang is a plan for the renovation and enlargement of the Provincial Public Liberary. This library, which has been in existence for some 20 years, has had very little attention paid to it. It stands in a fairly large open space in Long Street, and next to it are the Wuchang Zoo and the Hupeh Provincial Bazaar. The Head of the Education Bureau has now revived the idea of reconstructing all these departments, and transforming them into an efficient instrument for educating the masses. According to a paragraph in the local press, the library itself is to be enlarged, and a museum added. In the latter there will be four sections, for the display respectively of local manufactures, mineral products, objects of archæological interest. The Zoo is also to be enlarged, and made more attractive by addition of animals brought from all parts of the world.

In addition, there is to be an athletics ground with a running-track, and inside the running-track will be a stage where the students of Wuchang can make speeches and enact theatricals. Somehow or other, an athletic ground seems to be an indispensable part of any scheme of development that is mooted in Wuchang to-day.

From Mission School to Military

The plot of ground upon which the library stands has had an interesting history. It was originally the compound of the Wesleyan Mission in Wuchang. The library itself was the house for a foreigner's residence, and an adjacent building was the original premises of Wesley College. The site is in one of the busiest and most important streets of Wuchang, and was a fine centre for evangelistic work. But 20 years ago, the Viceroy Chang Chih-tung, cast his eye upon this plot of ground, which was conveniently close to his yamên, and which he wished to transform into a military school. He offered the missionaries in exchange two other plots of land much larger, half a mile outside the East Gate, and the other just inside the same gate. The bargain seemed a good one, and seeing that considerable pressure was brought to bear, it seemed advisable to accept it. So, the paddyfields outside the city were drained and levelled and surround by a boundary wall, and from a day-school of some 20 or 30 day-scholars, Wesley College has grown into a large middle school with 200 boarders. On the new and commodious compound inside the gate, were placed a school and a hospital.

Borrowing a Book.

How long Chang Chih-tung's military academy lasted, is not known, but it probably ended with the great Viceroy himself. Ten years ago, the only indications of its existence hung around the walls of what had been the school, in the shape of various diagrams illustrating the construction of machine-guns, balloons, submarines and other appurtenances of warfare. But the library is an object of curiosity though not beauty. The lower storey is empty, except for one room which is kept as a newspaper-room, where the public is admitted free. The most striking feature of the lower rooms is the amount of dust collected there and the general air of neglect. The books are all kept upstairs; but no one is admitted. Anyone who desires to borrow a book, after receiving a written permission from the Board of Education, may go and consult the catalogue in the lower storey. Then writing the number of the shelf and volume, upon a piece of paper, he places this piece of paper upon a tin tray, which is forthwith as it were drawn up into heaven, disappears through a hole in the ceiling. After a little waiting, the tray appears again, for all the world like the sheet in Peter's vision, which was let down from heaven by the four corners, and lo! the book required is upon it.

Wretched Plight of Zoo Inmates.

A visit to the zoo next door, would make sick the heart of any lover of animals. One of the exhibits is (or used to be) a poor Hunan panther, confined in a cage so small that he can neither turn round nor lie stretched at full length. The keeper told us that the panther was "ill." No wonder. We hope he is dead ere this. Another was an elephant with a broken leg. Various birds were kept in a row of cages, so small that the larger ones had barely space to stretch their wings. Among them were an eagle, a golden pheasant and a large owl. Two or three mangy monkies completed the collection. If Mr. Chen's grandiloquent scheme really comes off, and animals "from all parts of the world" are to be brought into a new zoo, it is very much to be hoped that they will be housed under conditions which allow for their health and comfort, instead of the hideous torture-chamber which has hitherto been dignified by the name of "the Wuchang Zoo."

POPPY PRODUCTION IN KANSU

Taxation on Planting and Fines for Laziness: Official Squeeze

Peking, July 20.

The International Anti-Opium Association has just received the following report from a foreign resident in Kansu:—

"Poppy has been grown again this year in this district of Changhui, although not so extensively as last year. I was away during the season last year, so do not know the exact amount planted. However, I have it on good authority that the tax was $20 per mow for this county. Last year I personally saw poppy grown in the following districts in Kansu:—Changhui, Tsingyuan, Haiyuan, Hueining, Anting, Tsingning, Chinghsien, Siato, Minchow, Lin T'an Hsien (Taochow), Hochow, Kaolan (Lanchow), T'ao Sha Hsien (a new hsien near Siato). Poppy was grown in every hsien in Kansu excepting a few where the country is too rugged. Official sanction even to the extent of compulsory planting was the general rule last year. Poppy has been grown in the province for some years now, but last year it received open encouragement from the officials. The Southern Defence (?—offensive, I should prefer to call him) Commissioner K'an Si-ling in T'sing Chow has had compulsory planting for some years. He has a tax, a fine, and a "Lan To" tax in operation. The first two are for the planting of poppy, while the third is to discourage "laziness" in non-planting districts. I am not fully informed as to this year's methods in that district, but have reason to believe that the above holds true, unless it has been surpassed by more rigid taxation.

"I have been informed that poppy, although less and of a poorer quality than last year owing to the continued drought, is expected to bring the officials approximately $140,000 in taxes from this district alone. It is to be paid to the tune of $15 for each mow under cultivation. The Chenguei Magistrate, Huang Kuo-hua by name, is expected to receive on his own account at least $15,000 from the poppy this year. New stock is being sold for $0.50 an ounce.

There is a reputed consumption of $300 worth of opium a day in this city and surrounding districts. I have failed to see a home in this city without a lamp. On an average there is a case of opium poisoning every week, principally amongst women and girls. The situation here is, to say the least, most alarming. Men and women, regardless of age or clags of society, are habitual users of the poppy. There are also many cases of babies being given the exhaled smoke of the parents in order to quiet them while the mother satisfies her craving.

Outside the resort to forceful persuasion, there is little chance of inducing the officials to clean up the opium in the province. Were there but a strong Governor, who had the courage of his convictions effectively to prohibit the planting and sale of poppy, there would be some hope of ridding the province of this curse, but until there is a Central Government invested with the power to enforce its mandates there is little chance of a strong Governor."—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE migration of Koreans to Japan, temporarily checked by the earthquake and the succeeding outrages, is now again in full swing. It is reported that the departures from Fusan for Japan now average 600 a day, while the number returning is only 90 a day.

CHINESE CHAMBERS OF COMMERCE

National Federation Meeting in September; Special Interest in Customs Revision

On July 19, the National Federation of the Chambers of Commerce at Peking held a Committee meeting and decided to address a circular letter to all the provincial offices of the Federation and all general chambers of commerce, to the following effect:—

In March of this year, it was decided to hold the election of a Chairman some time in June, and all the provinces were invited to give their consent. Up to the end of June, 16 provinces had replied by post, giving their consent. Then there is the question of the Customs Tariff Conference which, according to present appearances, may be indefinitely delayed. At several committee meetings, we have unanimously arrived at the conclusion that no progress can be expected in the consolidation of our interests unless, in accordance with the resolution passed at our last session at Hankow, the fifth session of our Federation be held at Tsinan in Shantung, so that a Chairman may be elected to control our affairs, as well as to write to the Diplomatic Corps, urging them to hasten their respective governments to appoint delegates to a conference in China as soon as possible for the promotion of friendship. You have been informed of this, as on record.

Now, as the Ministry of Agriculture and Commerce is holding an Industrial Conference, beginning on September 1 and continuing for about a fortnight, we have definitely decided to open our fifth session at Tsinan in Shantung on September 25, with the consent of the Tsinan General Chamber of Commerce; and you are hereby invited to send delegates thereto, etc.

LUNGHAI RAILWAY LOAN

Banks' Advance of Money for Construction of Sianfu-Lanchow Section

Peking, July 24.

The "Chen Pao" says that during the Yuan Shih-kai monarchical movement a portion of the Lunghai Railway loan was used for monarchical propaganda, which necessitated the suspension of the construction of the section between Sianfu and Lanchow. Recently the Chinese Government decided to construct this section, and on July 19 a loan was signed by the Ministry of Communications with a group of Chinese banks. A Belgian bank is also participating because it held an option over this section.

The loan is stated to be for $5,000,000 at the price of 90, the security being the revenues from the Lunghai Railway.

The group is said to include the Bank of Communications, the Bank of China, the Bank of Chincheng, the Salt Industrial Bank, and the Bank of Chungnan.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Modification of Old Agreement.

Later.

The actual amount of the loan is Frs. 75,000,000, which will be issued in Europe by the Banque Belge Pour l'Etranger for the purpose of purchasing railway material; also, $10,000,000 will be issued in China to cover the cost of construction.

These amounts will be issued in two equal instalments, the Chinese banks underwriting the Chinese issue, the interest on which will be 8 per cent.

The section to be constructed is from Chengchow, in Honan, to Sianfu.

The agreement represents a modification of the old Belgian agreement of 1912 and the continuation of the line to Lanchowfu will be carried out later, while Dutch interests will complete a short section near Haichow.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

IMPENDING WARFARE IN KUEICHOW

Generals Ousted from Szechuan Planning to Forestall Gen. Yuan's Expedition

Peking, July 21.

The clouds seem to be gathering for a clash between the warring elements in the province of Kueichow, according to Consular reports which came to hand over the week-end.

It seems that Generals Hsiung Keh-wu and Tan Mou-hsin, who were ousted from Szechuan a few months back by the Northern troops, are planning to forestall Gen. Yuan Tsu-ming's expedition against Kueichow by sending a detachment of their troops from Szenan to Hupeh. Marshal Hsiao Yao-nan, Tuchun of Hupeh, has, in consequence of this new development, instructed Gen. Yu Hsieh-cheng, commanding the 18th Mixed Bridge, to take the field against the rebellious Generals, whose troops are said to have captured Laifan and Lichuan, in Hupeh.

General Yu has already left Chungking with his troops and his task of subduing Gen. Hsiung Keh-wu is likely to be rendered more difficult by the circumstance that, by virtue of the large sum of money he took with him when he fled from Chêngtu, the latter is reported to have secured supplies of arms and ammunition from Gen. Tang Chi-yao, the Tuchun of Yunnan.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

SOVIET AIMS AT FAR EASTERN FISHERIES

Moscow, July 20.

A new joint-stock company with a capital of 1,000,000 gold roubles has been formed between the State fishing trust and a private citizen for exploitation of the fisheries in the Far East. The citizen provides all the gear and gets a nine years' lease.—Reuter.

CHINA ASSOCIATION ANNUAL MEETING

Mr. Landale's Review of Affairs in China: Time Not Yet Arrived for Modification of Treaties: Unsatisfactory Position with Regard to Trademarks Registration

London, July 23.

At the annual meeting of the China Association to-day, Mr. David Landale, the Chairman, regretted that the political situation in China had not improved. He hoped that the Great Powers concerned would soon turn their attention to China, but the time had not come for any modification of the treaties under which foreigners resided in China and under which foreign trade was carried on. Mr. Landale emphasized the passage in the report declaring that if China wished to modify her present international status, her first duty was to put her house in order and then, following the example of Japan, undergo a long course of preparation not merely in re-modelling her legislation, but in training officials who could be trusted to have it honestly enforced.

Referring to the "unfortunate" position in the negotiations for the renewal of Crown leases in certain treaty ports, Mr. Landale asserted that the British Government had decided that as large a sum as possible should be extracted from lot-holders for the renewal of leases, thus greatly hampering the expansion of business.

Referring to the statement by Mr. F. W. Jowett, the Commissioner of Works, in the House of Commons on July 16, that only 6¼ per cent. of the lease-holders opposed the new terms, Mr. Landale said that he telegraphed to Tientsin in that connexion and received a reply this morning that Tientsin and Hankow alone represented 60 per cent. of the dissentients. Apparently Mr. Jowett transposed the figures, but as he was willing to receive a deputation, he would be asked to explain his statement. Mr. Landale hoped that eventually some reasonable terms for the renewal of the leases would be offered.

Mr. Landale said that the position with regard to trademarks was also very unsatisfactory. It was regrettable that the Chinese Government had not placed the registration of trademarks under the supervision of the Inspector-General of Customs as was agreed under the Mackay Treaty.—Reuter.

"NOT A POPPY TO BE SEEN"—IN SHENSI!

Opium Commissioner's Amazing Fiction: Whole Province Producing Opium

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Sianfu, Shen., July 14.

People here are amused and shocked to see the report of the Opium Commissioner's visit to Shensi that there was not a poppy to be seen. It really would be interesting to know whether the said gentleman left Peking or not, and whether the report was compiled before he started or on his return. But more surprising still is it to hear Marshal Wu Pei-fu affirm that the death penalty hangs over the head of the possessor of four ounces of opium in the provinces under his jurisdiction. If such is the case and he has any mind to put it into force, we are going to see a great reduction in the population of Shensi. To believe that Chinese officials in Europe know nothing of interior China is perfectly easy, but to imagine that either Marshal Wu Pei-fu or the Opium Commissioner is ignorant of the real state of affairs in Shensi is impossible.

The opium crop this year was enormous, nearly everywhere the fat water land was given up to its cultivation. Outside the north suburb the farmers were giving $2 a day for opium reaping, while at Hsingping, I understand, $4 a day was being given.

The opium trade is the great source of revenue. Thirteen dollars was the stated tax per mow for a long time, but with the ripening of the harvest, the tax took a sudden jump, and in some districts $19 was demanded.

And Famine the Result.

Nearly every other shop along the streets is in the business, and the merchants are paying for their licences from 10 to 20 times as much as for their rent. In a market town, ten miles from here, I am told there are about 100 licensed dealers in that little place alone.

Surely it is small wonder that Sianfu is to-day on the borderland of famine. Flour is twice the price it was three years ago when famine relief was being distributed, and soup kitchens were general, and unless the drought is broken within the next few days we will be quite over the border and there will be a real famine. The millet has not yet been sown.

Not only is the drought causing anxiety to farmers but to officials as well, for the governor has forbidden the slaughter of animals, so no meat can be bought.

Fires have been frequent owing to the intense heat and the dry parched state of everything.

Chiaokiou, a town about 30 miles from Sianfu, has recently been the scene of military operations, but although the town was besieged for 15 days, little or no damage was done. For long this town has notorious for its lawless garrison.

The cause of the strife was the refusal of Capt. Ma Ching-huan to hand over his command to another. Hostilities were concluded, it is said, by a gift to the rebellious one of $3,000 and the promise of a position in Honan, similar to that which he held in Shensi.

Heads of Malefactors.

The authorities seem to be anxious to intimidate all wrong-doers. Besides seeing many prisoners in chains doing the work of scavengers, I have noticed others chained to the pillars of important buildings. Not only had these latter their crimes as usual written on their backs, but on their cheeks was written in black or white the character "tsei" or thief. Notwithstanding the intense heat of the season the decapitated trunk of a man was left in the middle of the principal street the other day, and for many days two heads have been hung on trees on either side of the road outside the east suburb. These are in a very advanced state of decay.

PEKING residents and a great many tourists are taking advantage of the opportunity to attend the great annual Mongol Fair, which is being held 90 miles from Kalgan.

FIGHTING ON CHEKIANG-KIANGSI BORDER

Two Fatal Casualties But Further Hostilities Unlikely

From Our Own Correspondent.

Hangchow, July 21.

Kiangsi soldiers on the border had a little skirmish the other day with the Chêkiang forces which resulted in two being killed. A dozen or so were wounded and taken to Kyiuchow for treatment. Little promience is attached to the affair.

We are advancing with the times and have now in addition to the ordinary police a few mounted on bicycles.

When a fire takes place in Hangchow the Fire Brigade is to inform the Electric Light Co. at once so that it may shut off the current. Lately we have had accidents and parts of the City have been in darkness for hours.

Economic pressure is still affecting the bandits who every now and again appear in unexpected places.

It is now very hot here.

H. M. Consul, Mr. Hughes, has returned to Ningpo.

JAPAN'S NEW IMPORT TARIFF

Serious Effect on British Woollen Trade: Efforts to Postpone Operation

London, July 17.

A deputation, headed by Mr. Stanley Machin, President of the Association of British Chambers of Commerce, and including representatives of London, Huddersfield, Halifax and Sheffield, waited on Mr. William Lunn, Parliamentary Secretary for Overseas Trade, at the House of Commons to-day, and made representations with regard to the serious effect on the woollen trade of the new Japanese tariff. They urged that efforts might be made to postpone the operation of the tariff so that goods in transit, waiting for shipment, or on order should not be subjected to the new duties, which in some cases were nearly 100 per cent.

Mr. Lunn replied that the Board of Trade and the Foreign Office were doing what they could in the interests of British exporters. He was hopeful that goods actually en route to Japan would not be liable to the tariff. The Government fully realized the seriousness of the position and were doing their utmost to mitigate it.

The Japanese Commercial Attaché, who was present, undertook to make representations to his Government on the matter.—Reuter.

Goods in Transit Exempted if Application Made at Once

Tokio, July 24.

Goods in transit before July 5 are exempted from the new tariff duties if application for such exemption is made before the promulgation of the act, which is expected in two or three days, according to a notification issued by the Government. It is understood that this ruling meets the principal diplomatic objections to the tariff. —Reuter's Pacific Service.

GUNS AND AMMUNITION FOR CANTON

Big Consignment on Norwegian Steamer Passes through Colombo

Colombo, July 22.

The Norwegian vessel Hav has proceeded with a cargo of two machine-guns and a large number of rifles and 60 tons of ammunition, all of German manufacture, consigned to Canton. The authorities were unable to confiscate the material as the manifest declares the consignment. The Captain was fined 200 rupees for entering the port with ammunition improperly stored.—Reuter.

It is now reported that, as the water around Changsha has been steadily going down for the past few days, traffic along the Canton-Hankow railway between Wuchang and Changsha has been resumed.

SHANGHAI NEWS

A BOGUS MILLIONAIRESS AND HER DAUGHTER IN SHANGHAI

False Letters of Introduction and Fine Times in the Wealthiest Houses with Any Amount of Plunder: Amazing Story of Two Lady Adventuresses

Several of the most wealthy and prominent members of Shanghai's business and social community have been made the victims recently of a bogus millionairess and her reputed daughter. The story of the doings of these two in Shanghai reads almost like a chapter from fiction. Representing themselves as extremely wealthy they gained entry to what Mr. J. O. P. Bland calls "the Capuan villas of Bubbling Well," borrowed several thousands of dollars and obtained several articles of value from the people they imposed upon. The girl became engaged to a well-known dental surgeon and carried off from him two valuable engagement rings. To bring their stay to a fitting close, they were given a great send off on the Empress of Asia by their unhappy victims, who only discovered the fact that they were victims some days afterwards.

The couple arrived in Shanghai from the States on May 17 this year. They immediately put up at the Astor House Hotel and registered under the names of Mrs. and Miss McKiney. They travelled together on a British passport, believed to be forged, and Mrs. McKiney gave it out that she was the daughter of a Mr. Montgomery, an English millionaire. The accent, however, with which they both speak certainly belied their English nationality. The elder woman appeared to be between 48 and 50 years of age; the younger about 25, though she stated that she was only 19.

Once the two were comfortably ensconsced in the Astor House, their next move was to call on the wives of a number of Shanghai's leading business and banking men armed with false letters of introduction. These were accepted unsuspectingly and it was not long before they had the run of Shanghai society.

They Strike a Snag

There were, however, one or two people who refused to be duped. One of these was one who is among the most important shipping men in town. The ladies told him they had a letter of introduction from friends of his with whom he had gone to college in the States. He failed to recall these friends, however, and made no hesitation about saying so. He was then allowed to look at the address on the envelope, and found it addressed not to his own wife but to his mother, who has never been within 3,000 miles of Shanghai. This put him on his guard and the two kept out of his path.

They continued their career, however, and the mother gave out that her daughter, on coming of age, would inherit the sum of G.$2,000,000. It is fairly obvious now that this story was intended to make of the girl a brilliant matrimonial prize for Shanghai's rich but impressionable youth. This also accounted for the statement that she was only 19 years of age, whereas it was fairly obvious that she was some years older. One unfortunate gentlemen succumbed to the young woman's charms, which were not inconsiderable. She gave him every encouragement and the two ultimately became engaged and he bought her an expensive engagement ring to seal the contract. Time went on and a few days later the girl came to him with tears in her eyes and gently broke the news that she had lost the ring. She had been waving her hands while talking, so she explained, and the ring must have fallen off her finger. The young man cheered her up for the loss and promptly bought her another, which left Shanghai with the girl. Needless to say the story of how she lost the first ring was a pure fabrication, and both items of jewellery simply went to swell the joint loot made by the two.

Mother Busy Too

Neither had the mother been idle. She, meanwhile, became very friendly with another Shanghai lady. This latter hoped very shortly to be leaving Shanghai for good, and consequently wished to sell her house. She suggested that Mrs McKiney might buy it. Mrs. McKiney was enraptured and agreed. The deal was put through and a cheque was paid down as deposit. The said cheque subsequently proved to be worthless. Whilst up at the house the bogus millionairess noticed two fur coats belonging to her victim. She expressed her admiration for them and begged to be allowed to borrow them that she might take them to her tailor to have them copied. Permission was willingly given, and the owner has never seen the coats since. On the day the couple left Shanghai the owner of the coats did ask her what had become of the articles, and was told that the tailor had been given instructions to send them to her house that morning, and they would be waiting, therefore, when she got back. Needless to say they were not, and have not been seen in Shanghai since.

Picking It Up Everywhere

After a fortnight had elapsed the hotel management dropped discreet hints regarding their account. The problem was a simple one to the elder female "Raffles." She simply went to the lady who was victimized for the fur coats and borrowed $500, making some excuse as to her being temporarily without funds. With this sum she paid her hotel bill. At a later date she borrowed another $500 from the same lady. Several other people were victimized in the same way, willingly lending money to a lady whose father was a millionaire. She came up against an insurmountable obstacle in a certain British barrister, however. He asked to see her letter of credit before lending anything, and as she was unable to produce this, politely but firmly refused to lend her a cent.

To account for their presence in Shanghai the women stated that they owned a house in Monte Carlo and were on their way to that town in order to close the house up for the summer. They gave the names of several prominent citizens in America as references, and in the case of one of Chicago's leading men they not only claimed friendship but also relationship. One gentleman in Shanghai to whom this story was told doubted it and was curious enough to send a cable to the gentleman in Chicago. He received a prompt reply denying all knowledge of the two.

They left Shanghai on June 21, having probably come to the conclusion that too many questions were being asked and it would be as well to go while the going was good. Their stay had been quite profitable, for with what they had borrowed and obtained upon false pretences they had obtained from people here at least $4,000, if not more. Accordingly they booked a passage on the str. Empress of Asia for Hongkong. Even on this short voyage the younger woman was unable to keep her mind from business and soon managed to get herself engaged to one of the ship's officers, enticing from him by various means the sum of some $300.

Angry Tradespeople

Not long after they had gone the manager of the Astor House received a stream of angry tradespeople with unpaid bills and bogus cheques. Tailors produced cheques for sums such as $1,662, $235, and $350 whilst a cheque paid over to a shoe company was for $58. All were worthless.

In Hongkong the two stopped for a very short time, and whether they made any depredations in that colony we are unable to state. They took ship to Manila. Here also they are stated to have produced a number of bogus introductory letters. They were received with some suspicion, however, and made nothing. Accordingly they took the Hugo Stinnes str. Hindenburg to Java, from where they stated their intention of proceeding to Singapore and coming on to Shanghai by the Empress of Asia.

Their movements now become confused, which was probably intended. Quite a number of people expected them to arrive in Shanghai per the str. Empress of Canada yesterday, but when the steamer was met yesterday by people anxious to find them it is almost needless to say they were not on board.

The names the two are believed to travel under are as follows:—

Mrs. Millicent McKiney and Miss Millicent Montgomery, the elder woman.

Miss Marie McKiney and Miss Marie Montgomery, the younger woman.

The two are reputed always to work together, and it appears highly improbable that they are in any way related. They are certainly not English, but very possibly Canadian and generally believed to be American. If they care to return to Shanghai they will be welcomed here with open arms.

PORTUGUESE FLIERS ENTERTAINED

Enjoyable Garden Party in Club Lusitano Grounds: Enthusiastic Welcome

The Portuguese community had an ideal day on Sunday for their garden party held in the grounds of the Club Lusitano, No. 1 Kiangwan Road, in honour of the Portuguese aviators—Major Sarmento Beires, Major Britto Paes and Lieut. Manuel Gouveia. Mr. A. Casanova, Consul-General, and all the prominent members of the Portuguese community were in attendance, and the arrangements were excellently carried out by the following committees:—Mr. J. A. dos Remedios, Chairman, Mr. J. B. de Senna, Hon. Secretary (general); Mr. A. F. Diniz, Mr. L. Encarnacao, Mr. M. F. Leitao, Mr. Alb. P. Simoes, Mr. Chun Bing-him, Mr. C. W. A. Sing, Mr. B. B. Remedios, Mr. A. E. Collins (refreshments); Mr. F. Baptista, Mr. T. G. d'Almeida (decorations); Mr. C. E. L. Ozorio, Mr. I. Martinho Marques, Mr. C. A. Pereira (entertainments); Mrs. Lily Souza, Mrs. L. M. Sequeira and Mrs. H. G. Ozorio.

The spacious grounds of the Club were specially decorated for the occasion. All round the lawn were coloured Venetian poles, from which were hung shields, each one bearing a name of the 24 landing places from Lisbon to Macao. Across the lawn was suspended a model aeroplane bearing the name of "Patria," that of the machine in which the aviators flew. The facade of the Club was one mass of colour with the inscription:—

"A patria vos contempla Ditosa patria que taes filhos tem"

Meaning—"Your motherland contemplates you. Delectable motherland that possesses such sons."

In the evening the whole scene was lit up with electric lights and presented a beautiful sight. The guests of honour were received by a guard of Boy Scouts.

After a general greeting, Mr. J. A. Remedios, President of the Committee, welcomed the fliers, and then Mr. Casanova, Portuguese Consul-General, made a brilliant speech, eulogizing the aviators for their achievement which was a continuation of the old Portuguese intrepidity. He congratulated them and cheers were given in their honour and for the motherland. Three silver cups were presented to the aviators as a souvenir of their feat, and Major Paes expressed his thanks for the gifts, the ceremony and the welcome.

During the afternoon seven little girls performed an aviation dance with aeroplanes, after which tea was served and dancing started.

Complaining of the "many questionable antics" in which gangs of three or five Russians have been indulging to the annoyance of Chapei residents, the Self-Government Preparation Society has addressed a protest to the Chief of the Constabulary Bureau. With the object of preventing serious trouble, the Society prays that the Chief take action to keep these poor but troublesome Russians in control. Questionable antics sounds as delightfully nebulous as "dangerous thoughts."

GEN. GLEBOFF'S MEN

Said to Be Dissatisfied with Daily 30 Cents Allowance per Man for Food

The Chinese press says there are about 480 soldiers on board the three Russian ships in the Huangpu and some 160 accommodated at the Isolation Hospital, Pootung, making 640 refugees in all. The Russians declare that they require food costing about 50 cents per man per day, while the Chinese authorities furnish them funds which work out at about 30 cents a day for each man.

In response to a complaint from the Russians, Mr. S. K. Chen, Chief Secretary of the Bureau of Foreign Affairs, accompanied by a secretary of the Military Commissioner and two officers of the Chinese Constabulary, brought $1,000 in cash subscribed by the public to the Navy Hospital. A conference took place between the officials and two representatives of the Russian refugees.

The Russian representatives emphasized the fact that their countrymen had all along obeyed instructions of the Chinese authorities and never once committed any breach of the law. They thought, therefore, that three men-of-war should not have been ordered to keep a close watch over their movements.

Mr. Chen reminded them that Chinese men-of-war were at liberty to moor at whatever place they chose in China's territorial waters.

The two representatives then demanded 60 additional "passes," so that they could send more men ashore to secure subscriptions from Chinese and foreign sympathizers. To this demand, Mr. Chen only agreed to issue in addition to special passes for sick men, six "passes" to each ship and to those living at the Hospital—24 passes in all—which would be issued by the Military Commissioner. As the Russian representatives urged repeatedly for more passes, Mr. Chen promised to refer the matter to the Military Commissioner for decision.

Regarding the Russian representatives' demand for $320 or $330 a day as food allowance, the Chinese authorities could only promise them $180 or $200, since the money had to be raised by subscriptions from Chinese and foreign philanthropists, and not without encountering difficulty; they must practise rigid economy. After agreeing to confer together again the next day at Shanghai, the meeting terminated.

POLICE TRIBUTE TO CHINESE WOMAN

Presentation of Scroll for Helping to Apprehend Murderers: Commissioner's Thanks

A quite unusual little ceremony took place at the office of Major Hilton Johnson, acting Commissioner of Police, on Thursday of last week, the presentation of a scroll of honour to a Chinese woman, Wong Waungsze, in recognition of her public-spirited action in giving information leading to the arrest and conviction of persons implicated in a brutal murder which took place in Wayside district on May 13. This was the case in which the dead body of a Chinese was found packed in a box and ready for removal, in an upper room of a Chinese dwelling in Baikal Road. Mrs. Wong lived in the room below and, noticing blood dripping through a crevice in the ceiling, she informed the police, with the result that the murderers were arrested and sentenced to long terms of imprisonment.

In making the presentation, in the presence of members of the C.I.D. staff and a number of Chinese detectives, Major Hilton-Johnson especially mentioned the fact that Mrs. Wong attended the Mixed Court on four occasions and generally in connexion with the case showed a public spirit unfortunately, he said, rare among Chinese in Shanghai. The police greatly appreciated assistance of this kind, and in token of this he had much pleasure in presenting her with the scroll.

STILL THEY COME: RUSSIAN REFUGEE POPULATION INCREASING

Repatriation Hindered by Political Influences: Situation Worse Daily: Fresh Arrivals by Every Steamer: Refugees Not Wanted in Bulgaria

BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

Despite the fact that many thousands of dollars have been subscribed in one way and another towards repatriating Russian refugees in Shanghai, and the despatch of several hundreds back to their own country and elsewhere abroad, the refugee situation in Shanghai shows little sign of radical improvement. Indeed, in some respects it grows worse. It will have been noticed that a large number of Russians arrived on board the Empress of Canada on Monday and these people, we understand, have been deported from Hongkong and the Philippines, with still larger groups to follow. No plan of dealing with the problem on a comprehensive scale has been discovered, and in the absence of a single authority able to act and with the clash of political interests there appears no immediate prospect of a satisfactory solution.

When the lotteries were started some months ago, with the special object of repatriating the Cadets, the majority of whom were destined for the Balkans, it was hoped that a way out of a great difficulty had been found. Pending the completion of arrangements for their departure, the lotteries contractor advanced $120,000, for the maintenance of the Cadets and to cover the cost of their evacuation. Now it is learned that no answer has been received to a cable sent by the Russian Cadet Committee inquiring if the offer to receive them in Bulgaria is still open (presumably there was a hitch in the original arrangement) and therefore it seems that this large sum of money is likely to dwindle and disappear in maintenance expenses only, without the least improvement in the general position from the point of view of the cadets or of Shanghai.

Admiral Gleboff's Starving Crews.

The most serious feature of the position to-day is the plight of Admiral Gleboff's men at Woosung. They are quite at the end of their resources, and it was the desperate nature of their position—not, as has been stated, the desire to prevent Russians from returning to their country under Soviet auspices—which caused them to take their recent stand in the Consulate. Admiral Gleboff, we understand, claims that he is the absolute owner of one of the three vessels now at Woosung, and that he is able to establish a legal claim to the other two, and therefore he demands permission either to sell the ships or charter them, using the funds for the purpose of getting his men away from Shanghai. He is quite willing that the proceeds of either scheme should be administered by the Consular Body for the purpose named. His own personal funds have all disappeared in the process of maintaining his men, and all his personal property has gone the same way, so there is not the slightest question of any other motive behind the proposed sale. This course, has strenuously been opposed by the Soviet, and there is an absolute deadlock. It has been said that the Admiral's men proposed to march on Shanghai by way of making a demonstration, but excellent discipline has been maintained and, in the circumstances, it cannot be said they have given cause for serious complaint. Some of the men recently went over to the Reds—hence certain collisions which recently took place between rival parties—but the majority have no intention of returning to Russia; indeed they declare that the return of them to Vladivostok would mean "sudden death." How they are to be got away from Shanghai to some climate politically more healthy than that of the North is the problem, to-day no nearer solution than when the ships first arrived some months ago.

Friction Between Reds and Whites.

With regard to the general body of refugees eking out a precarious existence in the two Settlements, 80 were repatriated by the Relief Advisory Committee last month, and arrangements were made for sending another 120 during the present month. It is said that Admiral Gleboff's men for some reason or other interfered with these arrangements, but it seems utterly unreasonable that while not willing to return home themselves they should desire to stand in the way of others who wish to go; moreover, the statement is denied. Without going into details of the quarrel between the two groups, in which dispute the Shanghai public subscribing to relief funds is not in the least interested, we would suggest that, funds being available for the despatch of refugees who are willing to go, the Committee should see to it that arrangements are not hampered by opposition groups.

Outrage by Chapei Police.

A notable example of the manner in which political influences are affecting the local situation was forthcoming a few days ago. On the evening of the 17th a requiem mass was held in the Russian Church on the occasion of the anniversary of the death of the Emperor and his family. This service has been held annually and has always been attended by a very large number of the Russian community, and it has of course been conducted without interference. On the evening in question, however, shortly after commencement of the service, a detachment of Chinese police appeared at the gates and, entering into the grounds, demanded that the church be closed immediately. The contention of the officer in charge was that the Church was being used for political purposes.

The interruption created great excitement among the congregation and was met by loud protests, the police ultimately withdrawing after having received an assurance that no political meeting was being held. This is the first occasion upon which the Chapei police have interfered with the affairs of the Church, and their action may have been due to genuine inability to distinguish between a political meeting and a church service. What is more probable, however, is that the Chapei police have lately received a little tuition upon the subject of the Soviet's indefensible claim to the property of the Orthodox Church of Russia.

SHANGHAI'S TRAFFIC

A Loop to Reduce Tramway Congestion on the Bund: Mr. J. B. Hamilton's Suggestion

Many people have wondered what construction has been under way on the Bund, south of the Customs shed, where rails have been laid across the strip reserved for parking motor cars. Investigations showed that this was a step by the Tramway Co. to facilitate service in the crowded sections of the Settlement, the work, when completed, to be a loop to prevent congestion during the rush hours. Under the new system the company will introduce a feature which many have asked for, namely, the first-class compartment always will be in front, for the trams will be looped and the cars remain in order all the while. Motorists know only too well the trouble at noon of getting past the mass of trams, ricshas and carts at the junction of the Bund and Avenue Edward VII, while pedestrians and users of ricshas can pass this point much more easily.

This improvement, suggested by Mr. J. B. Hamilton, C.B.E., a traffic specialist, who studied the Shanghai streets and conditions and presented proposals for needed changes, was the subject of much discussion by the Council, who offered the company permission to construct this loop. On May 16 of this year the Tramway Co. accepted the agreement. Other loops provided for are a circular one at the junction of Carter, Sinza and Markham Roads, and one at Wayside.

ESCAPED PRISONER OF THE REDS

A Young Russian in Shanghai After Nine Months in Vladivostok Gaol

Nine months in a Soviet Government prison in Vladivostok and without any trial or charge against him was the experience of a young Russian, Victor Bolshakaw who arrived in Shanghai last week after escaping on a Dutch steamer.

Young Bolshakaw who is only 20 years of age, was until last October a student in an Engineering College in Berlin, and to obtain pratical experience he shipped on one of the Kaiser line steamers as apprentice engineer. The steamer Route Kaiser made the voyage to the eastern ports and eventually arrived in Vladivostok. Here the Soviet authorities came on board and demanded his passport. Bolshakaw had a passport but it was from the old White Government and no visa from the Soviet Government Representative in Germany so they took the young man ashore and placed him in the Military Prison. Here he was confined for three months and not permitted to write to any person or see any one, neither was any charge read to him. He could obtain no information whatsoever as to the intentions of the authorities. Last February he was brought before the military officer and questioned as to his affiliations with the old régime and how and why he came to Vladivostok. The main idea the Bolshevists seemed to have was that they thought this young man came there as a spy for the Monarchist Group in Paris. After hours of questioning he was returned to the prison, only this time he was placed in the group that worked at discharging steamers and other laborious tasks. One day his guards informed him that he was a spy and would be shot as soon as the full information was obtained. Naturally this gave him the determination to find means of escaping.

Evil Conditions.

The conditions of the prisoners were extremely hard, the food poor and scarce. They received a pot of tea and coarse bread in the morning and at noon pea soup with bread and tea: twice a week they received meat in the soup, at night they were given tea and bread and when they were doing specially hard work were given a little extra rations. The sanitary conditions were of the most filthy and sickness was very common among the prisoners. They were examined by a doctor every Wednesday who recommended the type of work suitable for them. The working hours were from eight to 16 hours per day.

Bolshakaw watched his chance and, at last, while loading a Japanese steamer, he eluded his guards and concealed himself in the hold. He was missed and a search instituted. He was found shortly before daylight and taken to a dark cell where he remained eight days, his only food being water and bread twice a day. The darkness and dread of the officials nearly drove him insane and on the eighth day the doctor ordered him to be sent to the hospital where he remained for one month. He was then again sent to the stevedoring gang.

Among the Boilers.

He was one of the gang that discharged the Dutch steamer Westerdyke and when she was ready for clearance he again evaded the guards and this time concealed himself in the fire room between two of the large boilers.

Here in this small place, which was very dark, and hot, suffering from thirst and the fear of capture, which he knew would mean death, he awaited the vessel's departure from port. His guards came close to his hiding place quite often and once when one of the guards poked in the opening with a fire hoe he thought he was lost, but the hoe did not touch him and no person thought that any one could live in a place as hot and uncomfortable.

All that night and until nearly noon of the next day he lay there, his strength kept up by the knowledge of freedom when he felt the vessel moving and although the heat became almost unbearable, and at times he became almost unconsions, his strength of will when he knew he was at last escaping kept him up, then nearly dead from the scorching of the boiler places and from thirst, but knowing he was away from the clutches of the "Reds" he crawled to the fire room to the astonishment of the firemen.

He could not rise and they helped him to the upper deck where the fresh cool breeze and a drink of water revived him enough to tell what had happened and how he came there. He was fed and given clothes by the Master of the vessel, his prison clothes consisting of canvas and coarse cloth underwear. On arrival in Shanghai he found refuge with a relation and there with care and good nursing he has regained his health and is now awaiting a chance to return to Germany to finish his studies. However, he will not go near any place where the Soviets have the control as he knows that if they can again put him in a prison he will never leave it except for his grave.

Haunted with Spy Mania.

He says that the officials in Vladivostok are beset with the idea that the Monarchists in Paris are sending spies to Vladivostok to create in the people a hatred of the Socialistic system of government and to conceal arms and ammunition in places where it can be quickly obtained when the drive of the White Guards starts, which is expected when the Soviet create in the minds of the other world governments the fear that, if the Soviets continue to rule, they will create revolutions throughout the world.

SMALL INVESTORS, LD.

To Go into Voluntary Liquidation: Mr. Douglas Fleming's Resignation

A circular was published on Tuesday by one of our morning contemporaries relating to the proposed winding up of the affairs of the Small Investors, Ld., and the reason for the proposal. The publication of this letter constitutes a certain breach of confidence, inasmuch as it was marked quite plainly, private. There can, however, be no reason now why the facts should not be given.

The letter first of all sets out the reasons which induced the board of directors to take this step—the heavy depreciation in all local rubber stocks in the early part of the year, the adverse effect on Langkat shares, and the failure of a large number of the company's clients to meet their accounts at the June settlement. The result of this failure on the part of their clients, the letter explains, was that the company had to effect a forced liquidation of stocks to carry out its own settlement, resulting in a net loss of approximately Tls. 260,000. The cash available for carrying on the company's business was stated to be about Tls. 20,000, and of the company's outstanding book debts amounting to Tls. 249,139, it was anticipated about Tls. 100,000 would be paid in due course. In these circumstances the Board decided to call an extraordinary general meeting, when a formal resolution for the voluntary liquidation of the company would be proposed, giving shareholders a chance to determine whether or not it was their wish that the company should carry on business.

Our contemporary, in describing what it terms "this sensational turn of events," goes on to draw attention to the fact that these happenings coincide with the resignation of Mr. Douglas Fleming, the managing-director. This resignation, it should be pointed out in fairness to Mr. Fleming, was specially resolved upon by him for the good of the company. By resigning he saves the company a considerable amount of the expense attached to his position.

AFTER a week's difficult and dangerous work the men of the Municipal Fire Department were withdrawn on Sunday from the Robert Dollar wharf. The outbreak of fire at the explosives godown there gave the brigade one of the hardest jobs it has had to tackle for a long time, and credit is due to all concerned for the way in which the outbreak was dealt with. In addition to successfully fighting a very dangerous fire, the brigade has salved a considerable quantity of chemicals, over 600 cases of yellow phosphorous out of 859 in storage, and also 5,200 kegs of chlorate of potash. The work was accomplished at considerable risk and several members of the brigade were temporarily put out of action.

RUSSIAN CHILDREN ON THE STREETS

How to Get Them Off: Confraternity School Available if Money Is Forthcoming

That the unhappy plight of the children who are obliged to hawk chocolates or other small wares on the streets of Shanghai is a matter of genuine concern to the community has been demonstrated not only by the letters from "Rex," and "A Mother" which have appeared in our correspondence columns, but by a meeting held on Tuesday afternoon at the residence of Mr. S. W. Wolfe, Chairman of the Refugee Relief Advisory Committee.

Besides Mr. Wolfe there were present the Rev. G. W. Sheppard, Secretary of the British and Foreign Bible Society; Mme. L. Vouich, well known for her services on the Russian Benevolent Society, and in connexion with Mme. Dieterichs' Orphanage and the School and Dispensary maintained by the Russian Confraternity and Dr. Kasakoff, Chairman of the latter organization. Representatives of the King's Daughters' Society, the Charity Organization Society and other benevolent societies were unable to be present at this hastily called meeting, but sent assurances of their interest and co-operation.

The meeting considered first the necessity of ascertaining what legal power of interference with the children's activities could be invoked; second, the matter of a school for them, provided that permission could be obtained to educate and care for them; and third, the needs of the other proverty-stricken foreign children of the Settlement.

It was, of course, impossible to decision any final action, but it was agreed to take up the matter with the Municipal. Council, through its Police Department, to ascertain the legal aspects of the case and to get fuller information with regard to the children's parents and home. It was agreed to request all members of the Russian Benevolent Society to co-operate with this Committee by reporting to them all instances of children hawking goods upon the street or soliciting alms, together with all possible information with regard to the children.

The Confraternity's School.

With regard to a suitable place for such children as could not be properly cared for by their parents, the Russian Confraternity reported through their representatives that it would be possible for them to find quarters for six or seven more children in their boarding school at 721 Avenue Foch, but that they had very little money, and that any large increase would have to be met with new funds, as the $200 a month necessary to run this school, which is donated by Russian contributions, could not be expected to be increased. In this connexion it was emphatically stated that not only the well-to-do Russians, but even those in barely comfortable circumstances, were already giving to the extent of their means.

The possibility of a number of children returning to Russia with their parents was mentioned, and the Confraternity representatives expressed their willingness to secure a census of poor Russian children whose parents could not support them properly.

The meeting then adjourned to visit the school, which is clean and sanitary, but pitifully meagre in its appointments. Its directors and two teachers receive practically nothing but maintenance, and the English teacher contributes her services. It was stated that the dispensary at present is treating as many as 80 patients a day, the only expense being for rent and drugs, as the four Russian doctors inattendance give their services. Further progress in this problem will be reported as soon as possible.

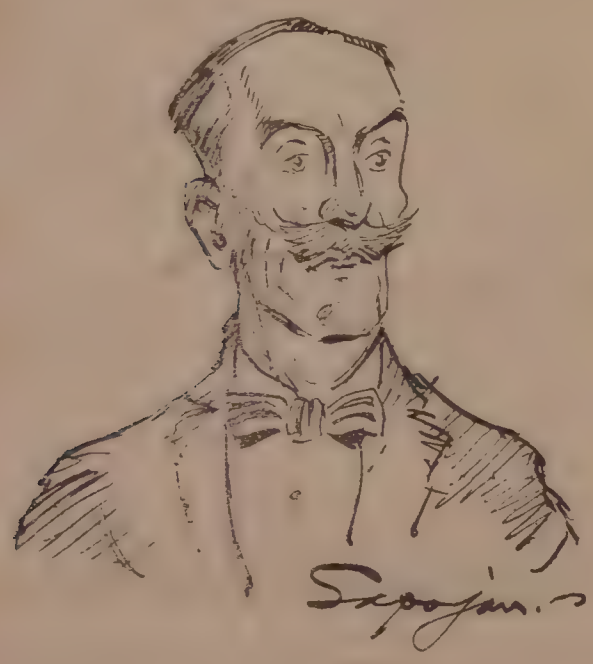
UPON reaching Chengju station on the Shanghai-Nanking line on Saturday, a Chinese passenger from Shanghai was arrested for having in his travelling bag four revolvers and 400 rounds of ammunition. His story was that a foreigner in Shanghai had offered him $100 for safe conveyance of the weapons to Nanking.

RUSSIAN CONSULATE FORMALLY HANDED OVER TO SOVIET REPRESENTATIVES

Bolshvists, Headed by Mr. Elleder, March in Under Armed Guard and Remain Bolted and Barred against all Visitors: An Appreciation of M. Grosse's Past Work

M. Victor Grosse, formerly Russian Consul-General in Shanghai, and for the past four years joint Commissioner with the Chinese Envoy in charge of Russian Affairs in Shanghai, formally handed over the old Russian Consulate building to the Chinese authorities on Thursday at noon, and has left the building. The Chevalier S. K. Chen and Mr. Chow Ting, acting on behalf of Mr. Hsu Yuan, took charge of the building, and the Bolshevist authorities, headed by M. Elleder, went in at 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

The change over was carried out under a strong guard of European and Sikh police, armed to the teeth, whilst such is their terror of White demonstration, apparently, that the Bolsheviks immediately barred and bolted themselves in and remained in the building guarded by armed police for the rest of the day. All the doors were locked, and when a "North-China Daily News" representative rang the bell of the business office door, a suspicious, closely shaven head peered at him through the lattice of the window, across which, inside, was stretched a large thick rope, and promptly darted back. That was all that happened. There appeared to be two or three men on guard inside, but it was not possible to see whether they were armed. At the residential doors were more armed policemen, who allowed the visitor to ring at his leisure. They knew there would be no answer, neither was there.



M. Victor Grosse.

Thirty Years in China.

It is with very sincere regret that the whole foreign community of Shanghai, and assuredly the majority of the Russian community, will see the departure of M. Grosse from the post of chief responsibility of all Russian affairs in Shanghai, that he held so long. M. Grosse was born at Dvinsk, in the province of Viterbsk. studied at the University of St. Petersburg, taking its special Oriental Languages school. He graduated in 1892, entered the Russian Foreign Office, and in 1894 was sent to Peking, where for some time, after the manner of the student interpreters in the British Consular Service, he studied Chinese. Entering on his active career in the Russian Consular service, M. Grosse served in Tientsin, Chefoo, Newchwang, Harbin, Yokohama, and in the year 1911 he came to Shanghai. At that time the Russian Consulate was in what is now the American court house. But M. Grosse only used this building for a month. It was sold to the Americans and he moved into Bubbling Well Road. It was he who conceived the scheme of building the Russian Consulate, by the Garden Bridge, that we all know. An opportunity presented itself of buying the necessary land, for which, it is interesting to recall, the comparatively small sum of Tls. 70,000 was paid, and in 1913 M. Grosse went on leave to Russia and defended his building scheme in the Duma (the old Russian parliament) so successfully that, on his return to Shanghai in 1914, the work of building was begun, and was eventually finished in January, 1917, a month before the Tsar abdicated.

The Sino-Russian Breach.

In September, 1920, the Chinese Government broke off relationships with Prince Koudacheff, the then Russian Minister, and after several months of uncertainty as to what was to happen to the Russians in Shanghai the agreement was concluded on March 1, 1921, whereby all Russian affairs in Shanghai were entrusted to M. Grosse acting jointly with and on behalf of the Chinese Commissioner for Foreign Affairs. As will be remembered there have, since the conclusion of the Russo-Chinese agreement, been many rumours that M. Grosse was quitting the Consulate. But it was hoped that a decent interval would be allowed him in which to arrange for the orderly handing over of all the archives. Under pressure, it is to be supposed, by the Soviet, the Waichiaopu made a formal request for the surrender of the building, which took place, as already stated, yesterday.

M. Grosse is leaving Shanghai this evening for Mokanshan, where Mme. Grosse and her children already are. M. Grosse is badly in need of rest and he is going to take a few weeks' holiday, necessitated by the very heavy nervous strain of recent years, particularly of recent months.

All the local Russian organizations have now been amalgamated and have formed a committee of six members to control the whole, of which M. Ivanoff, the former Russian Assessor in the Mixed Court, is vice-chairman, and Mr. Grosse has agreed to be chairman. He emphasizes, however, that he will have nothing to do with politics. The new organization will function in a purely social manner, as is done by similar committees of Russians in other countries on behalf of those who do not recognize the Soviet, but who may wish to obtain passports, birth certifications and the like.

RECREATION GROUND AND GATE MONEY

Should Clubs Be Allowed to Charge Admission Fees?

A point of general interest concerning the management of that most important Shanghai institution, the Public Recreation ground, is raised by a correspondent, who sends us the following note on the subject:

"The Baseball people are getting in the regular habit of charging for admission to the enclosure, which is entirely against the tradition of the Public Recreation Ground. Also they are putting up each year more and more unsightly bamboo fences, the present view from Loongfei Gate right up to the Golf House being entirely spoilt. As far as admission money is concerned, I know the Baseball people contend that it costs a lot to entertain visiting teams—quite so: which also applies to cricket and football, but they don't charge admission.

"I regard this rather seriously, because I fear the present authorities are allowing so many precedents that there is a great danger of its becoming a recognized practice."

In commenting upon this communication, we would first like it clearly to be understood that we do so on the general principle raised and not specifically on our correspondent's criticism of the Baseball Club. The latter, both in the matter of charging gate money and in respect of the erection of matsheds, must have obtained permission of the authorities before they could do either and, enjoying the same privileges as other foreigners in the use of the ground, must so far be held to be fully within their rights. The real point at issue therefore is: should any Club using the Recreation Ground be permitted to charge gate money for ordinary or special games, and who is the authority to decide?

How the Ground Is Let Out.

It may be of interest to state the general position with regard to management of the Recreation Ground.

As is generally known, the ground was purchased years ago and handed over to the Recreation Fund Trustees "as a public park and recreation ground for the use and recreation of the foreign population of Shanghai." For convenience of management and upkeep, the Trustees let all the land inside the Race track (with the exception of the ground occupied by the Shanghai Cricket Club, the Recreation Club and the Swimming Bath Club) to the Municipal Council at a rental of Tls. 600 per annum. The Council in turn, again as a matter of convenience, has vested entire control and management of the ground in a Committee, which it appoints annually, and which consists of one member of the Council, one Trustee, a Steward of the Race Club, and two members of the foreign community who take an active interest in outdoor games. There would seem to be room for some doubt as to which of these three authorities has the final say in such a matter as the charging of gate money. It has been laid down that the aforesaid committee "may make such bylaws and regulations as they deem necessary and convenient," but as any such laws and regulations have to be approved by the Municipal Council, obviously the committee could not of their own authority decide the matter. It remains to be seen, therefore, whether any council decision on "gate money" would require sanction by the Trustees.

No Clear Ruling.

One would expect to find very considerable difference of opinion among players and the public regarding the charging of admission to various games on the Recreation Ground. There can be no doubt but that the ground was originally intended for the free use of the public, and it is only of late years that the practice of charging admission to games has come into vogue. We believe we are right in saying that the Baseball Club is the first sporting organization which has received permission to charge gate money. Application made by other Clubs has been refused, notably in connexion with the Association Football interport games early in the year, in which instance the Association Committee met the refusal by erecting stands for a limited number of people and charging one dollar for a programme.

It remains to be said, however, that no sort of objection appears ever to have been raised by the crowed who go to see baseball to the payment of entrance money. Immense numbers of people go regularly to these games which are very popular and they appear to accept the gate charge as perfectly natural.

BURGLARY IN ROUTE PERE ROBERT

Shutters Forced at House of Mr. C. W. Hampson: Inmates Aroused but Robbers Escape

A burglary which, for sheer audacity and coolness, would be difficult to beat, occurred in the early hours of Monday morning at the home of Mr. C. W. Hampson, No. 309, Route Père Robert, a small detached house.

At about 2 o'clock Mrs. Hampson woke suddenly, feeling that something was wrong, and by the light of the moon, which was filtering through the shutters, saw a burglar in a long white gown busily engaged in rifling her dressing table. She switched on a light from the bed and the burglar promptly ran from the room on tip-toe, making absolutely no noise. Mrs. Hampson, fearing that the burglar might be armed, refrained from rousing her husband till she was sure that the intruder was well down the stairs; and when Mr. Hampson went down shortly afterwards there was no sign of life, either in the house or in the garden.

The house had been securely fastened on Sunday night at 10.30, and investigation showed that the burglars had obtained entrance by manipulating the shutter bolt through the slats, opening the shutters and then forcing a small window above the main window. Window and verandah door were found wide open by Mr. Hampson. The downstairs rooms were in a chaotic state; drawers and cupboards had been opened and their contents scattered everywhere; in the middle of the sitting room one man had evidently been disturbed in packing various articles into bundles; in the dining room the same states of affairs prevailed; while in the garden was a miscellaneous assortment of goods collected from all over the house, including such diverse items as towels, silverware, table linen, clothing, underclothing, and bedroom linen. Almost every moveable article of value had been removed from the bedroom, including some spare cash, Mrs Hampson's wrist watch, a lot of underclothing, and an electric torch which Mr. Hampson had accommodatingly left on his bedside table. The value of the missing articles—chiefly clothing—is in the region of $300; but the things the burglars fortunately left behind in their hasty departure are worth considerably more. They must have been either numerous or leisurely, for many cigarette ends and burnt matches were scattered over the house. They visited the ice chest and partook of a little light refreshment in the kitchen. The French Police headquarters—some 300 yards away—were requested to send a detective immediately the burglary was discovered but for some unexplained reason it was not until 6.30, two and a half hours after the occurrence that the first representative arrived on the scene, a Chinese detective.

One hundred merchants in Chapei are reported by the "Sinwanpao" to have closed up their shops on account of high-handed action taken by the local police in arresting innocent people. The trouble is stated to centre round a newly-erected row of houses known as Sai Yang Lee, off Paoshing Road. These new houses are alleged to be supplied with neither police protection, garbage bins nor water supply. Nevertheless police went the round of the houses collecting the Chapei Municipal Rates, and because one woman refused to pay they arrested an innocent shop assistant who was on a visit to her house. They went to the house later in the day and arrested yet another shop assistant, also innocent, hence the strike. The trouble is not yet settled.

FURTHER SEIZURES OF ARMS

Big Haul of Automatic Pistols and Ammunition on Board the M.M.S. Angkor

Within half an hour of the arrival of the French mail steamer Angkor on Wednesday, Customs officers who went aboard to make the usual search for contraband discovered 50 automatic pistols and 5,000 rounds of ammunition.

This is the sixth seizure in recent times on French mail boats, the others ships on which arms were found being the Chambord, Paul Lecat, André Lebon, Amboise and Angers—and it does seem that precautions which, we were recently assured, are taken against smuggling are inadequate.

The need for the most thorough and drastic measures in dealing with this nefarious traffic is once more emphasized in the "Municipal Gazette," this week, in which issue the Acting Commissioner of Police states:—

"Evidence shows the illicit arms traffic in Shanghai to be a thriving business conducted on a large scale. That so many foreigners engage in it is chiefly owing, no doubt, to the insignificent penalties involved in case of detection. In one Consular Court the maximum penalty is three months' imprisonment. In another it appears to be 29 days. In another, an arms runner recently caught in the act of selling arms to a Chinese was let off scot free on purely domestic grounds. In face of sentences of this kind it is not surprising that so many foreigners engage in a trade from which large profits are obtainable. But until (among other things) the punishments inflicted on foreign arms smugglers are made really deterrent, shooting affrays will continue to occur in the streets and the lives and limbs of the public will continue to be endangered, notwithstanding the very thorough training which policemen undergo in the handling and use of their weapons and the constant efforts made to impress on them that even when engaged in conflict with armed criminals the safety of the public is a prime consideration."

Will Not Customs Use Powers?

It cannot be said that the position has been overstated, and we would once again urge that every available power be brought to bear on the question. Unfortunately, there are no present signs of strong concerted action, or indeed action by any of the authorities concerned, and the position of the police is rendered all the more difficult by the widely varying attitudes to the matter taken up at various consulates. In a recent article on this subject, we referred to the formidable powers which the Customs authorities have been armed with for the purpose of dealing with this illicit and dangerous traffic, and there has since occurred a glaring breach of the law which it might have been thought would have justified the full use of these powers, but apparently only the ordinary procedure has been followed. So long, therefore, as the present method, or lack of method, is continued, the smuggling of arms must continue to flourish, and it would be unfair to blame the police for the consequences.

A Customs search party, acting upon information received, made a thorough examination of the Hamburg-America str. Rheinland on Thursday of last week and found a large quantity of revolvers and ammunition. Several cases of contraband were unearthed in the hold, which when opened revealed no less than 85 pstols of modern manufacture and 10,000 rounds of ammunition. The Rheinland, which had only come into port the night before, it will be recalled, is the motor vessel which went aground at Chefoo last winter, and was hauled off in most stormy weather by the Shanghai Tug & Lighter Co., after several weeks of strenuous efforts.

The speed with which the Customs officials found the secreted arms, after the ship had been in port less than 24 hours, is a striking example of the efficiency of this service in their efforts to make life and property in China safe. The Rheinland departed again on Saturday morning.

RUSSIAN CHURCH IN CHINA

Confraternity of St. Epiphany and Its Good Work Among Refugees of Shanghai

Although the Russian Orthodox Church has been severely persecuted during the years which have followed the great upheaval in that country, the Church is still alive to its responsibility towards the welfare of destitute people and no less towards Russian refugees in China. In Shanghai more than a year ago was established the Confraternity of St. Epiphany, a society organized to aid both the spiritual and material needs of the large number of Russians in Shanghai. The work of the past year has gone to show how needful such organizations are. And in spite of the insuperable obstacles which the society has had to meet, they have vigorously set to work, not forgetting the material wants of their compatriots. The spiritual activities have been embraced in various lectures and meetings on various religious topics.

The Confraternity expressed strong disapproval with regard to the innumerable persecutions of the Orthodox Church and especially the brutal treatment of the patriarch Tikhon. Protestations were sent to the Pope and the Archbishop of Canterbury, and from the former was received a favourable reply.

The society has also organized lectures in connexion with the Union of Russian Army and Navy men and the Russian Benevolent Society. The activities of the Society have more lately been turned towards the holding of adult classes for the benefit of those who were not able to complete their education as the result of the Russian Revolution. In this connexion evening classes have been held where refugees have been taught such subjects as Russian literature, history, mathematics, chemistry, anatomy, English and French.

The Training of Chauffeurs.

Courses are also given in motor driving in order to enable many Russians to become drivers and thus to find employment. A boarding school was also opened on April 13, 1924, at 719-721 Avenue Foch in order that Russian children may be isolated from the surroundings and piteous existence of the Russian refugees.

In 1923 the American Red Cross in Shanghai gave very substantial assistance for the organization of an Out-patients' Hospital for rendering assistance to needy Russians. The Committee lost no time in bringing this project to a reality. On October 8 it began to operate and large numbers of Russians have since received free medical attention. A report of its activities has already been published.

A Christmas tree was organized by the Confraternity last year, which was held at the French Police Club, kindly lent for the occasion. Presents of sweets and material for clothing were distributed among the children present. All the visitors were greatly impressed with that entertainment.

The society is doing a very good and helpful work to relieve the distress amongst Russians in China, and is worthy of the sympathy and support of other Christian institutions in this country.

THE pedicabs, which have just made their appearance in Shanghai, are not, as many seem to believe, of local manufacture. They were designed by the Société Belge pour l'Exportation Industrielle and made in Belgium.

INSP. C. Mills, of the Shanghai Municipal Police, who is at present on furlough in the neighbourhood of Oban, has been shooting seals in Loch Linnhe. Quite a number have appeared there and in the vicinity of a small island a few miles west of Fort William. Getting within rifle range of a colony of seals, Mr. Mills bagged two of them, the largest measuring 6ft.—probably the biggest that ever visit Scottish waters. Both of them managed to get back to the water after being shot, and sank, being recovered with difficulty. Two others shot by the same marksman were lost owing to their sinking in deep water.

THE PROJECTED CUSTOM HOUSE FOR SHANGHAI

SO-CALLED RICSHA STRIKE OVER

Coolies Themselves Never in It: Owners' Retort to Police Regulations

The Shanghai ricsha men were all back on the streets of Shanghai on Saturday afternoon after approximately 48 hours absence.

The movement, which inaccurately was called a strike, was according to authentic reports, no strike at all, for the coolies, anxious to make their living, did not care to leave their vehicles, but were forced to do so either by their employers, it is alleged, or by ruffians and hooligans, we understand, employed by ricsha owners.

All information leads one to believe that the small owners and some of the larger contractors, were in league against the police for what they considered undue severity in their condemnation of ricshas unfit for proper use. The Shanghai public may remember that some months ago restrictions were taken off by the Municipal authorities as to the number of public ricshas permitted on the streets; and instead of 8,000 of these, there are now many thousands more, among them all sorts of old crocks, hastily put together and repaired and shoved into the hire business.

Acting on instructions the police have, it is alleged by the proprietors, acted too harshly in taking away licence plates and condemning vehicles, and it is stated that for these reasons the owners ordered the ricshas to remain off the Settlement roads, as a protest.

There appears no question but that the acts of violence against the few pullers, who did go out, were not caused by the coolies at all, but rather by ruffians set on by the proprietors. For instance the pullers were so afraid of bodily harm, that on Friday evening a foreigner returning home from the Public Gardens from the concert could not get any one of 12 men to take him.

It is also quite a mistake to believe that the coolies were guilty of the attacks on pedicabs. There may have been instances in which a ricsha coolie took part, but in general such attacks were undoubtedly the work of roughs.

CHINA UNITED ASSCE. COMPANY

Important Addition to Original Scheme: Eight Stories Now Instead of Six

With regard to the now Building of the China United Assurance Society, about to be erected on Bubbling Well Road, opposite the Race-Course, from the plans of Elliott Hazzard, architect, to which reference was made in our issue of the July 21, it has been ascertained that since the preliminary plans drawn up important structural alterations have been made. The building is now to be eight stories instead of six, as the demand for space since the original publication of plans in the "North China Daily News" some months ago was such as to justify a much larger building.

A point of special interest in connexion with this building lies in its foundations. These are considerably above Municipal requirements in order effectually to prevent any undue sinking such as has been characteristic of most of the large buildings erected in Shanghai.

Many of the piles on which the concrete raft will stand are longer by at least 20 feet than any before used for Shanghai buildings. For example, the piles directly under the centre of the building are no less than 70 feet long, and these will be driven into the ground in one piece and not in spliced sections as is sometimes done. The piles are of Oregon pine and supplied by the China Import & Export Lumber Company.

YOKOHAMA SPECIE BANK OPENING

Informal Pleasant Ceremony: A Beautiful Building: Bank's 31 Years' Record

The opening of the splendid new building of the Yokohama Specie Bank at noon on Saturday was of an entirely informal character; indeed, so important an occasion in the history of the bank could scarcely have been accompanied by less ceremony. On behalf of the architects (Messrs. Palmer & Turner), Mr. M. H. Logan presented a beautifully wrought golden key to the manager of the bank (Mr. Gengo Hashidzumo), with the compliments of the firm and best wishes for the prosperity of the bank. With this informal little ceremony, the doors were thrown open and guests were free to inspect the very handsome banking hall, and partake of the bank's generous hospitality. There was a very large attendance, fully representative of the business and official world of Shanghai, many hundreds being visitors between the hours of noon and 2 o'clock. All were impressed by this exceedingly fine addition to Shanghai's new business houses, a testimony to the skill of the architects and to the progress of the bank. The interior design of the building is fully in keeping with its handsome exterior, the main hall of noble proportions occupying the entire ground floor area. In office accommodation, strong rooms, etc., the bank is admirably equipped.

When business is commenced in the new building, which will be on or about August 1, the Bank will have completed 31 years of progressive activity in Shanghai. The branch was first opened in May, 1893, in small premises in the Nanking Road. In the following year, a move was made to No. 21 the Bund, the building now occupied by the Netherlands Trading Society, but business was continued here for twelve months only, the outbreak of the Sino-Japanese war necessitating suspension of the bank's activity in Shanghai. Business was resumed in 1895, and its increasing volume necessitated yet another change of address to more spacious premises, offices being opened at No. 21 the Bund in 1900. Two years later, the first issue of notes was made by the Bank. Thenceforward, the business has continued to make steady progress, and the need for a spacious modern building was anticipated in 1911, when the bank purchased from Messrs. David Sassoon the site of the present building which is to be its permanent home. Mr. Gengo Hashidzumo, the present manager, became chief in November of last year, in succession to a number of managers who have served the bank brilliantly.

SOVIET AMNESTY TO WHITES

Pardon and Right of Return for Privates and N.C.O.'s Misled into Fighting the Reds

A notice has been issued by Mr. R. Elleder, Plenipoteniary of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Shanghai representative, a rough translation of which follows:—

"By order of All-Russian Central Executive Committee, from November 3, 1921, an amnesty is declared to the persons who took part in the military organization of Kolchak, Denikin, Wrangel, Savinkoff, Petlurá, Bulaka-Balakhovich, Peremykhin, and Udenich, in quality of private soldiers who by deception or conscription were drawn into the fight against the Soviet power.

"Soviet Russia struggled with armed enemies of the Workmen and Peasants, and defeated in open fight her enemies, though suffering incalculable losses. During the heavy and strenuous struggle the Soviet Government knew that thousands of Russian workers by deception and conscription were drawn into the fight against the Workmen and Peasants.

"Those deceived were led to fight for a cause not their own and when they were forced abroad they were left to their fate by their leaders. They are now outcast from their native heaths, and a cruel destiny has thrown them into different corners of the world.

"The Soviet power cannot be indifferent to the destiny of the workmen and peasants, who, having understood their mistakes, now desire to return to their native country and with their labour to make amends for their mistakes and to assist in the reconstruction of the commonwealth.

"By order of the Russian Central Executive Committee from June 9, 1924, this amnesty is broadened to include all White private soldiers in the Far East, Mongolia and Western China.

"The right of the amnesty is enjoyed by soldiers of a rank not higher than Unter Offizer (noncommissioned).

"Applications by persons affected by the amnesty and desirous of returning to the U.S.S.R., must be presented to the Chancellery of the U.S.S.R. in Shanghai, daily from 10 a.m. to 12 noon, except Saturdays and Sundays."

A concluding notice denies the following Russians citizenship:—

1. Those resident without Russia for five years without interruption and who are without passports from the Soviet.
2. Persons who left Russia after November 7, 1917, with Soviet permission.
3. Persons who voluntarily fought against the Soviet Power, or took part in any kind of counter-revolutionary organization.
4. Persons who had the right of option of acquiring citizenship but failed to make use of it in time.

These persons may, however, make applications before December 31, 1924.

ABOUT 4 a.m. on Monday a coolie employed at a cotton mill in Sinza Road made a murderous assault upon two fellow workers, a man and a woman, attacking them with a knife and a chopper. Both were seriously wounded, the man receiving injuries about the head, face, both hands and the body, and the woman receiving 10 knife wounds. The assailant, Tsang Kyung-phoo, was placed under arrest, and the two victims were conveyed to Shantung Road hospital.

SOVIET ATTACK ON A CHURCH

Russian Mission's Property in Shanghai Never Belonged to Imperial Government

Chinese police interference with a religious service at the Russian Church, has caused a considerable amount of apprehnsion amongst members of the Russian community concerned. A cordon of police was placed round the church, and so much excitement was caused among the congregation that, but for the presence of Mr. V. Grosse (who was able to assure the police that the gathering was not of a political nature, and who persuaded them to leave) there was some danger of a free fight taking place. A protest has been lodged with the Commissioner for Foreign Affairs, but no reply has yet been received.

This incident is, of course, connected with the dispute as to ownership of Russian Church property in China, which property the Chinese Government has agreed shall be handed over to the Soviet representative. This will not be done, however, without strong efforts being put forward to retain the property for its rightful owners, the Russian Orthodox Church Mission. We believe that the former Russian Imperial Government made grants to the mission towards the maintenance of its various activities, but was in no way responsible for the original cost of the Church's property. The church at Shanghai, which stands on Chinese ground, constitutes a special case, having many years ago been registered, at the American Consulate and in his own name, by Archbishop Innocent, head of the Russian Orthodox Mission church in North China. If, in spite of established right, the property is taken over by the Soviet, there are many Russians who will refuse to make use of it, preferring to establish a new church; in which case the Archbishop's benediction would be sufficient sanction for marriage, baptismal and other ceremonies.

It is of interest to note that, having failed in its intensive campaign against the Church in Russia, the Soviet has compromised to the extent of permitting its continuance, subject to payment of rent for church buildings which were seized and afterwards handed back, and of income tax and other charges.

MRS. YOUNGSON'S 50 YEARS IN CHINA

"Will Never Leave It:" Still in the Best of Health and Never Been Ill

Yesterday Mrs. M. A. Youngson, of 586 Rue de l'Observatoire, celebrated her 50th year in China. Mrs. Youngson came to Shanghai with her husband in 1874. Mr. Youngson was coming out to rejoin the Customs, and the young couple had been married but a few days before they commenced the voyage in a P. &. O. steamer. Since then Mrs. Youngson has lived practically all her life in Shanghai, and although she went Home after the death of her husband in August, 1897, and again recently when she intended to stop at Home for good, it was not so very long before the call of the East was too strong for her, and she came back to Shanghai with her family of six—four girls and two boys, and remained here. She stoutly affirms that Shanghai is the one place for her, and that she will never leave it. Indeed, in this determination she has reason on her side, for during her 50 years' residence she has never once been ill.

When the newly married couple first came out here in 1874 they spent a short honeymoon at the old Astor House Hotel for a month, after which they secured a house of their own. It was at this time that Mrs. Youngson first became identified with the activities of the Union Church, of which she has always been a hardworking member. She was connected with the Hanbury School for a number of years, being both teacher and matron there, and was immensely popular with children and staff alike.

Of Mrs. Youngson's children all are still alive except one, who, we regret to state, passed away a short time ago in England. Mr. A. Youngson, of Messrs. Brunner, Mond & Co., is the only one of her family in Shanghai still, the rest being in England.

MIRACULOUS OMEN OF EMPIRE

Gigantic Vegetable in Wayside Country Shaped Like the Imperial Dragon

From a Correspondent.

That the Empire is to return and the Dragon flag again fly over their heads is the belief of the people in the village of Zia Ka Za, which is situated at the extension of Thorburn Road in Chapei.

It seems that a farmer named Zai who has a small vegetable farm noticed among the vines one of peculiar shape which was much larger than the others. He watched it grow and in a short time he noticed that it was assuming the shape of the Chinese Dragon. He then began to cultivate it and watered it and hoed it very tenderly and last week it reached the size and shape of the perfect dragon. It was about 12 feet long, the body about nine inches thick and arched and coiled in the shape so common to those seen in the Chinese pictures, the head was about two feet long with the protruding eyes, about the size of a copper, the mouth was open and three teeth between which a redish tongue protruded from the mouth about six inches. On the under lip was a beard of a kind of moss and on the top of the head was what could be taken for two small horns. The tail was six feet long and came to a bushy end and there also was the same kind of moss as at the head.

The farmer Zai after placing a fence around it, called in the neighbours and showed them the symbol of the coming of the Empire. They agreed with him, but their love of the dollar and the chance they saw by exhibiting the find caused them to force the owner to agree to divide with them and charge admission to see the wonderful work of the gods. This was done and hundreds of people came, saw and were convinced that it was a sign that the gods were angry with the republic and would again bring back the beloved Empire with all its pomp and glory.

All went well for a few days and then came the usual trouble about the division of the funds and something like a riot was caused among the people, the whole village taking sides. The Chapei police soon heard of the affair and came and investigated, with the result that last Sunday a force of soldiers went out and cut off the head and tail of the dragon and carried it to headquarters. They also warned the village, it is said, that they must not tell anyone that this vine was a symbol of the Empire.

The people still come to the place where the body remains and they believe that it was a sure sign of the downfall of the Republic and the coming of the Empire.

The poor farmer sighs for the day when he will again see an Emperor on the Throne at Peking as he cannot see any difference between the present type of militarist and the old Imperial grafter, only that whenever the employee of the Emperor went too far he could be dismissed and punished, while today the militarist not only can take all the farmer has, in taxes, but neither be punished nor dismissed.

*Our contributor does not say that he has actually seen the dragon. Rumours can grow more than twelve feet ever between Thorburn Road, and the Bund. But the storn has its significance in these troubled days.—Ed.

A large gathering of friends assembled on the Customs Jetty yesterday to say farewell to Capt. T. J. Eldridge, who left for Home in the Empress of Canada on retirement after 36 years service in the Customs., Capt. Eldridge, as most residents are aware, has spent the greater part of his useful career in the Customs service. It was mainly due to his untiring efforts and enterprise that navigation along the China coast and the leading rivers has attained its present degree of safety. Last week his colleagues met at the drawing office of the Coast Inspectorate to say good-bye to their old chief, when Capt. Eldridge was presented with a number of valuable gifts.

GEN. HO FENG-LING AND CHAPEI WATERWORKS

Promise to Support Promoters of Private Co. Despite Nanking's Interference

Owing to what the Chapei residents consider to be the vacillating policy of the Civil Governor of Kiangsu (says the Chinese Press) a committee of Chapei public bodies has been formed to take over control of the Chapei Electricity and Waterworks.

This Committee sent a deputation to the office of the works on Tuesday morning and demanded to assume charge. One of the promoters there assured the deputation that the Civil Governor had pledged his word to devise other ways to convert the works into a commercial concern. Should the Administrative Court decide to quash the Draft Agreement, the promoters must still ask the Governor for authority before handing over to the Deputation. Neither would the promoters hand back the property to the officials. After several hours' discussion, the deputation agreed to withdraw for 24 hours during which time the promoters promised to obtain the Governor's decision as regards what steps he would take in future.

Mr. Hsu Chun-yung, of the Committee, however, received an urgent telegram from a friend at Nanking on Tuesday morning, stating that the Administrative Court has ordered the cancellation of the Draft Agreement.

Gen. Ho Feng-ling, Military Commissioner of Shanghai, upon receipt of a verbal appeal for support from Mr. Shen Lien-fang, the chief promoter, has replied: "I will guarantee from first to last that the Works will be transferred to a private company; you may hold the inaugural meeting on August 4; and if any change of official attitude should develop by that time, I shall take emergency action, as I have said before. As to depositing the price in my yamen, I think, it would cause me too much inconvenience to agree to this."

"Peremptory Behaviour."

According to latest reports the Civil Governor has now given a "peremptory" reply to the demands of the new company. Negotiations must, he says, be held up until the Administrative Court gives its decision, so the draft agreement cannot be executed. The Chapei residents' demand to take over the works without making any payment at all "oversteps all bounds of propriety." Accordingly the Constabulary Bureau, over which, as is well known, the local Military Governor who has promised Chapei his aid, has full control, is ordered "vigorously to restrain Chapei residents from taking such an improper course."

Chapei is consequently indignant, especially at the Civil Governor's statement as to the non-payment of the purchase price. This, says the Chinese press, has been tendered more than once, but the Governor has always refused to accept it. "Chapei people do not want to be treated as robbers and thieves."

We are informed by the Chinese Post Office that regulations have become effective in America whereby letters containing merchandise, or having by their bulk the appearance of containing merchandise, will be treated as undeliverable in U.S.A. and returned to senders unless the covers are endorsed "May be opened for Customs purposes before delivery."

The "Evening Post," a new evening paper in English of which Mr. Francis Zia is managing editor, made its appearance last week. Containing at present only local news, the first number is mainly devoted to political causerie of a Southern persuasion—"Dialogues on Current Topics," which with other features of the paper is to be continued from day to day. For a purely Chinese venture, there is a notable absence of the simple-minded sentiments and appalling platitudes into which the student writing English almost invariably falls. We are asked to state that specimen copies will be furnished free to any who are interested in the venture "or the study of the Kuan-hua or Wen Li." This is rather surprising as the copy before us has no Chinese section.

COMPANY MEETINGS

BUKIT TOH ALANG RUBBER ESTATES

Annual General Meeting

The annual meeting of the Bukit Toh Alang Rubber Estates, Ld., was held last Friday afternoon in the offices of the secretaries and managers, Messrs. J. A. Wattie & Co., 19 Canton Road Mr. G. Grayrigge, chairman, presided, supported by Mr. R. I. Fearon (director) and shareholders representing 85,543 shares. The Chairman said:—

Gentlemen, These being the dog days when a long speech would be a weariness to listen to, I propose to say what I have to say in the fewest words possible.

The report in your hands tells you exactly what progress has been accomplished during our last fiscal year. As regards Bukit Toh Alang proper, we have there quite a good property, in good condition and a good yielder. I saw it myself in 1922 and was well satisfied.

Last annual meeting, the Chairman dealt in extenso with the policy of the board to Kuala Kettil. I have now to report that the squatter planting scheme has been and is being carried out so far without a single hitch. On this division we have 318 acres of mature untapped rubber some of it comprising the best looking stuff I saw in my 1922 tour. We have 462 acres planted in 1923/4 and we shall have the balance of 876 acres planted by the coming October.

To finance this Kuala Kettil division to maturity from April 1924, to say, mid 1929, we shall have to outlay some Straits $228,000, against which we have capital unissued of Tls. 128,500. I mention this specially to show you that it is not the policy of the board to finance Kuala Kettil out of profits at the expense of dividends.

Granted nothing goes wrong, by mid 1929 we shall have a mature area of 2677 acres with a capital of Tls. 500,000 representing Tls. 187 per acre which will compare favourably with any company in the same business.

The re-organization of the capital and the new subscription were a great success and placed the company in a satisfactory financial position. The development accounts, buildings, etc., were drastically written down and stand now at nominal figures, we are free of debt, and we have money in hand.

The balance available for distribution in profit and loss account is Tls. 48,136.93 out of which the writing off of sundry items of assets to Tl. 1 each is recommended and that the balance of Tls. 45,057.10 be carried forward.

The cash in the accounts is more than sufficient for a 10 per cent. dividend on the issued capital but the continued fall in the selling price and the present low level of rubber cause the board to adopt a policy of better be safe than sorry. If market prospects sufficiently improve during the year the board will have no hesitation in declaring an interim dividend but until we can see clearer what is ahead of us, the cash is better in the bank.

Before putting the resolutions to the meeting, I wish to thank Major Jensen, our estate manager, and his staff for their continued excellent work during the past year.

The following resolutions were formally adopted:—

That the report of the directors and audited statement of accounts for the year ended March 31, 1924, as presented, and the disposal of the credit at profit and loss account as recommended be adopted and passed—proposed by the Chairman and seconded by Mr. R. I. Fearon.

That the appointments of Messrs. R. I. Fearon, V. Meyer and G. Grayrigge as directors of the company be and are hereby confirmed—proposed by Mr. A. K. Craddock and seconded by Mr. J. McMahon.

That Messrs. Lowe, Bingham & Matthews be and are hereby re-elected auditors to the company for the ensuing year—proposed by Mr. Woo Chi Ming and seconded by Mr. A. K. Craddock.

The Coast Inspector reports that the Japanese Admiralty states that a derelict fishing vessel 70 feet long, painted white, was sighted on July 15 in lat. 31 deg. 4' N. long. 125 deg. 12' E.

TEBONG RUBBER & TAPIOCA ESTATE, LD.

Liquidator's Annual Statement

A formal meeting of the Tebong Rubber & Tapioca Estate, Ld., in voluntary liquidation, was held at the company's offices, 10 Canton Road, n Wednesday. Mr. G. Grayrigge presided.

Mr. Grayrigge said:

Gentlemen, — As attorney for Mr. Welch who is at present absent from Shanghai, I have called this meeting to comply with the Hongkong Ordinances which make it necessary for the liquidator to summon a general meeting of the company at the end of the first year from the commencement of the winding up and of each succeeding year to lay before the meeting an account of his acts and dealings and of the conduct of the winding up during the preceding year.

You are already aware that as per agreement, the liabilities of the old company have been defrayed by the new company, that the assets were also taken over by the new company, and that no actual property came into the possession of the liquidator, therefore there are no accounts to be submitted.

There are at present a number of certificates of the old company which have not yet been presented for exchange for shares of the new company.

As the liquidation cannot be longer delayed through this cause, the new shares unclaimed will have to be transferred to the name of a trustee, but I hope that those shareholders who have not exchanged their scrip will do so immediately.

It is the hope of the liquidator to complete the liquidation by the end of this year, when another meeting will be called in accordance with section 188 of the Companies Ordinances.

This concluded the business of the meeting.

Silver.

The price came yesterday 34 7/16d. ready and 34 9/16d. forward, against 34 9/16d. and 34 11/16d. a week ago, showing a fall of ⅛d. on both quotations, the lowest quotations during the week being 34 9/16d. ready and 34 11/16d. forward. China both bought and sold and the Continent is reported as having been a buyer most days of the week.

Bars in stock 2,678, including Silver Yen 10 lakhs. Stocks of Sycee and Dollars amount to Tls. 390½ lakhs and $420½ lakhs, against Tls. 392 lakhs and $421 lakhs last week, and Tls. 230 lakhs and $284 lakhs on July 24, 1923.

Exchange.

Exchange left off last week with the official quotation for T.T. at 3/3¼d., where it remained until Monday, when it opened ⅛d. down at T.T. 3/3d. At this figure it remained until yesterday morning, when it was raised to T.T. 3/3⅛d. Yesterday morning the market opened steady, with sellers of T.T. at 3/3 1/16d. July and 1/16d. up per month to October, Gold $ T.T. 72⅛ July and ⅛th up per month to October, gradually firming up until 3/3 3/16d. July was available. The market closed for the tiffin interval steady at sellers T.T. 3/3⅛d. July and 1/16d. up per month to October, with very little merchant business doing.

THE SILVER MARKET

Reporting from London on June 18, Messrs. Samuel Montagu & Co. state:—

The silver market has remained quiet and business has been on a small scale. Purchases have been made to cover bear sales, but at any advance in prices, there seemed a tendency on the part of buyers to withhold support until to-day, when inquiry from the Continent carried the quotations to 35d. and 34⅞d. for cash and forward delivery, respectively. China has figured both as buyer and seller and the undertone of the market remains good.

Reuter reported on June 12 from Bombay that the monsoon had broken. We are advised from Bombay by the mail of the 30th ult. as follows:—

"There was very large business doing in the Bombay silver market during the week. Speculators were operating freely. Banks also bought and sold. As the monsoon is now approaching and the offtake is likely to decrease, the bazaar is not expected to buy much silver in America or London during June. The stock of silver in Bombay is about 7,000 bars and the upcountry demand for the metal is about 150 bars per day."

The silver quotations to-day for cash and two months' delivery are respectively ⅛d. and ⅛d. above those fixed a week ago.

Upward Tendency.

Messrs. Mocatta & Goldsmid, reporting on June 19, state:—

There has been very little movement in the price of silver during the past week, but the tendency has been slightly upward and the quotation to-day is 34⅞, as against 34 11/16 a week ago. America has sold rather freely on most days, but most of this silver has been absorbed by the Continental purchases, in the absence of any demand for shipment either to India or China. There has, however, been a certain amount of adjustment of their positions by bears and bulls and there has been a fair amount of business done.

Considering the sharp advance from 33d. to 35⅛d. which we had in May, the market has kept remarkably steady at the higher level, especially in view of the fact that the Continent has only bought very moderately during the past three weeks. The difference between the spot and forward quotations has shown a tendency to narrow and to-day is only 1/16d. This is not due to there being any larger stock of silver, but to the fact that most of the buying is for forward dates, whilst America is selling prompt delivery. The market has adopted rather a waiting attitude at the moment, neither buyers nor sellers showing much disposition to operate largely, but the undertone is good and some further advance seems possible.

THE GOLD MARKET

Reporting from London on June 18, Messrs. Samuel Montagu & Co. state:—

The Bank of England gold reserve against its note issue on the 11th instant amounted to £126,383,985, as compared with £126,357,625 on the previous Wednesday.

India has taken a moderate proportion of the substantial supplies of gold available this week. Gold to the value of $880,000 has arrived in New York from London.

The United Kingdom imports and exports of gold during the month of May were as follows:—

	Imports £	Exports £
Netherlands	20,512	32,400
Belgium	—	4,865
France	300	120,745
Spain and Canaries.	—	59,235

Total	3,367,345	6,278,897

According to "The Times" of the 6th instant the Polish Treasury offices have received orders to exchange bank notes against silver and copper to an unlimited extent. This order would appear to be inspired by a desire to stimulate confidence in the currency system.

U. S. SILVER SHORTAGE

Silver exported from the United States for the first five months of this year amounted to $42,928,841 against £21,679,462 for the corresponding period of last year and $28,531,725 in 1922. Imports were $29,748,428 against $22,254,415 last year and $28,531,725 two years ago. Excess exports were $13,180,413, against excess imports in the two previous periods. In other words the country used about 17,000,000 ounces of domestic production and supplies to take care of export business. On hand supplies of silver at the beginning of the year may have been around 10,000,000 ounces so that there is an actual shortage of 7,000,000 ounces. Reports for three years, compared, are as follow:—

COST OF DOLLAR COINS

According to the estimate of the Government Mint in Nanking, the cost of coining a dollar coin is equivalent to Shanghai Tls. 0.727984. The mint has a capacity for turning out 120,000 coins a day and the cost, including running and overhead expenses as shown below, amounts in total to Kuping Tls. 79,705.88; that is, Kuping Tls. 6,642.157, or Shanghai Tls. 7,279.84 for every 10,000 dollars coined. The tael used in the following list is the Kuping tael:—

	Tls.
Price of bullion	78,067,005
Cost of copper ball for alloy	142,558
Loss of weight in bullion caused by smelting	234,201
Loss of weight caused by re-smelting of discarded coins	99,066
Loss caused by coin-assaying	57.38
Loss caused by Assaying and Chemical Analysis	9.83
Loss caused by smelting of copper balls	0.774

Daily expenses for upkeep of machinery	12.827
Interest on capital	134,426
Daily miscellaneous expenses	46.69
Daily salaries for executive staff	154.1
Total	79,705.88 Kuping.

Note.—A Kuping tael is a unit formerly adopted by the Government in the collection of the land tax, just as the Haikuan tael was adopted by the Customs. A Kuping tael in value is nearly 10 per cent. more than a Shanghai tael, but about 2 per cent. less than a Haikuan tael. A Kuping tael is equivalent to Tls. 1.096 Shanghai, while a Haikuan tael is equivalent to Shanghai Tls. 1.114.

SHANGHAI MARKET REPORT

A Better Tone Generally and Quotations Firmer: Considerable Improvement in Produce

July 26.

The past week has been one of those curious periods when everybody has been happy without anything very definite to show for it. A little increase in actual business has been recorded in piece goods, prices are somewhat firmer and the tone is considered to be much better, but nothing more can be said. Everyone is hoping for the best and there is again a generally optimistic feeling. The produce market is much brighter and the prospects are quite cheerful.

Piece Goods.

Indent firms record a considerable improvement in business during the week, several circumstances having combined to enliven the market. The floods in many areas have subsided and a number of contracts have been concluded for up-country. Szechuan in particular has been very active and has taken quite substantial cargoes. Taken all round, there is a much better tone in the market and prices are firmer.

Cotton, Yarn, etc.

China Cotton.—The very decided advance in American quotations has had the effect of stopping the lower tendency here and prices have appreciated noticeably. The market now is very strong. Yesterday's spot quotations were:—Shensi, Tls. 45 to Tls. 46; Hankow, Tls. 44.50 to Tls. 45. The quotations on the Chinese Cotton Goods Exchange were:—July, 47.50; August, 47.65; September, 43.40; October, 41.35; November, 41.05; December, 40.75.

Yarn.—Trade still is dull and prices are not keeping time with the advance in cotton. Yesterday's quotations on the Chinese Cotton Goods Exchange were:—July, 173.-80; August, 173.10; September, 170.40; October, 166.70; November, 166.10; December, 165.30.

Produce.

The general outlook of the produce export market is unchanged. Inquiries still are coming forward for the remains of last season's cargo and the shortage of supplies is forcing up the local values. The demand of the past few weeks for groundnuts continues, but supplies practically are exhausted. Buyers indicate a willingness to pay £23. 10s. per ton c.i.f. Europe. A few sales of rapeseed to Europe have been reported, but at prices obviously speculative. It is too early yet to determine with any accuracy the crop and prospects and dealers are disinclined to discuss business on account of floods in the productive areas. The local market for albumen has advanced strongly in respones to the recent demand from Europe and sellers now ask the equivalent of 4s. 6d. lb. c.i.f. Already there are inquiries for new crop tobacco, but prices still are considerably out of line. It is expected that the crop will be good in quality and plentiful. Business in other lines is negligible.

BIG ADVANCE IN COTTON PRICES

New York, July 23.

Cotton advanced to-day 160 to 185 points on heavy speculative general buying owing to heat and drought in the south-west. Many large Wall Street and Western traders, who are prominently identified with the advance in grains, were heavy buyers of cotton.—Reuter's American Service.

JAPAN-CHINA TRADE

The last half year's export trade of Japan with China reached Y.175,025,000, being Y.48,914,000 more than that for the some period of 1923. As for the import trade, the total amount Japan imported during the last six months is estimated at Y.83,249,000 which is Y.10,380,000 less than the figures for the first half of 1923.

Following are the figures for the first halves of the last six years:—

	Export (Y. 1,000)	Import (Y. 1,000)
First half of 1919	205,900	115,057

S. C. C. 2nd. v. S. R. C. 2nd.

On the ground of the Shanghai Cricket Club. The home team batted first and made the respectable total of 218, major credit for which went to Duckitt with 64, and Leslie with 42, as the result of hard hitting.

The Recs replied with 151, R. J. S. Brandt, going in first wicket down, playing through the innings and carrying his bat for 56.

Everything else in the match was dwarfed by the bowling of T. L. Rawsthorne. He opened the bowling and kept on throughout, securing all ten wickets in 14 overs at a total cost of 30 runs. This feat, we believe, is unique in local cricket.

LAWN TENNIS

Probst, Hanbury & Co. Retain Hong Doubles Championship

There was a very fair attendance at the Majestic Hotel grounds last Friday afternoon to witness the Hong Doubles final, between the holders of the championship, J. L. Wade and H. Collaco (Probst, Hanbury & Co.), and J. P. Hawes and C. Sofoulis (Standard Oil Co.). Following on their excellent game against the Stock Exchange in the semi-final, the Standard Oil representatives were expected to give the holders a very close game, and were even regarded as probable winners; and certainly they began in a style which was extremely promising. Skilful individual play and excellent combination gave them the first two games, won with apparent ease, but this form was not maintained and they fell away badly, particularly towards the end of the match. Once Wade and Collaco settled down to their game they invariably had an advantage over their opponents and, having drawn level at two-all, they went ahead and won the first set at 6-4. Many of the games were closely contested and provided rallies cleverly played and interesting to watch, but with this set ended, the contest was practically over. Wade and Collaco took the second set very easily (6-1), and they might have gained the third with the same score but for a little slacking at 5-1. Hawes and Sofoulis got a game, and then another one, but the next went to Wade (6-3), and so the match.

Proposed Alteration of Davis Cup Conditions

London, July 22.

A meeting of the Council of the Lawn Tennis Association in London, at which Japan was represented, to-day recommended the following alterations in the Davis Cup conditions. The courts should be either grass, turf or a natural or artificial gritty material, the choice of ground, court-surface and make of ball should be determined by priority in the draw and a player representing a nation under residential qualification shall be eligible to represent the nation of his birth after a two years' interval.

The present regulations says that ties must be played on grass unless otherwise agreed.—Reuter.

LORD Derby was congratulated at Wellington College speech day on being the first Wellingtonian to win the Derby. In reply he said it was at Wellington he had his first bet, putting a shilling on the winner of the Derby. He was not paid, because the boy who laid the odds was bigger than himself!

WHETHER BECAUSE OF THE HEAT OR FOR OTHER REASONS CRICKET IS NOT THE GAME IT WAS WHY NOT TRY TWO BOWLERS AT ONCE ?
OR TWO BATSMEN AT EACH WICKET ?
IF MORE THAN TWO MAIDEN OVERS ARE BOWLED THE BATSMEN SHALL BE COMPELLED TO RUN
THE UMPIRES SHOULD KEEP THE FIELD AWAKE WITH RATTLES
YOU WITH THE TURNIP FACE YOU SWING LIKE A RUSTY GATE!
AND A LITTLE ROOTING BY THE WICKETKEEPER WOULD CERTAINLY BRIGHTEN THINGS UP

Further American Victories in Tennis Doubles Finals

Paris, July 21.

In the final of the Olympic Lawn tennis doubles, Hunter and Richards (America) beat Brugnon and Cochet (France), 4-6, 6-2, 6-3, 2-6, 6-3.

In the Mixed Doubles final, Williams and Mrs. Wightman (America) beat Richards and Mrs. Jessup (America), 6-2, 6-3.

In the play-off for the third place by the beaten semi-finalists in the doubles, Borotra and Lacoste (France beat Condon and Richardson (South Africa), 6-3, 10-8, 6-3.

The final placings were: America 55 points, France 28 points, Britain 16 points, Italy and Holland 4 points, and South Africa 3 points.

In the final of the doubles, the game began listlessly in close, overcast weather. Periods of base-line play, broken by occasional rallies and excursions to the net, livened up the third set. Cochet made brilliant smashes and Richards was serving brilliantly. Richards dominated the fourth set, though Cochet was irresistible and his very accurate placing frequently caught the Americans out of position. The Americans brought to bear a steady and determined pressure in the final set.—Reuter.

Some Questionable Decisions

London, July 21.

Disorderly incidents following numerous decisions at the Olympic Games are creating grave doubts among British Olympic Games correspondents as to whether Britain will ever again compete.

The Paris correspondent of the "Times" enumerates the unsportsmanlike and sometimes disgraceful scenes, of which, he states, the Americans have been the principal victims, although several other nations have cause for complaint. He alludes to the culminating case of the British boxer, Mallin, who, it is alleged, was fouled by a French boxer, though the latter received the decision. After that all the English-speaking nations, Britain, America, Canada, Australia and South Africa, announced their intention to withdraw en bloc unless the decision were reversed. This was done, but the correspondent declares that the fact demonstrated that the games exacerbate international bitternesses instead of soothing them.

The "Times," in a leading article, endorses this opinion. It anticipates that the Americans share the British view and that the death-knell of the Olympic Games has sounded.—Reuter.

British Athletes Opposed to Withdrawal from Future Contests

London, July 23.

The opinions of British athletes, voiced in British newspapers, strongly oppose the movement that Britain should withdraw from future Olympiads because of the demonstrations of Latin temperament in minor events. They point out that a remarkable feature of the Paris Olympiad has been the friendliness between the English-speaking competitors, including the Americans. It is regarded as curious that the curious controversy should be revived when Britain has carried off the championship in which Britons take most pride.

Reuter's Paris correspondent states that Baron de Coubertin, the President of the International Olympic Committee, denies that the games in Paris have destroyed the spirit of international sportmanship and deprecates discouragement because of a few cases of lack of discipline. He accuses the French press of failing to educate the public to the true significance of the games and declares that the attitude of the press is responsible for the lamentations.—Reuter.

American Press Opinion

New York, July 23.

Much interest has been evoked here by the discussion in the London press of the question of suppressing the Olympic Games.

The "New York World" says that the only answer to the crowd at Colombes is continued participation with unaltered equanimity.

The "New York Times" says that it would be lamentable if the Games had to be given up. There is no necessity to do so owing to a few squabbles.—Reuter's American Service.

THE "Shunpao" reported last Friday that arrangements have been made in Shanghai for the transfer of sycee to the value of $12,000,000 to Kuangtung, to be used in minting Sun Yat-sen coins. The report states that silver for this purpose has been gathered from various parts, and that $6,000,000 has already been shipped, and that the balance will be sent down in a fortnight's time.

"JACKO" is the new mascot of the American Legation Guard. He is a very small monkey and has been court-martialled three times. Jacko is a familiar sight to all frequenters of the Guard swimming-pool and can be seen in the Guard compound nearly every afternoon. Although scarcely of a vindictive temperament, he is nevertheless of a vengeful one and is known to have avenged insults that were offered him some weeks before. He has also climbed the wireless masts of the American Legation and on one occasion he went to the second rest, a height of 150 feet.

LAW REPORTS

CAPTAIN'S WARNING TO SHROFFS

Entered House "at Their Own Risk:" Dairy Co.'s Claim for $10

Capt. Carmichael, marine and cargo surveyor, of 11 Ezra Road, was sued at H. M. Supreme Court on Thursday by the Inshallah Dairy & Stock Co. for $10.56, alleged to be due for eggs supplied to defendant in 1921.

Mr. A. M. A. Evans, manager of the dairy, told his Honour Judge Granin that Capt. Carmichael had dealt with the dairy for some time, and usually paid his account every two or three months, by cheque. In 1921 he apparently left Shanghai and the account was owing. They heard nothing more till they saw an advertisement in the newspapers this year stating that Capt. Carmichel would be responsible for no debts save those he contracted himself. Some time after witness met defendant in Erza Road and the next day sent a shroff round to collect the account. The shroff returned stating that Capt. Carmichel refused to pay. The shroff was sent round repeatedly and always returned with the same story. One morning defendant rang witness up on the telephone and said it "was a damned nuisance the shroff coming round and waking him up at 10 o'clock in the morning when he had just come off the bridge after a hard night's work. It was always his practice to pay his debts by cheque." The account was sent round several times and defendant still refused to pay. Witness produced the accounts in question and the receipts given to the shroff to hand to defendant on receiving the money.

Never Received the Eggs.

In reply to the Judge, Capt. Carmichael said he knew absolutely nothing about the matter. To the best of his knowledge he had never received the goods.

Defendant, in evidence, went on to state that he left Shanghai in 1921, believing he was never coming back. Before going away he hired a motor-car and for two days went round the town paying all his debts. He was quite certain he did not then owe a copper cash. Then, this bill had been sent round only within the last few weeks and it seemed rather remarkable to him that they should just remember it. He could honestly say that to the best of his recollection he had never received the eggs. He used to deal with this particular dairy at one time, till one day a Chinese came to him and offered him Pootung eggs at 15 cents cheaper than the dairy eggs. This Chinese also said that the eggs witness was getting from the dairy were never laid there at all, but were supplied to the dairy by himself. The shroffs were a nuisance coming to see witness when he was asleep in bed after a hard night's piloting. As a matter of fact he had notices up at the bottom of his stairs in both Chinese and English with the warning that shroffs who came to see him did so at their own risk.

The case was adjourned till next morning in order that the dairy might bring evidence proving delivery of the goods.

JUDGMENT AGAINST TENANT

At H. M. Supreme Court on Monday, before Judge Grain, Ezra Shahmoon obtained judgment against A. Ross for the sum of $100 rent and $50 mesne profits in connexion with premises at No. 40 Tatung Road.

Mr. J. E. Salmon appeared for plaintiff.

Mr. Salmon first explained to the Court that Mr. Charles White was representing plaintiff in this matter, he having charge of plaintiff's property at the time. The house was let to the defendant from Chinese moon. He had failed to pay the rent on the fourth and fifth moons of this year, and in consequence notice was served on him to quit on May 30 last. He failed to do so, however, and neither did he pay the rent. Consequently they now asked for an order for possession with arears of rent and mesne profits.

Mr. Charles White gave evidence bearing out counsel's statement.

Defendant told the Court that he had been in the house for seven years and had always paid his rent regularly. Now that he was in a difficult position it seemed hard that he should have to be turned out.

Mr. White said this statement was not strictly accurate. They had had to threaten to sue him for his rent on a number of occasions.

Judgment was given for plaintiff with costs.

OIL IN THE RIVER: G.$100 FINE

Dollar Line Captain Charged: U. S. Commissioner on Gravity of Offence

Capt. Jones Pendlebury, master of the Dollar Line str. President Adams, was charged before Mr. Lurton at the U. S. Commissioner's Court last Friday with polluting the Huangpu with fuel oil. Mr. Addis and Mr. J. B. Brown, instructed by the Maritime Customs, prosecuted, and Major C. P. Holcomb defended.

The defendant pleaded guilty.

Mr. Addis, for the prosecution, described how the thick liquid had spread over the water, and stated the dangers to which the Settlement was menaced by oil in the river. It was not necessary to proceed with evidence, as defendant had pleaded guilty and made a statement to the effect that he was unaware of the escape of oil, but that upon his attention being called to the fact, he found that a fireman, who was cleaning the boilers, had opened an oil valve by mistake, instead of a water valve.

Major Holcomb told the Court that his clients, the Dollar Line, were doing everything possible to co-operate with the harbour authorities in keeping the river clean, having gone as far as to request each master before his vessel reached port to use every care to avoid seepage. Defendant, of his own knowledge, was unaware of the loss, but as master of the vessel, must be held responsible.

The Commissioner imposed a fine of $100 (U. S. currency) with costs and in the course of a written judgment said:—

The defendant has pleaded guilty and the facts of the case show that this is an offence of a very grave and serious character, due to the danger to the water supply of the city of Shanghai becoming seriously impaired. It also shows that the discharge of oil in the river would seriously menace the shipping of this port, due to the fact that there is a possibility of oil catching on fire and being carried to the vessels in this port.

SEAMEN'S ALLEGATIONS AGAINST U. S. CONSUL

Sent to Shanghai with Coolies following Scene at Consulate: Action for Passages Home

The hearing was resumed by Mr. Lurton at the U. S. Commissioner's Court on Wednesday of the action by eight former seamen of the str. Owego against the master for additional wages and transportation to Seattle, to which they allege they are entitled under the terms of their articles.

Mr. Allan appears for plaintiffs and Mr. W. S. Fleming for defendants.

S. Hughes, employed in the vessel, stated that he had signed a six-months' contract when he joined the ship on March 5, which could be terminated on his return to the States. Upon the arrival of the Owego at Foochow he had been paid M. $130 and sent to Shanghai with Chinese passengers in the str. Ningshin. Since that time he had paid for his own subsistence in this port.

Witness went on to say that the entire party were to travel in the str. Manila Maru, but it seemed that no arrangements were made for their passage. The party was still in Shanghai. The U. S. Consul in Foochow promised them European steerage passages, not Oriental, and the first thing he did was to put them among the Chinese in the Ningshin for Shanghai. Witness protested and words passed. The Consul, said witness, told him he could bring an action in the Courts, but advised him not to do so in Foochow, for he (the Consul) held the powers of a judge there.

Mr. Fleming (cross-examining) asked witness if he denied that he had been offered a ticket to America, to which on being pressed he retorted three times, "I wanted a ticket to America, but it was refused me."

And you insist that Mr. Price (the Consul) threatened to put you in irons?—Yes.

Witness refused to admit that he drank heavily in Foochow or that he made a nuisance of himself.

Another witness gave a similar recital of alleged injuries and when his evidence had been concluded Mr. Allan explained that if the Court wished to hear the remainder of the men, he would call them, but with the exception of dates as to when they were signed on and small details (all of which were included in the affidavits), their evidence was identical.

At the request of Mr. Fleming, who said he had not received Mr. Price's deposition from Foochow, the hearing was adjourned until August 2.

THREAT TO BOMB SINCERE'S

Four and Half Years' Sentence in Blackmail Case at Mixed Court

Sentence of four and a half years' imprisonment was passed on two Chinese at the Mixed Court last Friday, for writing threatening letters to the Sincere Co. demanding $10,000.

The evidence showed that on July 8 letters were received threatening that if this sum was refused the writer would have resort to the use of explosives, and the damage thereby would be considerably greater than the sum mentioned. In consequence a watch was placed at the address mentioned in the letter where the money was to be paid. A lodger who lived in the house was seen to take the letter and was immediately arrested along with four other companions who shared his room.

The first accused admitted that he had written the letter, but at the instigation of the fourth accused. He also said that another man who lived in the French Concession was connected with the affair, but had not been arrested.

Mr. Maitland, for the police, said that the case was quite as bad as that of armed robbery. The accused persons had threatened to use bombs and pistols and he therefore asked the Court to hand them over to the Arsenal for execution.

Two of the accused, as stated, were sentenced to four and a half years' and expelled from the Settlement. Two other prisoners were also expelled as the associates of criminals.

BILLIARD TROPHIES STOLEN FROM S'HAI CLUB

Thief Who Lowered Plate by Fishing Line from Billiard Rm.: Bar Boy Charged

An enterprising bar boy in the employ of the Shanghai Club appeared before Mr. Martin, British Assessor, and Magistrate Tsao at the Mixed Court on Wednesday charged with the theft of the Shanghai Amateur Billiard Association Cup and the Shanghai Club Cup from the billiard room of the Shanghai Club.

The young man is alleged to have accomplished the theft by tying the pieces of plate on to the end of a fishing line and then letting them down out of a window in the club on to a little heap of sand underneath. Then he went round and collected the cups. Needless to state the billiard-room was closed at the time.

Det. Sub-Insp. Hunter related to the Court how at about half past ten on Tuesday morning he received a message from Capt. Barrett to the effect that the silver was missing, and was given instructions to recapture it.

Cups Returned by Pawnbroker.

The cups had been taken to Hongkew police-station by a pawnbroker, whose assistant had innocently accepted them from the thief and paid over $35 in exchange. When his master saw the cups, however, and noticed foreign inscriptions on them he immediately became suspicious and took them to the police-station. The assistant was taken to the Shanghai Club by Det. Hunter and shown the various bar boys and coolies who could possibly have committed the theft. He failed to pick out the delinquent, but on inquiries being made the No. 18 bar boy seemed indicated. This boy was the only one who affected European clothing, whilst the man who sold the cups also wore European clothes. On being confronted with this man the assistant recognized him as the man who pawned the cups, and when arrested he confessed. Detective Hunter went on to ask for a remand in custody, which was granted for one week.

In the dock on Wednesday, prisoner appeared in a very neat brown suit, silk shirt and accurately tied bow. He was arrested at the New World.

$16,000 DAMAGES FOR SHIP'S OFFICER

China Merchants to Pay: Gravity of Vinogradoff's Injuries

A. M. Vinogradoff, the ship's officer who brought a claim for Tls. 48,000 against the China Merchants' S. N. Co. for serious injuries sustained through falling from an unsafe ladder into the hold of the str. Hsinming in which he was employed as second officer, was on Thursday at the Mixed Court awarded $16,000 damages. The case, it will be recalled, had been before the Court for upwards of a year, and the hearing of expert evidence, both medical and technical, was only recently concluded. Mr. P. Faison and Mr. Fishman appeared for plaintiff and Mr. Lipson Ward for defendants.

The Court found that plaintiff's injuries from a fall had probably resulted partly in the awakening of his old sickness and thereby rendered impossible forever a return to his normal state of health. As regards the said ladder no mishap had ever occurred to the workmen who went up or down

Plaintiff in his capacity as second officer, should have known the condition of the ship and should have been careful at all times as to whether the said ladder was safe or unsafe in going up or down.

It was partly through his own carelessness that he had fallen down and as a result sustained injuries which in no way could attach blame to the China Merchants' S. N. Co.

The Court, however, took into consideration the gravity of plaintiffs injuries sustained as a result of a fall in the course of his public duties and also of the fact that it would be impossible for his health to return to a normal state.

The China Merchants' S. N. Co. would therefore, be ordered to pay to plaintiff compensation in the sum of Mex. $16,000, including in this amount salary and medical expenses of plaintiff. Further the defendants would pay the Court fees in the cause and the expenses of Dr. Ransom's examination to the amount of Shanghai Tls. 110, judgment to be satisfied within two weeks from date.

The Court considered it necessary to state that the case could in no way be considered as a precedent. The judgment was final and the Court was not prepared to hear any application for a rehearing.

At H. M. Police Court last Friday, an Indian was charged before Mr. G. W. King with having been drunk and disorderly in East Hanbury Road on Thursday evening. It appeared that the culprit had had too much Hongkew firewater, causing him to upset a hawker's stall and scatter cakes and other delicacies about the roadway, and to give some trouble to the Chinese who, hauled him to the police station. He was ordered to pay $2 compensation to the hawker and pay a fine of $5, or spend the next seven days in gaol.

SOUTHERN RHODESIA

SOUTHERN Rhodesia which was inaugurated as the youngest self governing Colony of the British Empire on October 1, 1923, and which had previously for 33 years been ably administered by the British South Africa Company possesses one of the finest climates in the world with long hours of sunshine, breezy temperate days and cool nights. For those who wish to take up farming or ranching in order to make the most they can of their capital, energy and technical knowledge, or for those who wish to retire from strenuous business or professional life and make a home, Rhodesia offers many advantages unequalled elsewhere. The business, social, sporting, educational and medical facilities bear favourable comparison with those of other countries. Native labour is plentiful and when properly managed is cheap and efficient. Taxation is light. Good land in healthy surroundings and amidst fine scenery is plentiful and not expensive.

Full information is obtainable on application to The Secretary, Southern Rhodesia Settlers' Board (attached to the Government of Southern Rhodesia), P. O. Box 372, Salisbury S., Rhodesia.

The giving of advice to prospective settlers will be facilitated if applicants will advise the Board in detail of their circumstances and the amount of capital they would be prepared to invest in a suitable venture.

CORRESPONDENCE

CHINA'S NON-EXISTENT SHIPPING LAWS

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—As a brilliant instance of what can and does happen in China, a country with an increasing mercantile marine but no Laws to govern the same, the case of the ex-s.s. Roberto Figueras may be interesting to those of your readers connected with shipping. The named vessel which is owned by Chinese, has for some time past been moored in the upper reaches of the Huangpu. It was recently decided by her owners to despatch the vessel to Tientsin and I would here emphatically observe that, had she been under a foreign flag, the particular authorities responsible would not have granted her (in her present condition) a certificate of seaworthiness to navigate a six foot canal. But this is China and of course practically anything is permitted by those whose duty it apparently is to exercise supervision over Chinese shipping. It is assumed, however, that the ex-Roberto Figueras underwent some kind of a survey by the local Customs officials, for it is a fact that she was granted a "pass" or "certificate of seaworthiness" to undertake the voyage from Shanghai to Tientsin. It might be observed at this juncture, in view of what follows, that the typhoon season is well under way.

Three foreigners were appointed within the last few days as master, chief and second officers of the ship, the engineers being Chinese. Incidentally it may also be mentioned that the ship is fitted with water tube boilers. On the master boarding the vessel he commenced a tour of inspection and found the old "Spanish galleon" in a most interesting condition. Firstly, not a single brass fitting was visible, every piece of equipment containing this metal having been removed or stolen, even to the berth door handles. Secondly, the hatch tarpaulins (one to each hatch) were merely rags and absolutely useless for the purpose to which they were intended. Next, the hatches themselves were, for means of utility, about on a par with that kitchen commodity known as a cabbage strainer and an application to the Chinese agents to supply some wood in order that the hatches be secured and strengthened, was refused Finally, the Chinese engineers reported experiencing boiler trouble, but their representations were ignored and the agents gave the master orders to leave for Tientsin. He accordingly sailed yesterday, or at least tried to, for less than an hour after vacating her mooring, the old hulk wheezed up in the vicinity of the Ta Ta wharf, her engines definitely refusing to take her any further owing to the boiler tubes having absorbed an excess amount of Huangpu mud which clogged their respiratory system and thereby impeded breathing. The vessel was then re-moored and there she now is.

That is the sorry story in brief and it is pertinent to inquire what have the Chinese Maritime Customs to say about it, for they granted that hulk a "pass" as being efficient to weather a typhoon and reach Tientsin? We will not surmise what the plight of that ship and crew would have been had she sufficient energy left in her to reach the Yangtze mouth and then had experienced a typhoon of the severity which sealed the fate of the s.s. Mylie last year; the sequel would have been unpleasant to contemplate. However, the case of the ex-Roberto Figueras is but one one of many which certainly do not reflect to the credit of the Chinese Maritime Customs. I am unaware as to whether the vessel was "carried" by a foreign insurance company, neither am I concerned on this point. But what I do stress is that the Chinese owners deemed it advantageous to their interests to engage a quota of foreign certificated officers to take that vessel to Tientsin and it is in the interest of foreign certificated officers serving in Chinese-owned vessels that these disclosures are made. Then why do the Chinese Maritime Customs insist on approving as fit for deep sea navigation on a precarious coast, "crocks" which in any civilized country would years ago have been relegated to the break-up yard or else disposed of to the B. A. T. for conversion into four ounce-tobacco tins? Was not the case of the Hwah Jah with her rotten funnel guys, missing rivets, flukey cable shackles and defective exhaust pipes, a lesson enough? It would seem not. Or is it necessary for some of these aforesaid "crocks" to founder with the probable loss of life, before the Customs officials will be inclined to regard a little more seriously those responsibilities which they seemingly at present view with utter unconcern?

In conclusion I am bound to submit, having in mind a number of parallel cases that have come to my personal notice within the past few years, that the position of the local Harbour Department of the Chinese Maritime Customs, in so far as Chinese shipping is concerned, is a huge edifice of make believe, operating on "Rules" and "Regulations" which it may impose but cannot enforce, the whole therefore being carried along from day to-day by that admirable quantity which is so useful in commercial and social circles—bluff!

W. E. KIRBY.

PONIES OR CARS

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

Sir,—It is cheering to see by your "Notes and Comments" yesterday that the rider is not entirely forgotten, though his "rights," if he has any, appear to be very low down in the municipal scale.

I am a motorist now, but once was a rider, and as such I must contradict your assertion that "Avenue Foch is to be metalled throughout its length and width because the motorist wants it." He does not want it. I motor, driving myself, along it four times a day at least, sometimes oftener. There is ample room, on each side of the sanded strip for riders, for two cars to pass (one overtaking the other) and there is no great press of traffic along it at any time.

The result of metalling the centre of the road will be that the motorist, instead of driving along the edge of the sand as he does now, will take the centre of the road, making it just as difficult to overtake another car as it is now.

The average car is driven at 18—20 miles per hour along Avenue Foch as it is, so even if there be not room to overtake no great hardship would result. When in addition to this there is room for four cars abreast without encroaching on the sanded strip it is a mere fabrication to say "the motorist wants it."

Why can we not have the real reason for once? Or is the nigger in the wood pile a son of one of our City Fathers? We all know that there are scores of roads urgently needing attention, both in surface, width and control, that should take precedence of one of the best motoring roads we have, and one that might well be saved for the enjoyment both of motorist and rider.

I am, etc.,
GREEN BONNET.
Shanghai, July 18, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—It is a known fact that however wide a boulevard, accidents will happen and one is inclined to take advantage of too wide spaces and drive a little recklessly and undoubtedly the "pony strip" on Avenue Foch serves as a line of demarcation between east-bound and west-bound traffic. Nevertheless, it is difficult to see how this important thoroughfare can be kept in its present condition very much longer and for the sake of a few riders, practically all during these early hours of the morning, retard the use of a natural traffic artery. In no other city of the world will be found such consideration for the few and space allotted them on a principal road. Avenue Foch is the natural outlet of Avenue Edward VII and the nearest real thoroughfare parallel and adjacent to Nanking Road. The writer proceeds along this road three or four times a day by motor and does not agree with the statement that motorists (and also ricsha riders) do not desire to have the whole service metalled. The majority of my friends have often remarked on the unsatisfactory condition of the road. It is almost impossible to proceed up and down Avenue Foch without at times encroaching on the dirt surface and the result is a cloud of dust. On a windly day the dust is lifted without the assistance of any vehicle with most unpleasant results. That this is relly the case can be judged if in no other way by examination of the metalled portions of the road which will be found strewed with the dust from the pony track, giving the whole thoroughfare a very untidy appearance, to say the least.

In order to test the case out from the pony riders' point of view, a friend of mine has taken the trouble to arise early and reports that on two fine mornings, between the hours of six and eight a.m., he stationed himself at the corner of Hart Road and saw 16 riders in all during the two days, not counting mafoos, a remarkably small number considering the stir in the market. It will be noticed, however, the majority of motorists have turned off by the time Hart Road is reached and in my opinion, while the whole surface should be metalled westward up to Hart Road, the remaining portion might well be left in its present condition, at least for the present. The city is growing westward and so the pony riders also are taking up residence further out. By all means give them all the tracks possible within the residential districts, but do not sacrifice our very few decent thoroughfares even if a little inconvenience is caused thereby.

PLAY FAIR.
Shanghai, July 19, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—"Play Fair's" letter, advocating the metalling of the entire surface of Avenue Foch and thus abolishing the riding track, would not be worth replying to were it not for the misleading suggestions he makes. Let us take them seriatim.

DUST.—A third of his letter complains about the dust. The riding track is sand, not dust, and if he is a motorist he must be aware that sand is deliberately scattered on our principal streets daily (Nanking Road for one) for the benefit of traffic. By ignoring this fact and calling it dust, however, it is dragged in as an argument against the rider.

USE OF THE ROAD.—It is unfair to take a census of riders using the road in the middle of summer. From September till May there are certainly one or two hundred riders a day.

ACCOMMODATION.—Excluding the space taken up by the riding track down the centre, Avenue Foch is wider than most main roads in Shanghai. It is wider than Nanking ,Bubbling Well and Avenue Roads and Avenue Joffre, allowing for the trams. If it is metalled all over we shall see some improvised means of dividing the traffic erected like the islands in Avenue Edward VII, which are neither effective nor ornamental. A long strip of grass or garden down the centre of Avenue Edward, with intersections at crossings would be more effective and far less of an eyesore than the existing iron standards growing on asphalt islands. Much better leave the the riding track as it is in Avenue Foch; it is useful in dividing traffic, a boon to a large number of riding men and women, and could be used for no other good purpose, unless "Play Fair" considers a road that will accommodate eight cars abreast a good purpose. If he does he is not a good motorist.

WHOSE SACRIFICE?—"Play Fair" must be new to Shanghai or he would not suggest that Avenue Foch is being "sacrificed to riders." It has been a riding road for a great many years and, moreover, is the only one in the Settlement now. The rider has no other means of reaching the country. Why should the only possible road he can use be sacrificed to the motorist? The motorist has the following roads leading from the central districts to the country:—

Rue Lafayette
Avenue Joffre
Rue Ratard (only a few yards away from Avenue Foch)
Weihaiwei Road (which is scheduled to be cut through) Bubbling Well Road
Avenue Road
Sinza Road

Seven roads to the riders' one and your correspondent signs himself "Play Fair"!

COTTESWOLD.
Shanghai, July 21, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In the letter appearing in your paper this morning "Fair Play" states that during two hours in the early morning a friend of his counted only 16 riders making use of the track on the Avenue Foch. As he is giving these figures to show how little the riding track is used it is only "fair play" to point out that he has chosen the one time of year when very few men are riding. At this season the majority of ponies are being summered, in fact it is only the polo ponies which are being kept in training and they get all the exercise they require on the polo ground.

It thus comes about that there are few ponies to ride during these months and moreover on these sticky mornings riding is not very pleasant, so many men who for nine months in the year never miss a morning are now never to be seen on the roads. Let your friend get up at 6 a.m. in October and stand at his corner for as long as he did the other day and he may be quite surprised to find that he can count nearer 160 than 16 riders.

Many men ride in the mornings who have not got the time to go so far afield as the end of Avenue Foch before beginning to ride—to them the Avenue Foch is a blessing. It takes a motorist say three to four minutes to turn off into the Bubbling Well Road and about five minutes to go to the Avenue Joffre, should he be so anxious to avoid the sand from the riding track, but think of the rider wending his weary way on a hard road for about 30 minutes each way at a walk!

The motorists have every road to themselves except Avenue Foch, surely riders might be allowed to retain the one and only avenue left to them leading from the open country to the district round the Race Club where most of the ponies are stabled.

It might also be pointed out that the Council tax ponies—for what purpose is this tax levied? Is it to help to keep the roads in repair for motorists?

GIVE AND TAKE.
Shanghai, July 21, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—It does not speak well for some of the letter writers of Shanghai that they must commence their replies with the inevitable "So and so's letter is really not worth while replying to, don't you know, but. ." and the also inevitable observation that the other person "must be a recent arrival in Shanghai" or words to that effect. One gets so tired of this sort of thing, really. While I have been absent a number of years, which perhaps enables me to realize better what is taking place here and future possibilities, yet it is true I lived in this city previously, before the days of Shanghai's tramways and the New Garden Bridge.

I should indeed have called it 'sand' and not "dust" but all the same, it does fly about dreadfully and unlike the sand distributed on the streets purposely, is several inches thick and, when disturbed by any vehicle or a geegee, it is rather unpleasant. Still I am not emphasizing this at all or even the immediate paving of the street in question, although many people do and are very emphatic about it. I should say the whole thing could wait another three to five years but what I did wish to emphasize in my letter was the inevitableness of it. It must come sooner or later. Anyone who has a vision of greater Shanghai will realize that and must also be aware that at the time the Yang King Pang was filled in, it was expected and planned that this most adjacent through boulevard parallel to Nanking Road should serve the purpose it is now intended. I am told by riding friends (I have a number) there used to be riding tracks well into town and quite a fuss was made at the time they were done away with. And so the years slip by and one lonely track to reach the country. They are out there themselves where the riding tracks are located and one day perhaps Avenue Foch will be built up solid with department stores, garages and even buildings of the N.C.D.N. type. Well, enough of this, or Cotteswold may think I'm kidding. But perhaps he is not aware that next to Los Angeles, California, no city in the world has so changed its appearance and made such rapid strides along certain lines as Shanghai. And so I say, either this year, next year or certainly within five years, Avenue Foch will no longer have its trail of sand,—it is inevitable.

One other thing. Let him choose the days in the year best suited to riding and I shall come with him and take my stand at any corner on Avenue Foch and we shall have a Chinese clerk count them as they go by. Unless he tips off all his riding friends I think he will be pretty disappointed. He says one to two hundred riders in a morning. Let's make a date.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

Sir,—The only point on which your correspondent "Green Bonnet" failed to contradict "Play Fair" in his advocacy of the metalling of Avenue Foch was in the number of ponies ridden on it. I had a count taken this morning by two persons between the hours of 5 and 8 a.m., and, despite the fact that it was a very hot day and riding somewhat of a burden, 99 ridden ponies passed between Seymour and Hart Roads in the three hours stated. Your correspondent mentioned that on a day not stated by him 16 riders, barring mafoos, passed along this piece of road between 6 and 8 a.m. Was it Monday morning, "Play Fair," when most riders give their mounts a rest, or was it pouring with rain?

MUSICAL WORMS

To the Editor of the

SIR,—In reply to W. J. H.'s inquiry of the 11th instant ("N.-C. D. N." 14.7.24) I might say that we had a similar experience in our garden last year, but in our case it was our Japanese Amah who drew our attention to the worms.

At present I am on holiday up here and only this morning my wife called me out into the garden to listen to the same thing and true enough the sound came from worm holes.

Hoping that these few lines will convince W. J. H.'s disbelieving friends.

JOSMITEL AND HIS FRIENDS

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Your correspondent "Josmitel" should equip himself with the solace of a Nestle's feeder or invest some of his energy in improving a few of the relics of the Shanghai Tramway Co., say, as a preliminary step, transforming the now existing cars, as follows:—

The car proper into the first class exclusive, making the two "gaol" doors one into entrance and the other exit, instructing the respective conductors, under the threat of a fine, that the doors are used properly, and seeing that no coolies are allowed in and only highbrows to be admitted.

The trailer to be made into third class, building two sliding doors at the ends of it, giving the men in charge the same instructions as above, with the additional threat that no beggars, tramps, loafers, ricsha and wheelbarrow coolies, also nondescripts carrying baskets, market or iron wares, dogs, cats, and other usual paraphernalia, are to be benefited with the use of the trailer—and for the shades of Confucius and Mencius, see that the mechanism be replaced by one similar to those in use in the capital of Europe or America, as this kind of cigarette is somewhat dangerous and can burn one's figures. Be it also suggested that a conspicuous sign should be placed as soon as the car is filled, say, Full, strictly no more admittance, and that the allotted number of people are to be carried and not to pack up the vehicles like coal barges.

The "North-China Daily News" may be "Josmitel's" beloved, I don't contest his right to the manifestation of his affection, but he would invest his love with the genuine spark if he should pursue the policy I prescribed, and it is better than to lavish, on Mr. Bruce Lockhart, all the curios of the Book of Etiquette.

And it would be far cooler in this weather.

With appreciation of the space allotted,

I am, etc.,

S. A. B.

Shanghai, July 19, 1924.

P. S. For "Josmitel's" peace, I beg to divulge the open secret that I am not Mr. Bruce Lockhart.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—I have rarely read a letter more beside the mark than that signed 'S. A. B.' which appears in your columns this morning.

As regards the letter of 'Josmitel' which it appears you yourself Sir had 'overlooked' without looking over, I very much doubt if a cleverer or wittier letter has ever appeared in your columns, which is saying a great deal. What is more, to do Mr. Lockhart justice, I don't suppose anyone appreciated its gentle humour and irony more than the victim himself. True, the term "Bumptious Bruce" was rather rude, but its excellent alliteration excuses its truth. Indeed, in view of Mr. Lockhart's recent advocacy of the "manly art" I admire Josmitel's restraint in abstaining from using the obvious title of "Bruce the Brutal." Please look more carefully into your W.P.B. or the more remote recesses of your sanctum and see what else you may have "misplaced," and perhaps you will find some more of a similar kind—but I hope not on the same subject.

Yours hopefully

A. HANSON.

Shanghai, July 21, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Again once more I politely demand favour to requisition me minimum space in your uplift journal, to bander few words re frivolous remarks of one "S.A.B." contained in yesterday's edition. This time I guarantee "Multum in Parvo," as aforesaid empty frivolity remarks require only scanty passing notice.

"S.A.B.'s" kindly recommendations for me to indulge in solace of Nestle's feeder, is warmly received, but regretful to express I unable to join him in his infantile pastimes during such hot weathers. En passant, I might mention and for benefit all jaded readers, that just now I concentrate on soulful ginger ale highball, which are muchly solaceful, also vimmy and peppy during depressful summer weathers.

I think, Sir Editor, it is great possibility, that if "S.A.B." eschew Nestle's feeder and join me in soulful highball, he not conjure up and perceive so multifarious "beggars, tramps, loafers, dogs, cats and other useful paraphernalia" crowding our tramcars. It is well-known household fact that Nestle's feeder are very potent, and the mental confusion of "S.A.B." as depict in letter to editor, seriously signify too freely indulgence of said feeder. Prudence require that he should consultate Chinese amah or wet nurse before indulge in such debauchings, especially during such enervating weathers.

Although I condescend to agree that Tramway Company very backward in coming forward with newly improvements, I am dare to express that they will hastily invent new mechanisms "for shades of Confucius and Mencius," if "S.A.B." will beforehand give advices as to date of proposed visit of said illustrious shades. Last year Tramway Company make hughely profits, and if humbly approached by special delegation of City Grandfathers, I dare to express that said Company will spend few dollars for aforesaid improvements, and may be grant free passes to such ancient visitors. Such extraordinary expense can easy recover by additioning only one copper to fares of aforesaid tramps, loafers, dogs, cats, etc., and crediting blame for said increase to depreciating copper currency Undoubtedly few extra dollars will accrue, which may be devote to little extra dividend next year, and thusly Virtue will be Reward handsomely.

I do not claim honour for discovering such super-financial schemings; indeedly no. Such inventions are originate by great John D. When he desire to foundate university at Timbuctoo, or hygienic steam laundry in Iceland, he merely addition only half-cent per case to kerosene oil on Pacific Slope, and few dollars left to foundate hospital in Peking.

I think it is waste space for "S.A.B.' to interject in P.S. that he is not Mr. Bruce Lockhart. Even school boy can detect such colossal differences, and I think Mr. Bruce not feel flattered at such interjection. Mr. Bruce is very forceful, although sometimes impolite in his dissertations to harassed editor, but always very intelligently and grammatically so, even for greenhorn to understand. But, as to "S.A.B.'s" weirdly conglomeration of windy words for newly inventions on tramcars; well, Sir Editor, it would be muchly infra dig, for me to indulge in impolite expressions thereto, so I merely conjoin with ancient expression: "Nuff said!"

With my hearty excuses, Sir Editor, for inflictings of such unprofitable discussions, which I otherwise eschew, but forced upon me by untimely screedings of "S.A.B."

Trusting you are surviving hot weathers,

I am, etc.,

JOSMITEL.

P. S. When I travel in Scotland, I never have hear "nuff" said. Scotchman always say "Ah weel mon, jist anither wee drappie." Excuse such frivolity jokings, Sir Editor, but, tout voulez vous, these are "Dog Days," i.e. to wit: —Silly Seasons.

RUSSIAN CHILDREN ON THE STREET

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Is it not time that we took up the question of the Russian children on the streets—the little mites who stand the whole day long in the broiling sun or the pouring rain trying to sell things that nobody wants, who feed off hawkers trays or not at all, who are subject to the continual insults and jeers of the Chinese coolies. It must be stopped and quickly.

What if our own children were doing this?

How should we feel about it then? Try and imagine it? Day after day, night after night. The pity of it. Wealthy Shanghai. The prestige and influence of Western civilization—can it allow this to continue?

Outside the French Club on the "Glorious" 14th were two little mites trying to sell flags at 12.30 a.m. There were tears in their eyes, eyes that could scarcely keep open, they should have been abed hours before. Possibly no bed to go to, and yet some of these children may have been born and nurtured amid all the luxuries and comforts of life—some may not.

What matters it whether it is somebody else's business or not, whether their parents are to blame or not, whether we are wrong or right, we must get these poor little mites off the streets.

Is there one amongst us who dare refuse to help to right this terrible wrong. What is to prevent some of our charitable societies from getting into touch at once with some of the leading Russians and organizing some means of taking charge of these little martyrs.

We dare not refuse this charge to help these little outcasts in a strange land through no fault of their own.

Why should they suffer? If there is any manhood in us let us stop it and at once. If dollars are wanted they will be forthcoming.

"For inasmuch as ye did it unto one of these, ye did it unto Me."

And if we do it not?

I am, etc.,

REX.

Shanghai, July 18, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

I was indeed glad to read "Rex's" letter in your esteemed paper this morning and I think so will many others. I was walking over the Garden Bridge the other morning when I met the two bigger children (the boy and girl who stand daily at Hall & Holtz, and Lane & Crawfords) with, I presume, their father, both children resemble him very much. I saw him pinch and pull the little fellows ear, for what reason I failed to see. The father (I presume) is a stalwart, strong-looking man, and can be seen any day between Whiteaways and the Bund, puffing a cigarette and keeping an eye on the children. No doubt the children get a lot of money this way for I saw the little fellow counting five 29 cent pieces before 11 a.m. in front of some Chinese. Something can and must be done to rectify this. The tired little mites after they have finished in Nanking Road usualy go along all the seats on the Bund and Gardens. There are also another pair of smaller children supervised by another man, himself on the small size, in the same way.

Enclosing my card

I am, etc.,

A MOTHER.

Shanghai, July 20, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

The light thrown on this subject by "A Mother" makes it all the more imperative that something should be done to stop the practice of sending these children on to the streets.

Even this slight information shows what a cruel practice it is and probably means torture for the children in addition to their other miseries. The more the public support them with contributions and the parents find it more and more profitable, the longer will the children be kept at it—the natural result of greed and brutality—yet, no doubt, if the public refrains from contributing the children will receive still more brutal treatment.

Is there no means by which the police can take action? For instance, what about hawkers' licences? Could not the parents be prosecuted under this head? No doubt the police have the power to refuse licences to children of this age.

In any case the number of children of the age in question, say 4-8, amongst the whole of the refugees cannot be great and a comparatively small sum would be needed to take charge of them entirely for the day, feed them and give them some sort of kindergarten instruction and even, if no better means offer, "compensate" the fathers for their "losses" by a small daily payment—a bad principle, but still worse to leave the children on the streets.

Will not some influential and educated Russian give his, or better still the Refugee community's views on the subject? They would be very helpful.

Your editorial note, for which I thank you, discourages any interference, but this does not lessen the responsibility of every individual man amongst us. We men and fathers of Shanghai are incurring a heavy responsibility if we allow these children to continue to suffer such a life. We cannot salve our consciences with "a few small coins." Let the attempt be made even if it fail—never mind about "authorities" and "recognition."

My contribution is ready, but I want to be sure that it will be used for this particular object.

I am, etc.,

WHO ARE THE CHINESE?

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—The recent researches of Dr. Shirokogoroff among the southern Chinese are certainly likely to arouse considerable interest among those interested in the probable affinities of the race who inhabit China. His suggestion also, that indications of an early link with a pre-Dravidian element are evident, is bound to challenge, by its very boldness, current opinion upon this subject. There is no room to dispute that certain types of southern Chinese do display both in feature and in physical development, traces of a racial type which has been classed as Negretto, but while this resemblance may be easily apparent in either facial appearance or by reason of stature, such evidence may go far towards establishing a pre-Dravidian infiltration in a limited area in the South, but may be considered to fall short in building an hypothese on which to base their source of origin.

It is an axiom in physical anthropology that those characteristics are most important in guiding us to indentify racial types which are less likely to be influenced by a change of environment accompanied by all the ensuing modifications. This is especially to be said of hair texture, which we know to be a primary characteristic in race classification, and this is one of the big factors which give the Chinese any claim to racial homogeneity. How far the substratum has underlain the southern element, may, I suggest, be best determined by a comparison of the extent of perpetuation of the Negretto type of spiral hair and the virile unassailable Mongol long straight black hair, rather than by the head measurement.

If any reliable affinities with the Chinese race may possibly be discovered, no investigation should overlook the undoubted Semitic traits which exist in a largge proportion of the Chinese; traits if not actually Semitic; belonging to some not far removed branch originating near the same area of characterisation. The similarities appear in hair, in shape of nose, lips, and in certain predispositions to be commercial, fond of material acquisition and industrious.

The whole study of racial affinity resembles a vulnerable structure of probabilty, supported by a scaffolding of ingenious conclusion, and liable to be shattered by an anthropological bomshell hurled from some new quarter of research with sufficient reliable data behind it. The great enemy to research would appear to be the spread of industrialism which has a profound influence on the movement of peoples, and consequently interfering with social custom.

That the movement of Dr. Shirokogoroff is bound to be keenly followed in China and elsewhere, I am positive, and all may look forward with great interest to a further disclosure of his opinions.

I am, etc.,

L. F. ASHTON.

Shanghai, July 19, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In connexion with Mr. Ashton's reference to the value of the hair as a characteristic in race classification, it is interesting to remark how frequently personages in Chinese historical literature are described as having "red" or "yellow" hair, with occasionally also the description of the hair as being "curly." The characters usually translated "red" and "yellow" no doubt cover a wide range of tints, but they can hardly be extended to include black, and these references appear to indicate at least a tradition of blonde and brunette types as being formerly common in China.

RESCUE OF SHIPWRECKED CHINESE

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—With reference to the article which appeared in the issue of your paper on the 18th and relative to the rescue of 42 shipwrecked Chinese.

We regret to inform you that your information was not quite correct and credit was given this Company and its employees which was hardly due them, and not sufficient credit to the Commander and crew of the Store Nordiske for a very meritorious act.

The first information this Company received was on the morning of the 15th and when we were handed the enclosed letter by a Chinese gentleman, who informed us that he was representing the Shantung Guild.

After ringing up Mr. Andersen, Engineer-in-Chief for the Great Northern Telegraph Company, to confirm the letter and if possible obtain further details, we were informed that the Captain of the Store Nordiske had picked up the crews of several wrecked junks. As these men were in a very distressed state owing to insufficient clothing and food, the Captain and crew of the Store Nordiske had supplied them with several days' food and all clothing available and in addition the Captain had given these men a sum of $30 and then landed them on the North Saddle Island.

Mr. Koh Hai Sah asked what would be the cost of sending out a tug and when informed of the price, he said the Guild could not pay, should a tug be available. The salvage steamer Saucy was the only vessel we had available and Mr. Ko was informed we would send her out as soon as steam could be raised, irrespective of whether they paid or not, but if they could see their way to paying for the cost of the coal consumed, such a sum would be acceptable. On learning that the cost of the coal would be about Tls. 300 he offered to pay this sum in advance, but this we refused to accept and suggested the matter be left over until after the men had been brought to Shanghai.

The Saucy was despatched the same afternoon and the next morning arrived and anchored off the North Saddle Lighthouse. Unfortunately while at anchor she struck what we believe to be either an uncharted rock or submerged wreck and has sustained damage which will call for very extensive repairs covering several weeks.

The shipwrecked men were landed at Woosung according to instructions from Mr. Ko Hai-sah and he was informed of their safe arrival

After questioning these men Mr. Ko Hai-sah informed us that none of them were from junks owned by him and that such being the case he could not see his way to paying the Tls. 300 first offered, but that he would pay $300 and hoped we would accept the amount toward the expenses.

We are, etc.

The enclosed letter is as follows:—

Mr. Ko Hai Sah,
Wing On, Great Eastern Hotel,

SIR,—We beg to inform you that we have received the following report from the Captain of our Cablesteamer "Store Nordsike":—

"On way out yesterday rescued 37 Chinese from 3 junks one of which named Mo Ching Shang anchored 3 miles northwest of "Side Saddles" but without rudder and masts and leaking badly."

The Captain adds that all rescued were landed at "North Saddles" Lighthouse, but they ask you to send help immediately as they have only food for 5 days and the Lightkeeper is unable to give assistance.

Kindly confirm the receipt of this letter.

Yours faithfully,

A. E. ANDERSEN.
For General Manager.

Gt. Northern Tele. Co., July 14, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—One cannot but feel a certain amount of admiration for the writer of the letter which appeared in this morning's issue wherein he has taken the bull by the horns, so to speak, and exposed the contemptible working of a Chinese mind and I am strongly of the opinion that much good would be done if more exposures of a similar nature were made as I imagine these Chinese "gentlemen" would lose a certain amount of face by seeing their names exposed in the press.

Here we have the crews of three Shantung junks, 42 men in all, saved by the cablesteamer Store Nordiske from shipwreck, and probably death, the Captain supplies them with food, clothing and money and goes to the risk of placing them on an island and to the trouble of notifying their Guild that they require further assistance, doing everything in accordance with the best sea traditions.

The Shanghai tugs are approached and are ready and willing to carry on the rescue but as they are not a philanthrophic institution they quite naturally seek to cover their bare expenses and rightly so, of course. Their salvage tug Saucy is despatched and has the exceedingly hard luck to meet with a serious accident, she rescues the shipwrecked men and lands them at Woosung. Here steps in a Chinese gentleman who now seeks to uphold true Chinese traditions by offering dollars in place of taels as previously agreed upon, he seems to think Tls. 7 too much to pay for saving a shipwrecked man from his own trading junk and what cares he for the damage the Saucy sustained while effecting the rescue, what would he care if the crews had all been drowned? perhaps nothing?

While speaking of shipwrecked men I should like to ask what is being done for that most unfortunate shipwrecked man, the laodah of the Fuhle?

I am, etc.,

AMERICANISM.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—For some time now I have been studying American (U. S. A.) publications of various kinds, political, literary, scientific, etc., with a view to understanding the conditions spiritual and otherwise in that great country. This is a difficult task, as to understand the spirit of a country one should live in it and be of a sympathetic temperament.

In the course of my reading, amongst other things, I have often come across the words "Americanism" and "Americanization" used as if they were a well defined quality and process, respectively.

I have never been able to find a definition of Americanism, and I suppose, that as the word has been in use for quite a long time in the U.S.A. it carries a quite definite meaning to everybody there.

A movement is on foot, it would seem, to Americanize the incoming immigrants as fast as possible, and laws have been passed to restrict the immigration of certain races which, it is alleged, are refractory to this Americanizing process, and to facilitate, on the other hand, the immigration of certain other races alleged to be susceptible in a high degree to it.

By inference, of course, I might come to certain conclusions, but these might be incorrect, and therefore I would much appreciate it if some American in China would come forward and explain what Americanism really is. In other words, I would like to know whether Americanism is a well defined code of ethics, a national philosophy in the sense of Confucianism as it might be applied to the Chinese, or whether it is simply a word used to signify certain characteristics of the U.S.A. native, which immigrants as a rule lack, and which it is thought desirable that they should acquire as soon as possible, and if so what they are.

Any information on this subject would be greatly appreciated.

NEW VIEWS FOR OLD

To the Editor of the

"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—One would like to suggest that a new point of view from which to regard the Russian Refugee situation is well worth while considering at this juncture.

Hitherto, it has been the habit to ignore the "Reds" and only to listen to the "Whites."

I suggest that Shanghai need not concern itself about the why's and wherefore's of Communism in Russia at all and that it should simply recognize facts—and face those facts.

What are the main facts:

1.—The Soviet Government has been recognized by the Governments of Great Britain, Italy, China, and others.

2.—The representative of the Government in Shanghai is, I believe, Mr. Elleder—therefore it follows that in any arrangements or negotiations contemplated for dealing with Russians and their affairs, Mr. Elleder should be consulted, and his opinion and advice sought.

The policy, hitherto, of local persons interesting themselves in Russian affairs and people has been to ignore the outstanding fact that the Soviet is the power in Russia to-day, and has been so for the past six years. Locally, they have ignored the fact that Mr. Elleder represents that power and has done so for some time past.

Is it worth while continuing in this fashion?

It will hearten those who persist in thinking that the only respectable Russians are those who live out of Russia, to remember that the Russian Soviet Delegation in London has been officially invited to, and received by their Majesties at Buckingham Palace—and that Delegation represents the hundred million or so of Russians who live in Russia to-day.

This circumstance, with its significance, should really be good enough for the well-meaning amateur politico-philanthropists who have been trying their hands at playing Special Providence to the local Russian situation for the past 20 months or more.

Consider, for a moment?

One of the proprietors of this very newspaper travelled across Siberia last May and you have published interesting notes of his about the journey.

This gentleman went to the Soviet authorities for his papers, and found no difficulty at all.

When he got into Russia he was not thrown into gaol, nor was he put upon the rack, nor was he condemned to die a lingering and painful death.

So, therefore, the "N. C. Daily News" itself has first hand evidence that life is normal and usual in Russia.

Recognizing that fact it is only a step further in the march of common sense to recognise the fact of Mr. Elleder's official existence, and that his authority and advice are ready at hand, if sought, for attempting to deal with the local situation? Why not be thankful that at last there is an official representative of the Russian people here in Shanghai, and make use of this practical benefit?

Where Buckingham Palace has led Bubbling Well need hardly fear to follow!

A solution will begin to loom in sight as soon as Mr. Elleder—and all he represents—is invited to assist in the matter.

Hence the caption—"New views for Old!

SIMON PETER.

To the Editor of the

"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—The Rev. Rowland's sermon, which you published yesterday, contains some criticism of alleged Roman Catholic beliefs.

One might expect that a man who has presumably made theology his life-study should know something about the teachings of the Catholic Church but this seems, at least in the present instance, to be a wrong idea.

Mr. Rowland opens up with some remarks about Rome taking Peter's appointment (as the rock upon which Christ would build His Church) at its literal meaning; he states that "it is surprising indeed how much may be said in support of the primacy of Peter" and that "if you grant apostolical succession you are logically bound to accept the Papacy."

This is all perfectly true; nevertheless, there are churches which, despite claiming apostolical succession, ignore the logical consequences of their claim. The question is:—Why should Christ's unmistakeable words not be taken at their literal meaning?

Mr. Rowland thereupon proposes these three theses (with his comments):—

(1) Rome believes in a celibate ministry.

(2) Rome believes in a hierarchy of which the supreme authority is vested in the Pope.

(3) Rome declares that the apostles, being themselves infallible, have handed down to their successors the "essential gift of infallibility."

ANSWERS:

(1) Celibacy is a matter of church discipline, which the Catholic Church may impose and remove at will; it is, for instance, not imposed on the Eastern Church in Communion with Rome. That, for a priest, a life in celibacy is a more ideal one than one in matrimony is clearly indicated in scripture.

(2) To see a renunciation of authority, in the quotation Mr. Rowland gives, is surely absurd. Compare this with Mr. Rowland's words "it is surprising how much may be said in support of the primacy of Peter." May it not, with greater truth, be held, that it is surprising that anything can be said against the supremacy of Peter?

(3) The reverend gentleman could not resist the temptation to throw on the table the trump card he had up his sleeve.

"Infallibility"! what a wonderful word to wave before an admiring congregation! Bad faith being out of the question, his only excuse is his abyssmal ignorance of his own subject matter.

In a few words; papal infallibility amounts to this: The Pope is only infallible when he, speaking ex cathedra as supreme pastor and ruler of the church of Christ on earth, solemnly pronounces judgment on points of faith and morals to be held by the universal church.

That is all! But it is great, it is wonderful and it is neither more nor less than the literal fulfilment of Christ's promise to His Church!

PAUL.

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

To the Editor of the

"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR, Referring to Mr. Sokolsky's articles appearing in this morning's issue, I beg to invite attention to an error appearing therein relative to the qualifications of the President of the United States.

"The President of the United States is elected for a term of four years. He must be 35 years of age, a native born citizen and resident within the United States for 14 years immediately prior to election.'

Articles II. Section 1 (4) of the Constitution of the United States reads:

"No Person except a natural born Citizen, or a Citizen of the United States at the time of the Adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the Office of the President; neither shall any Person be eligible to that Office who shall not have attained to the age of thirty-five years, and been fourteen years a Resident within the United States."

MIXED (COURT) ARITHMETIC

To the Editor of the

"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—The following from a contemporary seems to need a bit of explanation:—

> Keepers of opium dens and smokers appeared in great number at the Mixed Court this morning. One proprietor was fined $60 or 1 month, another $30 or 3 weeks, while a score of clients were given the option of $3 or 3 days each.

Now why, we ask, should those getting briefer sentences be assessed more heavily, pro rata, than those who get longer ones. The court fines one man $60 or one month; but another getting 3 weeks is fined only $30. It should be $45 if Justice does not need to unbind her brow and wipe her streaming eyes at the injustice of it. But worse is to come! The poor villains who were fined $3 with the option of three days in gaol are assessed at the rate of $30 a month. Perhaps the smaller fry is coming into his own and some day the offenders ideal of a ten cent fine or an hour in gaol may be reached.

I am, etc.,

EUCLID.

Shanghai, July 24, 1924.

A junk laden with stones and sand, coming up river on Wednesday afternoon, collided with a Chinese torpedo boat, one of the vessels watching the three Russian ships. The Chinese press reports that the captain of the man-of-war hauled the master of the junk aboard and proposes to keep him there until he pays for the damage done.

AT the meeting of the Executive Committee of the Council of Health Education on Saturday morning, it was announced that a gratifying interest in the problems of health was being taken by the Gentry of the Chinese City, who had approached the Council requesting the services of one of the Chinese Doctors of the staff to act as Chairman of a proposed Board of Health. As the term of office of Dr. V. B. Appleton has now expired it was announced that Dr. Iva M. Miller would act as head of the Child Hygiene Department, assuming her duties in September. It will be remembered that Dr. Miller was for 12 years connected with the Isabel Fisher Hospital, Tientsin. She has been conducting a summer school for Chinese teachers in Changli, (Chihli) this summer under the auspices of the Chihli-Kiangsu Educational Association. A hearty vote of thanks was given Dr. Ernest Mammen, who for the past year has been director of the Community Hygiene Department and who is leaving for America shortly. The Committee hope to secure the services of Dr. Richard A. Bolt, the well-known child hygienist of America, for work in China with the Council.

MUNICIPAL GAZETTE NEWS

Licensing of Bicycles.

The following letter is published for general information:—

Council Chamber,

Shanghai, July 15, 1924.

SIR,—I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter of July 2, stating that the French Council had decided, in principle, upon the licensing of bicycles operating within the French Settlement, and enquiring as to the Council's views on the subject.

In reply thereto, I have the honour to inform you that, prior to receipt of your communication, the Council had given consideration to this matter, and had, likewise, decided that the licensing of bicycles was desirable from the viewpoint of traffic control. Accordingly, it is proposed to obtain the requisite authority of the ratepayers for this licensing measure at the next annual meeting.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

J. M. MCKEE,

Assistant Secretary.

P. LEGENDRE, Esq.,
Secretary,
French Municipal Council.

Police Report for June.

Several encounters between the Police and armed robbers took place during the month, in the course of which one Constable was killed and three others were wounded by bullets. In addition, four Chinese pedestrians were wounded, three passing motor cars were hit, and several foreigners narrowly escaped with their lives. Other cases of serious crime included the shooting of one foreigner by another on June 13, the shooting of a Chinese by another on June 19 and the death of a hawker on June 28 following injuries received in a fight. On June 26 a Chinese who had shot a Policeman in Chapei fled into the Settlement, commandeered a passing motor car and so made good his escape. Two armed robbers were killed by the Police and 10 others were captured. In all 12 cases of armed robbery were reported. Twelve Chinese were executed for armed robbery and murder committed in the Settlement. As regards serious crime occurring outside Settlement limits, 4 murders and 12 cases of armed robbery were reported in adjoining Chinese territory; 8 men arrested by the Municipal Police for armed robbery committed elsewhere were handed over to the Chinese Authorities and two men were executed. As usual a number of arrests for being in possession of arms in the Settlement were made. For the half year ending June 30, 74 reports of armed robbery were received, in connexion with which 53 persons were arrested. During June 352 reports of stolen property were made to the Police. These included 18 cases of burglary, 4 of housebreaking, 5 of godown-breaking and 6 of shop and office-breaking. These figures are 70 less than in the previous month and 60 less than in June last year. In 147 of these cases investigation was made with successful results. Three Chinese were arrested and sentenced for making false reports of armed robbery. Five foreign and 9 Chinese were caught in the Settlement and charged with trafficking in firearms, and 27 automatic pistols and some 2,000 rounds of ammunition were seized. Large seizures of arms and ammunition were also made by the Customs on board foreign ships in harbour.

In regard to the question of armed robbery generally the following remarks may not be out of place. An armed robber is the combination of a lawless man and a pistol. Lawless men are turned out in large quantities at the public expense as so-called soldiers all over the country. Disbanded in this neighbourhood (as some thousands recently have been) they naturally drift to Shanghai. No Authority can prevent them from doing so. Pistols reach Shanghai, also in large quantities, in foreign ships from foreign countries. Under the complex scheme of local administration these weapons can be landed and distributed without much difficulty. Considerable seizures of arms and ammunition are often made on board ships in harbour by the Customs Authorities. Smaller captures are not infrequently made in the Settlement by the Municipal Police. But as the Municipal Police do not function either on the river or on any of the private wharves they can actually themselves do very little to stop the entry of weapons into the Settlement from the direction whence most of them come. The Municipal Police, therefore, have to accept the existence of armed desperadoes in the immediate vicinity of their jurisdiction as a ready-made and unpreventable condition of affairs: that is, they are in the unsatisfactory position of having to deal with the advanced stages of a malady which ought to be checked at its source. The measures used include searches, raids, round—ups, domiciliary visits and so on. Pursued unremittingly, as they are, these activities are bound to bring the Police into conflict with those against whom they specially operate. When this happens firearms are used on both sides and members of the public are quite likely to get shot. This is a risk inseparable from the presence of armed criminals—which in itself, be it noted, is dependent chiefly upon the influx of weapons smuggled by foreigners in foreign ships from foreign countries. Evidence shows the illicit arms traffic in Shanghai to be a thriving business conducted on a large scale. That so many foreigners engage in it is chiefly owing, no doubt, to the insignificant penalties involved in case of detection. In one Consular Court the maximum penalty is three months' imprisonment. In another it appears to be 29 days. In another, an arms runner recently caught in the act of selling arms to a Chinese was let off scot free on purely domestic grounds. In face of sentences of this kind it is not surprising that so many foreigners engage in a trade from which large profits are obtainable. But until (among other things) the punishments inflicted on foreign arms smugglers are made really deterrent, shooting affrays will continue to occur in the streets and the lives and limbs of the public will continue to be endangered, notwithstanding the very thorough training which policemen undergo in the handling and use of their weapons and the constant efforts made to impress on them that even when engaged in conflict with armed criminals the safety of the public is a prime consideration.

During the month 62 opium and gambling raids were carried out by the Police from which a sum of over $4,300 accrued to the Council from fines and confiscations.

A plot to cause disaffection among local Chinese troops was discovered during the month. Anti-Japanese propaganda was active in the form of resolutions passed by students and merchants' organizations. The Paoshan District Association joined the anti-roadmaking movement by the Council outside Settlement limits on the score that the construction of extra Settlement roads infringes China's sovereign rights. The fact that these so-called sovereign rights imply the exercise of sovereign responsibilities is a point that is commonly and conveniently ignored. An isolated copy of a poster appealing to the public to join the I. W. W. was found in the Settlement on June 8. Eighty Russian refugees were repatriated by the Relief Advisory Committee during June. About 7,000 still remain in Shanghai. Over 600 soldiers are still either on board the three ships in the river or in camp near Woosung. The efforts of a few nondescript foreigners and foreign born Chinese to establish a local Ku Klux Klan came to a sudden end on June 26 when the Chapei Police raided the headquarters of the organization and arrested seven persons connected with the movement. A new gambling establishment, run by foreigners who were formerly connected with "The Wheel" in North Honan Road Extension and other notorious resorts, was opened at Minghong, twenty miles by road from Shanghai, apparently under the protection of a high Chinese military official. The local cigarette tax trouble is by no means over. A number of dealers have been arrested by the authorities and many others have suspended sales as a protest. Eleven strikes involving 14,000 working people occurred during June. The price of rice averaged $11.80 per picul as against $10.80 in May and $12.50 in June last year.

OBSTACLES AT THE INTER-ALLIED CONFERENCE

Divergent Views Regarding £40,000,000 Loan: Bankers Said to be Influenced by Politicians: Dawes Plan and Versailles Treaty

London, July 19.

The smiling and satisfied appearance of the delegates to the inter-Allied Conference gives reason to believe that substantial progress lies behind the colourless and formal communiqués.

It is now known that, thanks to the helpful suggestions of the other delegates, especially the American delegates, the first committee has gone a long way towards reconciling the conflicting British and French proposals concerning German default and sanctions.

The main plank has already been adopted. It provides that the Reparations Commission, with the addition of American delegates, shall be the deciding authority regarding default. Such American delegates shall be appointed by unanimous vote of the Reparations Commission or in the event of failure to secure unanimity shall be appointed by the International Court of Justice. It is generally believed that the remainder of the agreement is now largely only a matter of adjusting the formulae.

The centre of activity during the week-end has been removed to the Chequers to which the principal delegates have been invited after inspecting the Wembley Exhibition to-day.

Secretary of State Hughes, interviewed on his arrival in London, said that American sentiment was very strongly behind the Dawes Report as it now stood. "We believe that prompt execution of it," he declared, "is of the greatest consequence."

The American Bar Association will proceed to France for a few days as guests of the French Bar.

London, July 20.

The inter-Allied Conference yesterday continued to make remarkably satisfactory progress. The first and third committees have completed their tasks in general agreement and the second committee expects to conclude on Monday after which the plenary sitting will be held as early as possible.—Reuter.

Washington, July 19.

President Coolidge is well satisfied with the progress of the negotiations in London.

Government circles welcome the suggestion that Mr. Owen Young should be chosen fiscal agent for the Reparations Commission.—Reuter's American Service.

Conference Sub-Committee Nearing Agreement: The Railway Question

London, July 20.

The Second Committee of the Inter-Allied Conference has appointed two sub-committees; the first sub-committee, dealing with the economic integrity of Germany and the Ruhr, will meet to-day and there is a good prospect of reaching an agreement by to-morrow. The second sub-committee, dealing with the railway question, has concluded its sitting, but has not reached a definite conclusion and will merely make a report.

A plenary meeting of the Conference is expected as soon as the first sub-committee has reported. It is understood that the important question of getting Germany's consent has not been mentioned up to the present.

Belgian Premier's Optimism

London July 21.

The progress of the Allied Conference is officially revealed by an interview with M. Theunis, the Belgian Premier, in which he declared: "I believe that we are now in sight of our goal and that the problem of reparations is about to find the solution that has been sought for long."

The general lines of agreement of the First Committee are: (1) that after the establishment of a default, in which connexion the Reparations Commission, with the addition of an American shall be the deciding authority, the nature of the sanctions shall be determined by the Allies after consultation with the American Agent-General and representatives of bondholders; (2) that the service of the loan shall enjoy prior claim on the German revenues, and (3) that apart from the foregoing provisions the rights of the signatory Governments under the Peace Treaty are reserved.

An important matter requiring settlement is the question of getting Germany's consent.

Reuter's Berlin correspondent says that the newspapers, including Herr Stresemann's "Die Zeit," profess the greatest anxiety at what they describe as the change of the basic provisions of the Treaty.

On the other hand, Reuter's Paris correspondent reports that the French press, with the exception of the extremists, is in general delighted with the compromise.—Reuter.

Paris, July 21.

Interviewed by the London correspondent of a French paper, M. Herriot, the French Premier, said that the work of the Allied Conference was far from being ended but important results had already been reached. Never had inter-Allied negotiations been carried out in a more cordial atmosphere and never had more sincere and mutual comprehension facilitated discussions. M. Herriot paid a tribute to the British delegates, who, he said, were realising more and more France's moral and political situation.—Reuter.

London, July 21.

The question of the Ruhr railways is proving a thorny one at the sittings of the Conference subcommittee and there is reason to believe that the matter will probably be referred back to the whole Conference.—Reuter.

London, July 22.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald yesterday and to-day conferred at length with the chief delegates to the London Conference. Subsequently the Cabinet held its weekly meeting, which was advanced by a day in view of the probability of the plenary session of the Conference opening to-morrow.

It was noticeable to-day that M. Herriot is looking pale and tired and apparently suffering from strain. The comments of French newspapers, based on long despatches from their correspondents, make it clear, according to Reuter's Paris correspondent, that serious difficulties have arisen. The difficulties are chiefly due to the attitude of the bankers, notably the American, towards the protocol drafted by the first committee on July 19, which, they consider, does not give sufficient security to investors in the proposed loan of £40,000,000 to Germany. Even M. Herriot's organ, the "Ere Nouvelle," joins in the chorus of newspapers, declaring that the bankers are influenced by politicians hostile to the Reparations Commission and aiming at preventing France retaining her freedom of action in the event of German default.

The "Matin" describes the difficulty as serious and almost tragic. It says that, if M. Herriot refuses the bankers the guarantees they require, the Dawes plan will fall to the ground and, if he agrees, it will ultimately mean revision of the Treaty of Versailles.

Later.

Whatever happens, a full meeting of the Allied Conference tomorrow is almost certain, at which the reports of the three committees appointed last week will be considered.

The financial experts had two long meetings with the representatives of the bankers to-day regarding the Allies' views about security for the £40,000,000 loan. It is expected that the views of the bankers will be submitted to to-morrow's Conference. The sub-committee of the second committee expects to finish the examination of the question of restoration of German economic unity to-night in readiness for the consideration of the Conference to-morrow.

July 23.

In anticipation of a crisis in the Inter-Allied Conference, an unusual crowd of sightseers assembled at Downing Street to-day. The principal Allied delegates were closeted with Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and Mr. J. H. Thomas in the Cabinet room this morning.

The sub-committee examining the question of restoration of German economic unity has not completed its labours as expected, and the holdng of the plenary conference will depend on the result of its labours.

Reuter's correspondent at Paris states that uneasiness at possible Conference developments is expressed by all the newspapers today. It is feared that M. Herriot, while determined not to yield France's right to isolated action in the event of German default, may accept a compromise which would simply gild a bitter pill.

The "Petit Parisien" suggests that M. Herriot should not hesitate to sacrifice the £40,000,000 loan rather than permit encroachment of the Treaty and the sovereignty of France.—Reuter.

Plenary Session: Dominions Delegates in Attendance

London, July 23.

The plenary session of the inter-Allied Conference re-assembled this afternoon. The delegates included the Canadian Senator Belcourt, while the High Commissioners of Australia, India, South Africa and New Zealand were present in the capacity of observers. The Conference sat for two hours and some progress was made. No new plenary meeting was arranged, but it is understood that the various committees will sit during the week-end, when several questions will be submitted again to the committees for further consideration.

M. Herriot will probably go to Paris to-morrow and return on Monday.

Later.

The official communiqué on to-day's plenary session of the Allied Conference states that Mr. MacDonald made a statement with regard to the representation of the Dominions and India, similar to the announcement made in the House of Commons recently by the Colonial Secretary, Mr. Thomas.

Afterwards a committee of jurists was appointed to report on the question whether the putting into operation of the Dawes plan gave rise to questions, and, if so, which would require to be settled by agreement with Germany and what procedure should be adopted in order to arrive at such agreement without in any way running counter to the Treaty of Versailles.

The consideration of the report of the First Committee was deferred pending the conclusion of the work of the Second and Third Committees.

Sir Robert Kindersley submitted the report of the Third Committee with regard to the organization to be established for putting to proper use the payments by Germany, particularly deliveries in kind. The Committee was of opinion that the Reparations Commission and the existing inter-Allied service were eminently suited for this purpose, and that, therefore, it was unnecessary to appoint a new body. As a result of discussion the terms of reference of the Third Committee were extended.

The report that M. Herriot would leave for Paris at the week-end to consult the French Parliament with regard to the negotiations in London is officially denied.

The Committee of Jurists, mentioned in the official communiqué, consist of Sir Cecil Hurst and M. Fromageot. The work of this committee is regarded as the first step towards getting German representatives to appear before the conference.

Security for German Loan

Mr. Mellon, the Secretary of the United States Treasury, had a long conference with Mr. MacDonald today. Subsequently the Prime Minister interviewed the bankers, including Mr. Lamont, Sir Montagu Norman and Sir Robert Kindersley, with regard to the question of security for the investors in the loan to Germany.

It appears that Mr. Hughes, the American Secretary of State, who is visiting England in an unofficial capacity with the American Lawyers' Association, has been in consultation with Mr. MacDonald and other Conference delegates. He saw M. Herriot to-day at the American Embassy in company with the American Ambassador.—Reuter.

A Critical Stage

London, July 24.

Though competent French quarters in London admit that there is certain to be a deadlock, feeling is not pessimistic. It is not believed that the Conference is about to break down. On the contrary, a prominent member of the French delegation declared that a way would certainly be found eventually out of the difficulty with regard to the proper guarantees to the bankers and the maintenance of the sovereign rights of France according to the Treaty of Versailles.

British circles also are not pessimistic with regard to the Conference, but are now convinced that the Conference will last some time, possibly until the first week of August.

Reuter's correspondent in Paris states that the press in general agrees that the London Conference has reached a critical stage but that it is premature to talk of a rupture.

The "Petit Parisien" anticipates that the difficulty with the financiers will be overcome in a few days by the adoption in a modified form of the suggestion of M. Theunis, the Belgian Premier, that in the event of necessity for imposing fresh sanctions other than those recommended by the expert committee, the Power which imposes such sanctions shall guarantee the service of the German loan.—Reuter.

AMERICAN HELP IN EUROPE

Important Pronouncement of Policy Endorsed by White House

London, July 22.

Mr. Hughes, the United States Secretary of State, was the guest at a dinner of the Pilgrims Society last night. The Duke of Connaught presided and the Prince of Wales, Members of the Cabinet and many distinguished personages, including overseas representatives, were present.

The Chairman, proposing the health of the guest, said that they appreciated very highly the services Mr. Hughes had rendered to the world and mankind by the generous manner in which he had always regarded different important questions. His presence in London at present was greatly important. There was a warm feeling in England towards America. Anything which would promote that feeling would be of lasting interest to the whole world.

The Prince of Wales, supporting the Chairman, said that he hoped to visit the United States again in the autumn.

Mr. Hughes, replying, said that America could be counted upon as a non-aggressive power, devoted to the interests of peace. They believed that the Dawes plan opened the path to confidence and prosperity and they were therefore deeply interested in its prompt execution.—Reuter.

Washington, July 22.

The White House regards Mr. Hughes's declaration at the Pilgrims' dinner in London that American assistance in the economic rehabilitation of Europe might be counted on, as a general statement of American international policy under the Coolidge Administration. Mr. Hughes and President Coolidge had discussed the speech beforehand.—Reuter's American Service.

No more important telegram than the above has been received for longer than we can well remember, especially when taken in conjunction with the presence of an American representative in the Allied Conference in London now sitting. Unfortunately all we received yesterday of Mr. Hughes's speech at the Pilgrims' dinner was as follows:—

> Mr. Hughes, replying, said that America could be counted upon as a non-aggressive Power, devoted to the interests of peace. They believed that the Dawes plan opened the path to confidence and prosperity and they were therefore deeply interested in its prompt execution.

Clearly from the statement now emanating from White House Mr. Hughes must have said something much more positive and arresting than this milk-and-watery summary suggests. In view of the extreme importance of the speech and of the new policy indicated, Reuter's Agency would receive the gratitude of British and Americans alike if it would cable even now the fullest possible report of what Mr. Hughes said.—Ed.

THE TREATY OF MUTUAL ASSISTANCE

Sound Reasons for Britain's Abstention: To Safeguard Peace in the Pacific

Geneva, July 19.

Powerful opposition to the Treaty of Mutual Assistance, drafted by the League of Nations last year, is forthcoming in a letter from Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, who states, inter alia, that the proposals will entail an increase rather than a decrease in the British naval and military forces, and tend to the formation of rival groups of Powers, thus reverting to the old system of alliances and counter-alliances. Moreover, Mr. MacDonald maintains, it implies an undesirable extension of the powers of the Council of the League, which would become a powerful executive organ instead of a consultative body.—Reuter.

Paris, July 21.

The Left organ, the "Ere Nouvelle," defending Britain's refusal to join the pact of mutual assistance drafted by the League of Nations, says that Frenchmen forget nowadays that Britain depends on her Dominions as much as and perhaps more than the Dominions depend on Britain. It is just as important for Britain to assure peace in the Pacific as in Europe. The possibility of a conflict between the United States and Japan looms on the horizon and it will be impossible for Australia and, therefore, Britain to remain indifferent to it.

The League's draft pact in no way assures peace in the Pacific, because the United States refuse to adhere to it. If Britain accepted the pact, she would be giving Japan a purely one-sided assurance.—Reuter.

GOVERNMENT AND THE HOUSING BILL

Two Defeats in Committee Stage: Virtual Agreement of Builders' Unions

London, July 22.

The Government's score of defeats now totals 10 after the passage of two adverse votes in the committee stage of the Housing Bill in the House of Commons. In the first case a Liberal amendment was passed by 201 votes to 155, and in the second case a Labour amendment, which the Government had accepted, was rejected by 137 votes to 119. In both cases, however, Mr. Wheatley, the Minister of Health, accepted the decision of the House.

In the course of the debate, Mr. Wheatley surprisingly announced a virtual agreement of the builders' unions regarding the provision for skilled workers, outlined in the scheme, speeding up the process of apprenticeship by the enlistment of the assistance of technical schools and evening classes, and also the promotion of semi-skilled labourers.—Reuter.

RUBBER SALES MUST BE RESTRICTED

Obligation to Pay Debt to U.S. Does Not Include Supplying Rubber at a Loss

London, July 18.

Mr. Winston Churchill, speaking at a dinner to-night of the Society of Planters of Malaya, recalled that he took the responsibility of recommending to the Cabinet the rubber restriction scheme.

He felt strongly that a great industry like rubber, in which millions of British capital was sunk, deserved constant support from the Colonial Office. Rubber was a commodity which was one of our few remaining methods of paying our debt to the United States.

Our American friends, on the one hand, demanded the uttermost farthing of the debt we had incurred on behalf of the Allies in the course of the common struggle against Germany. On the other hand, they erected enormous barriers of tariffs, which prevented payment in goods of what the Legislature so strongly demanded.

Mr. Churchill said that he had always felt that, however seriously our obligations might be judged, yet we were under no obligation to supply our American friends with rubber at a loss (cheers).

The idea of the restriction scheme was obtaining stability, which would enable the industry to get upon a solid foundation. The British Empire was entitled to obtain a reasonable margin of profit on its rubber production. It was the duty of the Government to facilitate arriving at such a result. He hoped that, on the basis of the scheme, they would be able to deal effectively with the difficulties of the industry, which was one of enormous consequences for the Empire.

Dutch Holding Aloof.

The Chairman, Mr. O'Hara Hickson, responding, declared that the industry had decidedly turned the corner and the gate was closed behind it. Mr. Churchill's scheme was in no way a failure and, if only our friends across the water, namely, the Dutch, had entered the scheme instead of feathering their own nests, they would not to-day be in the position they were.—Reuter.

America Biggest Consumer

London, July 23.

Sir Eric Geddes, in the course of a speech to a representative gathering of all branches of the rubber industry at a dinner in connexion with the Empire Exhibition last night, dwelt on the great increase in the use of rubber. He pointed out that consumption in the United States was over six pounds per head and that in the United Kingdom one pound per head. America was the greatest customer of the plantation owner, and therefore the grower must serve this customer faithfully and well and must co-operate with him in promoting the development of the industry. Different views were held regarding rubber restriction in different parts of the world, but the maintenance of a steady supply was essential to the industry as a whole.—Reuter.

Creation of Indian Ownership of Marine and Ultimately an Indian Navy

Simla, July 19.

The Government of India is discussing the report of the Mercantile Marine Committee, consisting of prominent Indian and British businessmen, recommending the formation of a mercantile marine and shipbuilding industry by the Government purchasing one of the existing British lines which will eventually be transferred to approved Indian owners.

The report suggests that coasting licences should be issued to those undertaking to employ a certain proportion of Indian seamen but no licences should be issued to foreign ships except those protected by treaty rights and ships flying the British flag.

It advocates that assistance should be given to Indian-managed ships by mail contracts and bounties and further recommends the creation of an Indian Navy capable of defending the Indian coasts, harbours and commerce.—Reuter.

THE DISTURBANCES IN DELHI

Hindu-Mohammedan Friction: Populace Excited by Mischievous Rumours

Delhi, July 24.

Although the communal tension is slowly easing, the disturbed conditions between the Mohammedans and the Hindus have not yet subsided. Sporadic acts of individual violence and the propagation of mischievous rumours serve to embitter the feeling of the excited populace. The authorities have taken firm measures.

The shops yesterday evening began to re-open, but during the night a Hindu was stabbed to death in consequence of which the majority of shops closed again.—Reuter.

GOVERNMENT POLICY IN INDIA

Debate in the House of Lords: The Lee Recommendations: Civil Service Claims

London, July 22.

The House of Lords last night debated the Indian situation on the initiative of Viscount Peel, who asked for a full Government statement of policy. He drew special attention to the general constitutional situation, the question of applying the report of the Lee Commission, dealing with the acceleration of the Indianisation of some services and the provincialisation of other services, and the improvement of the financial conditions and security of tenure of European civil servants in India, whose recruitment in Britain was recently becoming difficult.

Lord Olivier, the Secretary of State for India, replying, declared that, owing to the magnitude of the issues involved, it was impossible to pass judgement on the Lee recommendations within such a short period. In the meantime he sympathized with the claims of the civil service. He declared that recruiting in Britain for certain services had been temporarily suspended under the recommendations of the report, but British recruiting for the pivotal services was being continued. In this connexion he did not fear being unable to get sufficient applicants. With regard to constitutional reform, Lord Olivier declined to pre-judge the report of the committee which was at present exhaustively exploring the situation.—Reuter.

MURDER OF U. S. CONSUL IN PERSIA

Government's Expression of Regret: Many Suspects Under Arrest

Teheran, July 18.

A mob killed the American Consul here to-day.

The Consul and his Oriental secretary were photographing a public fountain when they were attacked by the mob. The secretary, a police officer and six policemen were injured.

July 20.

The shooting of the American Consul was the culmination of recent anti-foreign and particularly anti-British agitation conducted in the native press and elsewhere which the Government was unable to check owing to lack of a proper press law.—Reuter.

Washington, July 20.

Teheran, July 20.

Martial law has been proclaimed. Several suspects have been arrested.

July 21.

The murder of Mr. Imbrie, the American Consul, occurred while he was driving with an American friend, Mr. Seymour, in the neighbourhood of a fountain reverenced by masses of Persians daily.

The fountain was then surrounded by worshippers. The Americans alighted from their carriage a short distance off and the Consul held up his camera to photograph the scene. The crowd objected and surged towards the Americans, who hastily entered the carriage and drove off. The crowd followed and shouted imprecations, accusing the Americans of being "Bahais," a non-Mohammedan religious sect, and of poisoning the fountain. The uproar spread and the carriage was overtaken by a motor-cyclist and forced to stop.

Soldiers joined the crowd, who dragged out the Americans from the carriage. Mr. Imbrie defended himself with his stick until he was hit on the head with a sword. He attempted to rise, but was knocked down by a huge stone which broke his jaw. Mr. Seymour was freely struck. They were then dragged to the Cossack parade ground.

A police detachment managed to get the injured men into a motor-car and conveyed them to the police hospital. The crowd followed and broke into the building, smashing the doors and windows, and again assaulted the Consul, fatally.

Some hopes are entertained for Mr. Seymour's recovery.—Reuter.

There were over 400 enemy dead. The Embassy also states that the progress of General Primo de Rivera through the western sector in the Spanish zone has been very successful.—Reuter.

The Americans are headed by Secretary of State Hughes and include ex-Ambassador Choate, Chief Justice Taft and Solicitor-General Montgomery Beck.

A fine programme of hospitality has been arranged, including a Royal Garden Party at Buckingham Palace and a Banquet, luncheons and receptions at the Mansion House, the Oxford, Cambridge and London Universities and the Houses of Parliament.—Reuter.

London, July 21.

There was an historic gathering at Westminister Hall to-day on the occasion of the official welcome to the American Bar Association. The ceremony was most impressive and began with a procession of 26 Law Lords and Judges, headed by the Lord Chancellor, resplendent in their scarlet and ermine robes of office. They then took their seats on a dais. In response to the summons of Viscount Haldane, the Lord Chancellor, the Attorney-General in an eloquent speech presented the guests.

Viscount Haldane delivered a fine speech of welcome. He recalled some of the great legal figures of the past who had sat in that Hall. Mr. Justice Sutherland also replied. The ceremony concluded with a procession of judges.—Reuter.

The new Government has released Maritz, the Boer ex-General who was sentenced to three years' imprisonment on a charge of high treason in connexion with the 1914 rebellion. It will be remembered that the judge explained at the trial that the lightness of the sentence was due to the accused's sufferings in years of exile, while his fellow offenders had been released after a short period of imprisonment. Maritz has only served three months of his sentence.—Reuter.

ITALIANS ARRESTED BY U. S. OFFICIALS

Charge of Smuggling Drugs: Hard Times Nowadays for Rum-Runners

Washington, July 20.

The Italian Embassy has asked the State Department to explain the "arbitrary arrest" of the commander and seven officers of an Italian steamer on charges of smuggling narcotics. The officers were released after a night in gaol. The Embassy alleges that the Federal agents showed excessive zeal.

Between the depredations of highjackers who board rum-running craft and remove cargoes at the point of pistols and the increased efficiency of the Prohibition agents reinforced by coastguards equipped with speedy motorboats, the rum-runners' outlook is not promising. The Department of Justice, in statements, declares that the Government is preparing to take vigorous steps to control the situation by forfeiture of vessels engaged in the business and by prosecution of all persons connected with them.—Reuter's American Service.

JAPAN READY TO MEET SOVIET

Conditions on Which Military and Naval Men Would Negotiate

Tokio, July 25.

While responsible circles refuse to comment on the proposed basis of renewal of the Russo-Japanese negotiations, which, it is understood, are being conducted in Peking after Mr. Yoshizawa's return to the Chinese capital at the end of the month, it is indicated that agreement was reached after the Cabinet meetings yesterday and the day before, presenting conditions by which an agreement is rendered less difficult.

These conditions, which are alleged to satisfy the military and naval sections of the Cabinet regarding the retention of the Saghalien resources, include a verbal apology by Russia for the Nikolaievsk massacre; longterm (stated to be 55 years) concessions for oil, coal and forests in Northern Saghalien, to be exploited by a Japanese company which will share profits with the Soviets: no concessions on the Siberian mainland; and retention of the Portsmouth Treaty with extension of Japan's fishing rights in Siberian waters. The question of debts can be postponed until after recognition, as in the case of British and Italian recognition of the Soviet.

If such conditions are acceptable to Russia it is understood that Japan is prepared to evacuate Saghalien in October.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

FROM THE FOUR WINDS

LOST!—THE BRITISH SUMMER

The Rain It Raineth Every Day: Strikes, Syndicalism and Cabinet Indifference

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

London, June 12.

We always complain, I know, about the weather, but really there is a good deal of justification this year for such an attitude. May was a very bad month, with the result that there was really no definite spring weather at all, there being 26 wet days against the normal number of 12, and 3.2 inches of rain against an average for the month of 1.72.

Since June started five of its first 10 days have been wet, though even when it has been fine during daylight rain has fallen at night, so that no period of any 24 hours has been free from it. It is, moreover, not particularly warm, as although the average temperature is about 59.20, which is normal, there are very frequently high winds which add to the existing discomfort. As a result, all open-air sport has gone to pieces. There are days on which no cricket at all can be played. The Race Meetings are nearly all spoilt. The first Race at Manchester this week was run in a terrific thunderstorm. At Yarmouth the weather was so bad as to keep away all but the hardened race-goers. Open-air functions suffer similarly. The King was to have presented Colours at Aldershot yesterday morning, but rain caused a postponement. The Wembley Exhibition is never free from mud, and were it not for the vast amount of indoor accommodation the attendances would suffer very greatly.

Yet Other Countries Suffer

Owing to the floods the rivers have been so high that boating has been impossible. The Thames river season has, up to the present, been disastrous. Although it was sunny on Bank Holiday, the current was far too strong and the river far too high for boating. There were one or two who ventured out, and there have been one or two inquests. The high winds all round the coast have prevented boating at sea and reduced bathing to very small proportions. For the most part the holiday and health resorts are having very little sun, and on Tuesday, out of 59 places from which records were available only one—Lerwick—was spared rain. In other words, we are having very much the same summer at present as in 1921.

Yet, fortunately, visitors are not grumbling. They do not expect a tropical climate in this northern island, and they have experienced similar bad weather in sunnier lands themselves. "It rained for 20 days before I left America," said a well-known sportsman who has just arrived in this country. Reports from other parts of the world agree with our own experience.

Of course, the wet weather helps indoor entertainments, but towards the end of the year we shall begin to see the serious effects of the present wet weather. Agricultural Shows are having a bad time. All cricket clubs are complaining and transport industries, which rely on fine weather, are suffering severely. Fortunately, owing to the relative absence of real thunderstorms, there is little loss of life and little damage to property.

For one week we have had a complete cessation of politics, though members have only seven days' holiday and Parliament starts again on Monday. There is a great deal of business to be done and although some people say that there will be a General Election in August, when the Government will go to the country on its Housing Proposals, which are not liked by anybody, owing to their being mere juggling with figures. I do not in the least see why they cannot retain office, if they wish, until next year. At all events, the Ministry is not making progress, though I would not go as far as asserting that among the unthinking its popularity is diminished.

Labour Power Labour Unrest.

What annoys people more than anything is the obvious fact that the existence of a Labour Government synchronizes with industrial unrest. It is no good pretending that this is not the case. All over the country there are sporadic outbreaks by Labour agitators, of which we are now having the worst in London, in the shape of another partial stoppage of all Underground traffic, the third in six months. It is quite an irresponsible outbreak, disowned for the most part by the Unions concerned, and regarded by the Government with an appalling amount of complaisancy.

That this is so, is shown by Mr. Shaw, the Minister of Labour, who calmly announced in the House that so long as the railways were not nationalized the Government did not see why it should interfere in a dispute of this nature. He hurriedly tried to modify the bad impression that sentiment caused, but, of course, it did represent the views of the Government, who never intervene if they think it will pain Labour feeling. Ministers are always frightened of being hauled over the coals by the "Daily Herald" which, though supposed to be a Government organ, appears to be entirely in extremist hands.

The public, though never badly disposed towards wage claims, if they are justified, very much resents the present way in which it is "held up," and will not forget what is happening when the time arrives for expressing an opinion on Labour methods generally. Railway workers are, as a matter of fact, not badly paid, but Communist influences are spreading very rapidly, and I could quote at least half-a-dozen trades where the workers are taking up a Syndicalist attitude, in other words, claiming that the industry should be solely run for the benefit of the workers in it, irrespective of any gain either to Capital or to the community. This doctrine is now even being applied to the Post Office.

Calendar of Crime

We have finished the police court proceedings both in the Bungalow murder case and in the Byfleet poisoning affair. In each the accused person has been committed for trial. Now we have another alleged poisoning case at Edinburgh, in which it is suggested that a young man of good family, 22 years of age, tried to poison his mother and father with arsenic. The woman died, but the man recovered. The police are, in addition, industriously prosecuting all promoters of semi-public racing sweepstakes, but we shall have to have legislation to make it perfectly clear what the law is on the subject. For the moment we are having fewer motor accidents than is common about this time of the year. Drivers are evidently getting more careful, and the authorities are invariably sending to prison everyone found to be intoxicated while driving any sort of motor vehicle.

Undoubtedly, London is gradually filling up with foreign visitors, and perhaps for that reason there are more indications of swindles than there have been for a very long time. The "confidence trick," the "Spanish Prisoner" fraud and the "gold brick" swindle are all being hard-worked and, curiously enough, there are still many people who are taken in by them. The hotels are very full and it is not very easy to obtain emergency accommodation at the best-known resorts, though it is not difficult to do so if one is willing to go a little further afield. The theatres are doing quite as well as could be expected, while Opera is prospering unusually. There does not, however, seem to be a sufficiently large musical public to make the multitude of small concerts pay. Prices are hardening a little, though there is no very perceptible change, while the average visitor will probably be agreeably surprised to find that in the shops, at all events, he will not run the risk of being overcharged. One might have thought that with one million unemployed there would be indications of this in the public thoroughfares, but the contrary is the case. Were it not for the very poor weather the season would be a very good one; as it is, it might be a good deal worse.

LABOUR NEW HOUSING BILL

Side-tracking Public Attention from the Unemployment Fiasco

FROM OUR LABOUR CORRESPONDENT.

Manchester, July 19.

Mr. Wheatley's 1924 Housing Bill is the Labour Government's first notable effort in constructive legislation. Labour leaders have long claimed that they were better fitted to cope with the shortage of houses than the leaders of any other political party. They made the same claim in regard to unemployment but their record on that evil is as dispiriting as that of their opponents. It is, in fact, worse, for their promises were greater. Nothing is now more disheartening for a labour worker than a few hours with a pre-election Labour periodical. Mr. Fred Bramley, M.P., is at present one of the most vociferous apologists for the inactivity of his leaders. When Mr. Baldwin's Government was in office he wrote an article for the "Daily Herald" which contained the following—

"Schemes for finding work are not difficult to discover. They are held back because they are not immediately profitable to private speculators. We have the schemes, the natural resources, and raw materials; we have the man, woman, and mechanical power in abundance; we also have the money raising power represented by the credit of the entire community. There is only one element necessary which is not there, and that is the will of those in authority to utilise their powers and face their responsibilities."

Labour has now been "in authority" for nearly six months and has only succeeded in making the evil more acute by its budget proposals.

There is every reason to suppose that the many pungent comments on the Government's ineptitude in dealing with unemployment have stimulated it into making its housing proposals a little more grandiose than they would otherwise have been. Certainly no Minister has ever before confronted Parliament with a legislative proposal estimated to cost £2,500,000,000. Yet this is the estimate of the total cost of Mr. Wheatley's proposals. That he should get them put through without a division says a great deal for his skill as a parliamentarian and is an acid commentary on the bad records of his political opponents, who have unsuccessfully attempted to patch up the evil for the last six years. A political party which opposed any scheme that seemed likely to solve the problem,—no matter what its cost might be,—would get short shrift from the electors at the next general election.

It is common knowledge that few industries contributed a larger proportion of its workers to the Army during the war than the builders. Thousands of them found a permanent resting place on the world's scattered battlefields. This diminution of workers, in conjunction with the enormous arrears in building created a more acute labour problem in the building industry than in any other. To make matters worse tens of thousands of young people celebrated the end of the war by getting married and demanding the immediate production of those promised homes that were to be fit for heroes to live in.

The Building Tyranny.

They were not forthcoming. Building material manufacturers had organized themselves into a great combine and were getting immense profits on their products. Building operatives were well organized, refused to work more than a 44 hour week, demanded very high wages, and steadfastly refused to listen to any proposals for the dilution of their numbers by the admission of semi-skilled labourers able to do the rougher forms of bricklaying. The anti-Labour press persistently attacks these operatives for their unsocial conduct. There are two sides to the qquestion. Like the workers in many other skilled industries the operative builders have been greatly impressed by the sad fate of the operatives in the engineering trade. It may be remembered that the engineers during the war consented to a dilution scheme on the understanding that pre-war conditions should be reverted to when the emergency was over. The employers never kept their side of the contract and a skilled fitter or turner to-day earns a smaller weekly wage than a corporation scavenger.

As a result of these difficulties the local authorities engaged in house-building under the first State-aided Addison scheme found that it cost more than £1000 to build a pre-war £120 house. The Geddes economy axe lopped off the State subsidies. Addison quarrelled with Lloyd George and the whole scheme collapsed. Fewer houses were built than in an ordinary pre-war year and the position of the homeless grew steadily worse. Under the Baldwin régime Mr. Neville Chamberlain sponsored the 1923 Housing Bill, which ensured substantial State subsidies for newly built houses but did nothing to ensure the provision of them for the class most in need. It was a failure. In nine months it only provided 4,645 completed houses; a mere crumb in comparison to the deficency.

An Enormous Price

Mr. Wheatley's Bill offers a State subsidy of from £9 to £12.10.0 per annum for 40 years for each house of a certain specified kind built under the provisions of the Act. The total number of houses allowed for is 2,500,000 and the annual expenditure at the peak will be £34,000,000. The distinctive feature of the Bill is its attempt to provide newly built houses for workers at pre-war rents. It has been estimated that the proviso limiting the rents of these houses will increase their cost by £165 per house.

In presenting his Bill to Parliament Mr. Wheatley stated that the average cost of the land on which one of his new £500 houses will stand accounts for 1¼d. per week in rent, or 6s. 6d. per year. The cost of materials and profits amounted to £280, which put a weekly burden on the house of 1s. 10¼d. The cost of labour added another 1s. 3d. per week. Taken altogether the services of the people who by hand and brain gave service to the erection of the houses cost 3s. 9d. per week of their rent. The whole of the remainder—6s. 6d. per week, was taken up by finance, and it went to those people who lent their surplus wealth for the erection of the houses. Since 1900 the price of money had gone up 1¾ per cent. This increase was an additional £400 on every working class house erected in the country.

The Tyranny Stands Firm

Prior to presenting his Bill to the House Mr. Wheatley met representatives of the building trade operatives and the building material manufacturers. He was unable to persuade the former to agree to admit to their craft any of the surplus labour now on the market, or to up-grade their semi-skilled assistants already in the industry.

Their only concession was a promise to reduce the years of apprenticeship to four, and largely to increase the proportion of apprentices to men. The manufacturers agreed to charge no more for their products than the prices ruling last January unless such increases were justified by causes over which they had no control. This promise not to profiteer was confined to members of the building materials combine. The manufacturers outside the combine are alleged to have already increased their prices. To cope with these pirates Mr. Wheatley has drawn up a Building Materials Bill making it a punishable offence to profiteer in the sale of building materials required for house building. Offenders are to be liable to imprisonment and heavy fines.

Telling Criticism

The opponents of the Bill have an embarrassing quantity of telling objections to put forward against it. Firstly, they say it is unworkable because the crux of the problem is the shortage of labour and an increased number of apprentices will not make up for that deficency. Secondly, they allege that the nation cannot afford it and no subsequent government will consider itself bound to take over such a crushing heritage. Thirdly, they allege that the master builder's associations and the organizations of building operatives have held up the rest of the nation to ransom and dictated on what terms they are prepared to do work of national importance. The "New Leader" has no faith in the proposed penalties for profiteering, and prophecies that the measure will be as complete a fiasco as the previous War Bill against profiteering was. Many left-wing critics of the Government say that the Bill is nothing but a bit of adroit window-dressing put forward for vote-catching purposes in case there should be a general election in the autumn. Other critics describe it as a reprehensible form of subsidising low wages at the cost of the community. The homeless say that they will believe that the houses are coming when they see them. The average man with a house is now so used to hearing about national debts in terms of thousands of millions of pounds that a further thousand million does not mean anything to him, and it is impossible to try and excite him about it.

A Little Sunshine

The Liberal Party moved an amendment to ensure the payment of the subsidy on houses of a larger size than those specified in the Act. The proposed increase would have included houses of the kind rented by the lower middle classes from whom the Liberal party now derives most of its diminishing support. This amendment was ruled out of order on the ground that it might add to the charges under the scheme. At a subsequent debate Mr. Sunlight M.P. brought a little sunshine into the controversy. Under the ten minutes rule he craved permission to submit a Bill to solve the whole of the labour problem. For Mr. Sunlight has long marked the operative bricklayers' incurable aversion to laying more than a certain number of bricks per diem. To circumvent these Tired Tims he proposes to have the bricks made bigger by Act of Parliament. He appears to assume that the brick and mortar manipulator will not mark this conspiracy to rush the houses up, and will continue to lay his daily two hundred, or two hundred and 50 bricks by sheer force of habit. For a moment Mr. Sunlight's opportunity trembled in the balance for a derisive member ironically suggested that the new bricks should be made the size of one side of a house. Then the House slowly recovered its gravity and by a majority of one vote gave Sunlight the permission he craved.

NOT "MISERABLE SINNERS"

Mill Hill's Head on Boys and Religion

"It is positively unhealthy to tell a boy that he is a miserable sinner."

Mr. Maurice L. Jacks, the recently-appointed headmaster of Mill Hill School, made this declaration in an address at the annual meeting of the Sunday School Association.

"With the possible exception of English," he said, "there is no subject harder to teach than Scripture." He was speaking on "The teaching of religion in public schools."

The primary necessity was the study of the Bible itself—as literature, as secular history, as religious history, and as an account of the progressive revelation of God to a particular people.

School editions of the Bible, badly printed and hideously bound, were repellent to the sense of beauty which every boy possessed.

A boy had no conception of himself as a miserable sinner, and it was positively unhealthy to tell him that he was.

Most hymns, particularly those which described the world as a place of sin and woe, must be ruled out because they were packed with insincerity.

Mr. Jacks also warned his hearers against prayers cast in the form of "journalese," which conveyed to God information which one must suppose Him already to possess, and made mountains out of mole-hill particularities.

They appealed to a boy's sense of humour in the wrong way and bred a spirit of irreverence.

LONDON, July 18.—In the House of Commons to-day, Mr. J. H. Thomas, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, announced that it had been settled that a representative of any Dominion so desiring and of India would become members of the Empire delegation to the Conference on the panel system. Representatives so appointed would attend the Conference when not sitting as members of the Empire delegation. —Reuter.

SCOTTISH LETTER

Our Golden Treasury: Minor Vernacular Poets

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Edinburgh, June 11.

Scotsmen are not generally prone to disparage themselves, but in some directions they are surprisingly modest. Particularly this would appear to be so with regard to their poets. Burns, of course, has for long been the object of more or less discriminating, but always affectionate homage, but have the many singers before and after Burns been given the attention which is undoubtedly their due? Do Scotsmen really appreciate the fact that, as a nation, they have a heritage of poetry and song which few nations can surpass? Or must it be left to Englishmen such as Mr. G. K. Chesterton or Mr. De la Mare to love and acknowledge Scottish genius as it is revealed with magic in many a ballad and song? In the vernacular literature of its so-called minor bards Scotland has hidden away a golden treasury, the richness and variety of which is not widely enough appreciated. Among the many poets who have gifted something imperishable to this store, Robert Tannahill, the ill-fated Paisley poet, is not the least. And it is pleasing to record that the 150th anniversary of his birth is being celebrated in his native place. Tannahill is more than a Paisley poet. In a sense he has been overshadowed, as so many others have been, by the greater, more passionate, imaginative, and joyful genius of the National Bard, but some of his songs, "The Braes o' Balquhither," "Jessie, the Flower o' Dunblane," and "Gloomy Winter's noo awa,'" have in them a refined tenderness and pathos unsurpassed by Burns. With him, as with so many other poets praised after their death, it was winter without and winter within. His life was uneventful, passed chiefly at the loom weaving silk and song. His death, by his own hand, was a pathetic commentary on the poverty of his brief existence.

In recent years there has been a revival of interest in Scottish vernacular literature, but some suspicion still lurks in the minds of Scots and others that the vernacular is a medium not suited for poetry. This, when it is not merely the result of that ignorant cosmopolitanism which in despising the local shuts out the universal, is due to false notions of what poetry or poetic expression is. If the aim of poetry is insipidity, abstractness, aloofness from reality, a kind of vigourless, unhumorous Nirvana of sweet syllables unrelated to the human heart and to its passionate experiences in a jarring world, then the vernacular of "The Jolly Beggars" or of "Tam o' Shanter," or of "The Two Dogs," is a medium unsuited for poetic expression. But if poetry is the passionate realization in appropriate language of the experience of man in face of reality, then the Scottish vernacular is an apt and inspiring instrument. One is tempted to say that what is wrong with "English" poetry at the present day is that it is not written in the vernacular. In other words, it lacks direct humanity, vigour, and music. The vernacular as a medium smells—some would say reeks—of the soil. It may be in itself unsuitable as a means of expression for the loftier poetry of exaltation, but in these very limiting qualities of racy realistic power its chief virtue lies. As a corrective to the lack-lustre verse at present being written as poetry in sweet imitative English, the Scottish vernacular, as used even by such a modest poet as Tannahill, is both necessary and desirable.

A Bowes-Lyon Romance.

In the Court of Session, Lord Morison granted decree of declarator that Miss Constance Mary Lyon, at present an assistant in a newsagent's shop in Aberdeen, is the eldest child of Hubert Ernest Bowes-Lyon, a grandson of the 13th Earl of Strathmore. She claimed that she was legitimated by the marriage contracted subsequently to her birth between Hubert Ernest Bowes-Lyon and the deceased Mary Agnes Hay Smeaton or Bowes-Lyon. Mr. Lyon and Miss Smeaton first met at the Kardomah Café staff dance in Edinburgh. Mr. Lyon was at that time an officer in the Black Watch, and was stationed at Edinburgh Castle. He furnished a house in Blackford Avenue, and installed Miss Smeaton there. The parties later went to live at Tavistock Chambers, Hart Street, London. There was an "irregular" marriage in Edinburgh, and later a marriage in a registrar's office in London. The child was left under the care of a Mrs. Collie in Aberdeen, and in a letter sent by Mrs. Lyon to Mrs. Collie she wrote—"I am sending a small gift to Connie. Please do not say it is from her mother. You will never call her by the name of Lyon or let her know that she has a mother other than yourself." The reason for the mother's concealment it was suggested was to avoid the censorious comments of the Bowes-Lyon people and her own relatives. Mr. and Mrs. Bowes-Lyon were obviously a little ashamed of the incident at that time, and as time went on obviously also it would become more and more difficult to disclose the existence of the child to their relatives.

A Duke as Hodman.

The Duke of Argyll has been assisting the masons who are erecting a belfry in Inverary Castle grounds. With his coat and waistcoat off the Duke, who is over 50, was carrying stones every day last week, and acting as assistant generally to the skilled stonemasons. He is said to have worked full trade union hours, clad in kilt and grey woven shirt, with large Balmoral bonnet.

The Premier and Lossiemouth.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald paid his first visit to his native town of Lossiemouth since he became Prime Minister. He was met on the station platform by the Provost and Town Councillors and presented with an address of welcome. Afterwards his car was dragged through the town to his home, Hillocks, by over 100 young fishermen. "I have come up at this time of the year," he said, "to see the whin bushes in bloom and to hear the 'yellow yarlin' (the yellow hammer) sing." And again, "In Lossiemouth there are no Prime Ministers—not a solitary one—only a rather grown-up Lossie loon. Whoever is making money by doing nothing, a Prime Minister never does it." He added, "I am prepared to put myself up against the fisherman as a hard worker. He goes out in the storms; so do I. He throws his nets and lines overboard, and gets nothing. Very often I don't either. Sometimes he gets wrecked, and that is waiting me, too."

Quiet Clydeside Reds!

The painstaking statisticians of the Parliamentary Gazette have produced their analysis of speeches covering the period from the opening of the session in January till the Easter adjournment. Their quantitive measurement of oratorical output sets Mr. Ramsay MacDonald on a pinnacle. He spoke 126 columns of the official report. Mr. William Graham, of Edinburgh, the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, comes second with 95 to his credit. The general analysis shows the Clydesiders as a group of reticent gentlemen.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor has been giving his impression of some of the Clydesiders. He says:—James Maxton, with his sombre dark eyes, his long mane of black hair over his dark-complexioned and thin face, is, in private, one of the gentlest of men; David Kirkwood is so kindly a fellow that even the opponents he so oftentimes shocks rather like him; Buchanan looks such a boy—I can't believe he is 40, as some of the papers say—30, I believe, is all he confesses to—but nobody takes him too seriously. Mr. Whitley's success as a Parliamentarian is universally admitted. It is curious and might have been unexpected. He himself has told the world that he lived in a humble dwelling until he was 27. I believe his son has built up a modest prosperity by a successful publishing business, and he has two sons who are University graduates. But where did he get that immediate and almost uncanny mastery of the tone of the House of Commons?

OUR PARIS LETTER

The Execution of President Millerand: Communist's Tale of Wrongs

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Paris, June 12.

The first hour of the historic sitting at which the Chamber of Deputies "executed" M. Millerand—to use the Communist description of the operation—was remarkably quiet. After M. François Marsal, the head of the Cabinet which was formed for no other purpose than that of carrying the President's message to Parliament, had read that communication—a solemn warning against the consequences of making the presidency of the Republic dependent on party issues—a speech on the constitutional aspect of the question was delivered by M. Reibel, who was Minister for the Liberated Regions in the Poincaré Cabinet. The new majority scarcely took the trouble to interrupt. They had fully made up their minds, and they simply sat and listened until a messenger brought the news that the Senate had decided by a majority of 10 to adjourn. This meant that the Senate, generally supposed to be the guardian of the Constitution, did not intend to interfere. A flutter of excitement went through the assembly, the lids of ballot-boxes began to rattle as a hint that the debate had lasted long enough, and M. Marsal and his colleague, M. Jean Fabry, were shouted at and harried in the good old style.

Communist's Dirty Work.

The subject of the debate was a motion backed by M. Herriot and M. Léon Blum, the Radical and Radical-Socialist leaders, declaring that the Chamber could have nothing to do with a ministry constituted in defiance of Parliamentary rights, and must adjourn any discussion until a Government had been formed in accordance with the wishes of the country. Neither M. Herriot nor M. Blum nor any member of the Radical or Socialist parties spoke in support of the motion. The "dirty work," as M. Fabry called it, was left to M. Renaud Jean, one of the 26 Communists. He said that the working class had been repeatedly betrayed during the past quarter of a century by men in whom confidence was placed, and one of the worst, if not the worst, of these traitors and renegades was Alexandre Millerand. After this, the speaker read extracts from some of M. Millerand's speeches of 30 years ago, in which he denounced the "financial barons" of the day and described ministers as "clerks whose business it was to do the bidding of financiers."

M. Renaud Jean also asserted that M. Millerand had obtained pecuniary benefit by changing sides, by which he appeared to imply that M. Millerand had received numerous fat briefs in litigation over the expulsion of the congregations. The Communist speaker was especially bitter about the suppression of the railway strike in 1920 by M. Millerand, who, 20 years earlier, was counsel to the railwaymen's union. This deliberate sacrifice of Labour to Capital, said M. Renaud Jean, was what led M. Millerand to the Elysée. He wound up by saying that he and his friends intended to take advantage of any opportunity to punish those who betrayed the cause of the workers.

Revanche.

In vain did M. Fabry remind the Chamber that M. Millerand had a certain title to the national gratitude, if only for what he did as War Minister in the early stage of the great conflict. The majority declined to argue. The extremists of the Left were determined to be revenged on M. Millerand, and the Radicals would not lift a finger to save him. The motion which M. Herriot signed but did not support by a single word was carried by 327 to 217, and the President's doom was sealed. As no member of the majority would form a Cabinet so long as he remained at the Elysée, there was no course open to him but retirement, and, as soon as he was made acquainted with the Chamber's vote, he announced that he would resign. He carried out his intention next day in a letter of the briefest possible kind, addressed to the presidents of the Senate and Chamber.

A Dangerous Precedent.

At the same time he issued an address to the country, in which he explained that he had offered office to the men indicated by the result of the general election, and that they had not only held aloof but insisted on his resignation. He added:

"This was an unjustifiable demand, in sharp opposition to the letter and spirit of the constitution. The selection of the head of the State is entirely in the hands of Parliament, but the constitution prudently provides that, except in the case of high treason, he is responsible to no one during his seven years of office. A decision suggested by party spirit to a few leaders has destroyed this guarantee. Under pressure from these leaders, meetings held outside Parliament came to the conclusion that as the President of the Republic was not to the liking of the majority in the new Chamber, he must retire at once, without waiting for his term of office to come to an end. This is a dangerous precedent. It makes the Presidency of the Republic a stake in the electoral conflict. To all intents and purposes it brings the plébiscite into our political system, and it wrenches away from the constitution its one element of stability and continuity. It would have been a crime on my part to endorse so dangerous an innovation. It was my duty to resist, and I did not yield until all the legal means at my disposal were exhausted."

M. Millerand and his family are now moving their personal effects from the Elysée to the small house he owns at Versailles. He intends to take a few months' rest and resume his practice at the Bar after the long vacation. Though he is 65 years old, he is not by any means a "back number." It is not at all unlikely that he will seek re-election to Parliament, in which case he will be a thorn in the side of those who have treated him so unceremoniously. To-morrow the two Houses of Parliament meet at Versailles to select his successor. Whoever he may be, he will be the first President of the Republic to be elected on a Friday, the 13th of the month. Let us hope he is not superstitious.

Country's Feeling Uncertain.

It is yet too soon to form any idea as to whether the country really approves of this summary dismissal of its chief magistrate and elected head. At present the prevailing feeling seems to be surprise. During the electoral campaign M. Millerand was attacked only by the more rabid Communists and Socialists. His removal was certainly not an issue before the electorate, and even after the polling on May 11 only the inner ring could have scented any danger to him. The movement developed very rapidly after the new Chamber assembled on May 25. It would clearly have been very difficult for M. Millerand to work with any ministry representing the new majority, and, to this extent, most people realize that his elimination was a necessary vindication of the supremacy of Parliament. Whether this elimination was worth a violation of the constitution is another matter. Since the war, France has appeared to the world in the light of the sole continental bulwark of order and respect for established institutions. Frenchmen themselves will be anxious to see whether this enviable reputation is affected in the eyes of other countries by the Millerand case.

In France itself the business and financial interests are uneasy. If the constitution can be disregarded with equanimity, they argue, what sort of extremist legislation may we not expect? M. Millerand may turn out to be only the first in a long list of victims. The rupture of relations with the Vatican, the recognition of the Soviets, an amnesty to common law as well as political offenders, and a reduction of military service (while Germany is secretly arming) are all included in the Radical-Socialist programme. Perhaps M. Herriot may be strong enough to resist pressure from the extremists of the Left. Unless he develops a greater force of character than he has hitherto been supposed to possess, we must look out for troublous times.

MR. Edwin Moss Williams, son of Dr. Walter Williams, Dean of the School of Journalism at the University of Missouri, Columbia (Mo.), is now in Shimonoseki, but intends to leave for Peking in a few days. Mr. Williams proposes to make a tour of China and later visit the Philippines before his return to America early next autumn.

NEW EXPEDITION TO THE ARCTIC

Departure of the Oxford University Party

With the idea of setting up a new Furthest North record in actual navigation, the Oxford University. Arctic Expeditionary Party was to leave the Tyne in the Norwegian motor whaler, "The Polarbjorn."

For a sturdy three-hundred-tonner the Polarbjorn is sufficiently novel to attract lively attention from all the Tyne mariners. When I visited the ship writes a correspondent of the "Observer" stores of every conceivable variety, from gramophones records to chocolate,. were being stowed away, and the party of 38 Army, aerial, and medical men—were obviously keen in getting to sea in such glorious weather. Colonel Tennant, a nephew of Mrs. Asquith, was sanguine in conversation with me of valuable research work being accomplished in North Eastland, hitherto a real No Man's Land, as he termed it, so far as scientific observation is concerned, mentioning that he will be in charge of the inland sledging parties.

Colonel Tennnat explained that the sledges would be in communication with the powerful wireless installation of the Polarbjorn, and they were hopeful of being able to communicate with places in Norway, and thus provide a running record of the work and progress of the explorers.

After leaving the Tyne the party will take up the skipper, Captain Isaacsen, at Trondhjem, and then make for Spitzbergen. The latest photographic and scientific appliances are on board. A small sailing sloop and a motor boat are accompanying the Polarbjorn to North Eastland, and it is hoped to assemble the seaplane at Green Harbour, where the dog teams will be collected.

Captain Groves has been loaned from the Air Force to fly the first seaplane north of the Arctic Circle, and valuable assistance in financial and other ways has been accorded to the expedition by the Air Ministry, the Royal Geographical Society and the War Office. Mr. Howard Binney is the leader, and he and other officers this evening enjoyed the hospitality of the Lord Mayor of Newcastle at the Mansion House. It is hoped to spend all July and August north of Spitzbergen and accomplish valuable survey work ere the ice closes in.

DEATH VALLEY RAILROAD

A Profitless Concern

Los Angeles, June 28.

In altitude and earnings the Death Valley Railroad is the lowest in the United States, according to a report filed here with the State Railroad Commission, seeking permission to abandon the line because, the company declares, "it isn't worth the distinction of being designated a common carrier." In the request for permission to abandon the line as a common carrier it was noted that the earnings jumped from $1.32 to $23.78 in 1923. Company officials explained that the increase was "unnatural" and was on account of motion picture companies using the desert as locations. —Reuter's American Service.

CRABS AS STOWAWAYS

Chinese Crustacea Find New Home and Hearty Welcome in Germany

Hamburg, June 12.

Riding as stowaways all the way from China to Germany, a brood of crabs known to the scientist as "eriocheir," has settled down in the River Elbe and is enriching this stream by a hitherto unknown species of fauna. The crabs fastened themselves to the bottoms of ships plying between Hamburg and China, in the opinion of German zoologists, and are here beginning to multiply. Fifteen specimens have thus far been discovered.

The crab in question is characterized by long hair on the shears. A group of fishermen caught several of these queer-looking animals in their nets and took them to the State Zoological Institute, where they were identified as a type found only in Chinese waters. German scientists are delighted over the find.—Reuter.

THE LIGHT SIDE OF LONDON

Golden Hair or Raven Tresses?

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

London, June 18.

I always like to read the newspaper controversies on the typical beloved hero of the Varsity or the theatre or the music-hall of the concert room. I rather fancy that some day someone will discover a preference which will suit my particular characteristics and then I shall feel I have not lived in vain. For the same no doubt a good many of the weaker sex or the more pushful sex—whichever you prefer—will be following with interest the current correspondence which has a quite genuine origin on the "musical comedy heroine type." It was all started by Jose Collins who has been playing Nell Gywnne in a flaxen wig of aggressive character, basing her delineation on the accepted view that the famous orange girl was of fair complexion and fresh colour. Then she suddenly changed her mind—souvent femme varie—and now Nell bolssoms out in beautiful black tresses with a complexion just about as dark as that always ascribed to Charles the Second himself.

Now into the historical argument I am not going to plunge. I am only concerned at the curious kink given to the dispute by the assertion that it is very nearly an innovation of the most questionable nature for a musical comedy artiste to possess anything but golden hair and blue eyes. Mr. Robert Evett of the Gaiety suggests that Miss Collins is the first to break with tradition. I think he is quite wrong. Unless my memory fails me I remember quite a string of Gaiety favourites who were black or brown haired and they did not wear wigs.—Gertie Millar (now Countess of Dudley) Mabel Russell (now Mrs. Philipson, M.P.) Ethel Sydney. Florence Collingbourne, Olive May (now Countess of Drogheda) and Evie Greene. Probably there were lots more. Possibly the old tradition dates from the Gounodian Faust days when every Marguerite had to be the German Gretchen with a wealth of plaited towy hair and blue eyes of the supermagnified forget-me-not type. The hair was of the sort popularized by Vesta Victoria in that clastic melody, "Her golden hair was hanging down her back."

There is of course no accepted "type" of any musical comedy artiste. Every age has its preferences; the Blue Eyes of to-day give place to-morrow to Dark Eyes according to the public taste.

For the moment I think there is a growing boom in favour of the darker shades but it will pass just as the craze for bobbed hair is passing with the transition stage of shingles until we once again reach the retention of undiminished "woman's greatest glory." Not for a single moment does any manager ask himself whether his leading lady is dark or fair but only whether she can "filll the bill."

The Flapper's Joy.

You find these popular impulses also governing the choice of hero. You can either have the hero of the Owen Nares or the Godfrey Tearle and Geoffrey Faber type. In the war the latter was in the ascendant. Then we had a run of the Nares Brand and now we are experiencing a throw-back. I suppose acting has a bit to do with popularity but really if it were only a male mannequin show the flappers would roll up. Indeed the mannequin show is being worked for all it is worth. Last Sunday—just before Ascot—there was a sort of stage erected on the riverside lawn at Murray's Club at Maidenhead for the evening display of fashionable racemeeting dresses. Firms have also started male mamnequin shows so I feel there will always be something to fall back on if I am not quite venerable enough to qualify for the Old Age Pension.

CHANGE-OF-SEASON PERILS

Take Peps and Escape Dangerous Colds and Chills

It is not the coldest weather that puts the greatest strain on chest and lungs. It is the period "between seasons" when the lowering temperatures leave the throat and breathing passages in an unusually sensitive condition and more open to attacks from the germs of colds, chills, influenza, etc. At such a time, the strengthening, protective influence of Peps cannot be overemphasized.

When dissolved in the mouth, Peps have an invigorating, antiseptic and fortifying action on the entire breathing system. They give off potent, volatile fumes whose effect is to purify and thoroughly disinfect the throat and breathing passages, destroy harmful germs and remove all soreness, inflammation and irritation. Where persistent coughs, colds, influenza, bronchitis, or other chest weakness has devleoped, Peps can be relied upon to cure far more speedily than any of the old liquid mixtures.

Be sure and secure a supply of these handy Peps tablets to-day. Take them whenever you have to go outdoors into the dmap, chilly air as a precaution against catching a cold. Also in the crowded assembly or any travelling conveyance a Peps in the mouth will safeguard you against infection from others suffering from inflenza, colds, throat and lung troubles.

FROM SIMON TO PETER

A Sermon Preached by the Rev. A. N. Rowland on June 29, 1924 at Union Church, Shanghai

"Simon, Simon, Satan has claimed the right (A.V. desired) to have you that he might sift you as wheat, but I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not." (Luke 22—31).

It is one of the paradoxes of our faith that Simon Peter should be the rock on which the Church is founded. Rome, as we know, takes literally the words in Matthew C.16, as to Peter's appointment, and makes them the keystone of her polity. It is surprising indeed how much may be said in support of the primacy of Pter. This verse for instance is clearly in harmony with the idea of a special responsibility on his part. And if you grant apostolical succession you are logically bound to accept the Papacy.

But it is no less remarkable that Simon Peter was a personal contradiction of those ideals that have been associated with the Catholic Church.

(1) Rome believes in a celibate ministry—But Simon Peter is frankly described as a married man: his mother-in-law was one of the earliest cures of Christ. Cardinal Gibbons declares that he renounced his wife, when he said "Lord we have left all" (C. 18). But in any case he did not desert her, for St. Paul mentions that she accompanied his colleague in his missionary journeys.

(2) Again Rome believes in a hierarchy of which the supreme authority is vested in the Popes as the successors of St. Peter. But once more the Simon Peter we know does not fit the place prepared for him. We have a letter of his in which he repudiates authoracy. "The elders among you I exhort as a fellow elder. Tend your flock, not by lording it over them, but by the example that you show."

Peter and the Pope.

(3) Once more an authorized handbook of Rome declares that the Apostles, being themselves infallible, have handed down to their successors the "essential gift of infallibility." And yet when we look at the portrait of Simon Peter in the old records we find there is only one thing in which he was consistent, and that was his liability to error and correction.

It is certainly remarkable that in these three chief points of Roman Catholic belief—celibacy, authority, infallibility, which are secured by the supremacy of the Apostle Peter, the testimony of his life seems entirely opposed to the claims made on his behalf. And we can only say that in all these matters dogmatism is out of place.

Yet when we consider the foundations of the Church, and the beginning of our organized faith it remains true that we are bound to focus Simon Peter. Both in the company that went with Jesus and in the community that was founded at Jerusalem he was unquestionably the outstanding figure. And the verse before us is not the least important witness. "Simon, Satan has claimed the right to have you (all), that he may sift you as wheat, but I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not, and do thou when once thou hast turned again (R. V.) establish thy brethren."

It seems to suggest that his importance for the Church consists, not in being celibate or superior, but in having been sifted until his strength was left only in his loyalty and faith. In the paraphrase of Papini, "Thou Peter shalt be hard and staunch as a rock, and upon the staunchnes of thy faith in Me is founded the first Christian society. There is a profound Christian lesson in the numerous trials of Simon Peter, whose only strength at last was proved to be his hold on his Saviour and his Saviour's hold on him. That is the thought I would like to dwell upon on this day of his commemoration. He is presented to us as the typical man of the Kingdom in the proved weakness of every power he had but faith.

Peter and Adam.

Once upon a time there was a garden wherein stood a tree that professed to be a tree of life, but proved to be one of death, and beside it we see the typical member of the human race, Adam. But at the turning point of time there was another Garden wherein stood a tree of death, bearing neither leaf nor shoot but only a crucified body. Yet that tree has proved to be the means of new and everlasting life, and beneath that tree in penitence we see Peter. As in Adam we see our weakness mirrored and the story of our fall, so in Simon Peter we recognize our weakness again, but we also see our means of recovery, the faith by which our weakness can be overcome.

Satan desired to sift Simon as he had once sifted Adam, expecting that only the weakness would be displayed. But on this occasion another one had a say—Jesus Christ made Simon a test case, "I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not." Simon Peter did fall as Satan desired and expected, but his faith did not fail, and in the end the weakness was mastered by the faith. Thus Peter became the foundation member of the Kingdom of Heaven, saved in spite of his faults, saved as we are clearly shown in one scene after another, not by any rock-like quality in himself, for there was never a more inconstant character, but wholly and solely by his faith, and that in order to strengthen his brethren.

The Foundation Member.

How worthy then of study is Simon Peter as the typical convert and how full of encouragement for us. We see one who was not capable of being a statesman, a scholar or even a saint, one who was completely unremarkable. He had no quality or gift that puts him out of reach of any of us. He only came to be Apostle Peter through his hold on Jesus Christ. In a word, whereas Paul shows what Christ can do with a man strength of a man, Peter shows what Christ can do with a man in his weakness. It remains for us to consider what had to be exposed and taken away in Simon by the sifting of his nature—the sifting that Satan desired and that Jesus allowed.

The essential evil was Fear, disguised by a false courage—fear of consequences; and it was shown on at least three occasions:—

(1) He was afraid of Christ's ideal. In the 5th Chapter of Luke we are told that when he realized the uncommon and intimate power of this Man who had come into his life, he cried "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man O Lord." He guessed that the Master's demands would be correspondingly high and he was afraid. We know something of that fear: it is the first hindrance to faith. Most people admire Christ enough to wish to give him something, some tribute of praise, some share of his efforts, a qualified obedience on certain lines in certain things. But what if Christ were to ask too much! That man wants to make money without too much criticism, another wants to have his fill of pleasure without too much censorship. And many admirers, when they find half measures will not do, decide to walk with Him no more. This fear was exposed to Simon Peter, but he had something else as well, a loyalty sufficient to accept Christ even in the matter of his aims and ambitions. "And he left all and followed Him."

Fear of Consequences.

(2) But again his fear possessed him in the matter of consequences. What was he going to get for in return for his discipleship? One day he heard his Master belittling wealth, and he put in an anxious plea, "Lord we have left all and followed thee" (C. 18). For many generations the Churches were easily filled because Christianity was presented and understood as a means of getting something in the way of security and Salvation. The Churches are not filled so easily to-day now that it is not so dogmatically certain what is to be escaped and what is to be gained. The Christian faith is by no means so popular now that it is interpreted more as a matter of giving than of getting, but perhaps the change of view is not altogether spiritual loss.

To begin with and for the moment Christ promised Simon in answer some thing, take the reward of Job—all losses made good with more than he began with. But later on Peter was able to weigh things for himself, learned to say to his soul what Ugo Bassi said to the martyrs of Italian freedom. "Measure thy life by loss instead of gain, Not by the wine drunk but the wine poured forth: For love's strength standeth in Love's sacrifice, And whose suffers most hath most to give" When he found a beggar at the gate of the temple he could say with the confidence of a man who was well off and knew it. "Silver and gold have I none, but such as I have I give thee." The old fear of impoverishment had been cast out by love.

The Empty Sieve.

(3) Once more Peter's fear was exposed beneath all his customary show of courage, when he was challenged in the courtyard of the high priest at the dawn of his bitterest day. That disowning of his Master, thinly covered with bravado seemed irremediable. But Jesus knew the heart of the man with all his faults, and instead of turning his back upon him, he "turned and looked on Peter." And why, but to call out that loyalty that was Peter's only strength? That look of Christ put his own prayer into operation. "I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not." Even in that bitter moment when fear seemed to have won faith remained in possession of the field, for Peter "went out and wept bitterly."

It is easy to condemn Peter, but have not we often failed to be frankly Christian in unpropitious circumstances? Those who hung about the courtyard and brought Peter to his shame, are with us too in various disguises. It may be a mocking lady in the drawing room with little on her shoulders and nothing much behind her supercilious face, or it may be a big man whose size is magnified in the smoke of a club room. How many have proved their apostolical succession from Simon Peter by flinching in circumstances like his. "We have more to fear from our fears" said John Pulsford "than from all storms and midnights."

There is but one sign that faith is as vivid as fear, that we have grace to weep over our cowardice It is indeed a work of truth and ground of hope to read our case in Simon Peter's.

The Only Strength of Peter.

Drawing our study to a close it is clear from the story of Simon's sifting, that courage is a vain thing compared with fear which is far more fundamental. For every step that Simon's courage urged him forward his fear drew him two steps in retreat. He ventured on the sea but he sank through his fear. He boasted of his loyalty in the evening, but was afraid to stand by his pledge in the grey of the morning. He was bold for the crown but far more afraid of the cross. And so are we all.

But Satan did not prevail for all that sifting. When Simon's native courage slipped through the meshes his personal loyalty was still left. He did hold on to the faith that Jesus was work following for better for worse, through sorrow and through sinning, convinced that life without Him, life in despite of Him, was not worth living, sure also that he had the prayers of One whose forgiveness and help were unfailing. That was the only strength of Peter. After the story of Christ it is the second important thing in the Gospels,—this character of his typical follower. He was no superman of an ecclesiastic, but he was indeed the foundation member of the Christian Church—in that he is shown with all his weakness, exposed in one experience after another, strong only in this one thing—his hold of Christ, and Christ's hold on him. By such loyalty or faith we too may be saved and by that alone. "Jesus, Lover of my Soul let me to thy bosom fly."

READING THE ROYAL ROAD TO REPUBLICAN UNDERSTANDING

The New Movement for the Spread of the Thousand Characters System and How It Is Rescuing China from Illiteracy

BY CHU CHI-FUI (MRS. HSIUNG HSI-LING).

The sole object of this movement is to teach the maximum number of illiterate people to be able to read by the expenditure of the minimum amount of money within the shortest period of time. We strongly believe that the ability to read on the part of the common people is essential to the success of the republican institution of government. Those who can read are in a better position to realize their responsibilities toward their own country, and at the same time to get much useful knowledge concerning their own professions. Many people never think of providing their children with education simply because they do not consider illiteracy as a disadvantage, but the movement for the elimination of illiteracy which is growing daily popular is sure to succeed, as it is but one phase of the movement for universal education.

Owing to the absence of an accurate census we can only take the approximate figure of 400 millions as the population of China. The problem of educating such a large number of people is indeed a difficult one. According to the report of the National Association for the Advancement of Education only 80 millions above the age of 12 are literate. Children under the age of 12 who are entitled to free public education number 120 millions. Leaving these 200 millions of people aside, there are still 200 more million people whom we are trying to teach to read. Our duty towards the country would not be complete if we should fail to give all of these 200 million persons the rudiments of education.

MRS. HSIUNG HSI-LING

History of the Movement.

As early as 20 years ago consideration had already been given to the matter of education for common people. The object of the "Simple Character" movement in the Ching Dynasty was to solve this very question. Unfortunately the movement was not a success The "Phonetic Script" was next employed as a means for promoting popular education, but the work is still in its experimental stage. Since the May-Fourth movement in 1919 the students, prompted by their sense of patriotism, have been devoting themselves to the promotion of social welfare and the education of the masses. They have on their own initiative founded schools for educating common people here and there throughout the whole country. Although these free schools are not without defects, their coming into existence has aroused our interest in the provision of educational facilities accessible to all. This interest found expression in the unique pioneer work done by Mr. James Yen, formerly, of the Y.M.C.A. Mr. Yen compiled a text book containing one thousand Chinese characters; he made successful experiments with the giving of free education to the common people in Changsha, Chefoo and Chiahsing by the use of the book, and attained wonderful results with very little time and money spent.

Mention should be made here of the two attempts made prior to this work, namely, Mr. Bi's "From the Simple to the Advanced" and Mr. C. A. Tang's text book containing 600 simple and common characters. Both of these two works attracted the attention of a section of the people, but the experiments did not attain a nation-wide scope. During the past few years the thought that mass education is essential to the Republic has always occupied my mind, and I have been trying to find means to put it into action. Last year, I had the opportunity to meet Messrs. Tao Chih-Hsing and James Yen, and we at once started the organization of what is now called the National Association for the Education of the Common People. Messrs. Tao and Chu King were entrusted with the work of compiling such text books as would suit the existing conditions of this country and meet the primary requirements of the mass; and Mr. S. T. Wang was asked to conduct an experiment on mass education at Nanking. In August 1923 the National Association for the Advancement of Education held its annual conference at the Tsing Hua College. Taking advantage of this opportunity we invited the representatives of the various educational bureaux and associations of the provinces, who were then attending the conference, to a meeting at which we discussed fully the policies and plans that should be adopted for the popular education movement. The Head Office of the National Association for the Education of the Common People was then established. In the following nine months the National Association has successfully extended its activities over 20 provinces. There are at the present more than half a million people who are reading the Thousand Character Text-book compiled by the Association. It is evident that the whole nation has shown much enthusiasm toward, and is taking keen interest in, the movement.

Administrative System.

The Head Office of the National Association for the Education of the Common People is located in Peking. The Administrative power is vested with a Board of Directors of which there are two kinds: the Provincial Directors.—two from each province, and the Executive Directors—nine in number—who are elected from among the resident directors in Peking. Under the direction of the Board of Directors, the General Secretary undertakes the work in connexion with the promotion and extension of the movement. Branch offices in different provinces, important cities and towns, have been organized. For different streets of a town and different villages of a district, there have also been organized Mass Education Committees which are responsible for providing education to the common people residing in these streets and villages. There are at present 20 provinces where Provincial Branch Offices have been established. The number of sub-branch offices that have been founded is not yet ascertained. The Street Committee system is now being tested at the Yang Shih Ta Chieh (street) in Peking and the Fu Tung Ta Chieh (street) in Nanking. Experiments on village works are being carried out at several villages like Lung Fou and Hsi Tsun in Shou-ning Hsien, Anhui Province.

Organization.

Taking into consideration the existing social conditions and the traditional usages of the public, we have adopted three different forms of organization:

1. PEOPLE'S SCHOOL: The ordinary class system is here adopted. Each larger class admits from 100 to 200 pupils and uses slide lanterns as a means for teaching, while each smaller class is formed of from 60 to 40 pupils and uses hanging charts.

2. PEOPLE'S READING CIRCLES: There are a large number of persons in the society who cannot attend regular class room work on account of their professional duties or other reasons. For this class of people, an alternative has been found in the opening of the People's Reading Circles. Either a family, or a shop, or an organization is taken as a unit and its literate members undertake to teach the illiterate. In case the representative member of the unit should take personal interest in the work and the literate members be permitted to take a course of training once every week, the work of the Circle would be rendered simple and easy. The students of the First Normal College of Shantung are at present doing the Reading Circle work, and over one thousand common people are being given the fundamental education.

3. PEOPLE'S QUESTION STATION: The idea of establishing such stations was initiated by Mr. S. T. Wang, Director in charge of General Affairs of the National Association for the Education of those who cannot attend the people's school and are not fortunate enough to have any literate member in their family to teach them. For this class of people, neither the People School nor the People Reading Circle offer any solution to their educational problem. A majority of this class are persons of wandering callings, such as petty peddlars and rickshaw coolies. Question stations are to be established in shops, families or organizations, members of which are willing to take the trouble of answering questions from the common people on the meaning or the pronunciation of the characters contained in the 1,000 character text book. When such a station should happen to exist nearby a vendor, for instance, could make use of it to acquire for himself the fundamental knowledge contained in the book. A rickshaw coolie while resting himself in the vicinity of a station could also very well avail himself of the opportunity to learn a few characters at a time. This system is now being tried in Nanking.

Materials and Implements.

The text book—Thousand Character Text—is considered to be the most important means for the promotion of popular education. The one thousand characters contained therein were selected from among the characters in Mr. H. C. Chen's "Chinese Words List". The objective of compiling this text is to arouse the spirit of independence; of mutual help; of self-control; and of advancement. The whole text consists of 96 lessons and takes 96 days with one hour every day to finish it. These lessons are so written that they are very interesting and inductive to further reading. With the same object in view, they are being improved from time to time in order to make the whole text most serviceable.

The two important auxiliary implements are:

1. Slide Lantern, which has been used by the Y.M.C.A., which has been trying to better its quality and cut down the cost of production.

2. Hanging charts, the cost of which is less than that of slide lanterns. These charts are used in small sized classes.

Examinations and Rewards.

To go through a course either in the People School or People Reading Circle, four months are generally required. Before graduation, the students have to pass an examination. Those who pass the examination will be given a certificate for Literate Citizenship and those who fail will have to go over the course again if they wish to graduate. The rewards depend upon the number of students who under their instructions have successfully passed the examinations. Those who have successfully taught 30 students will be awarded "The Certificate for Teachers of the Common People." Others who have rendered their services or financial support toward the movement will be accorded proper recognition either by the National Association or by the Government. As most of our workers are not working for rewards, we only give rewards to those valuable services which deserve proper recognition.

The Question of Cost.

The expenses for popular education have been reduced to a minimum. Our "Thousand Character Text Book," with the kind and generous assistance of the Commercial Press which sells it nearly at cost, can be had at 12 cents per set of four books. In the "People's Reading Circle" 20 cents are required for educating one student. In the People's School 50 cents are required for the education of one student if lantern slides are not used and one dollar is required per student when the lantern slides are employed.

It is hoped that expenses for educating the common people will be included in the provincial and district budgets and that the Government will also provide subsidies for the carryinng on of this movement. However, we cannot wait too long for the Government to take action. In order to make the education universal, we hope that the financial burden for such an education shall be universally distributed in due course of time. We are going to try the "Each a Dollar" contribution campaign for raising funds so that the financial responsibility for universal education would not be too heavy when distributed among the greatest number of people. By adopting this method of contribution we would make everyone to feel that he or she is a promoter of the movement. We strongly believe that contributions toward social welfare work are also a valuable means for educating the masses. We want the people to learn "To Give" and not "To Take" nor "To See Others Give." When the "Each a Dollar" campaign has become successful, we believe a small amounnt of additional subsidy would be sufficient to carry the work to a success.

Compulsory Measures Necessary.

In general there are three different classes of people in the society. Those who, out of their own accord, want to learn; those who are willing to learn after having been persuaded to do so; and those who are not willing to learn unless compelled to. From our past experience, we find that three or four out of ten persons need be compelled to learn while two or three more would be willing to learn when they are convinced. In order to make the popular education movement a successful one compulsory measures are absolutely necessary. There are two kinds of compulsory measures: namely, those adopted by the communities and those enforced by the Government. The National Association for the Advancement of Education made it a rule which reads: "Beginning from to-day the service of those who are not willing to learn to read will not be continued; and beginning from January 1, 1925, those who have not a certificate of literate citizenship will not be employed in this office." The Peking Union Medical College of Peking also made a rule for its employees that no promotion will be given to those employees who have not finished the "Thousand Characters Text Book" within a fixed period. These are examples of the first type of compulsory measures. Tao Yin Fang of Wuhu, Tutung Chang of Charhar and Commissioner for Education, Mr. Wang, of Hbnan have adopted the following measures:

1. The results of the popular education movement in the districts or villages shall furnish one of the means of determining the merits of the officials from the magistrate down.

2. Public notice be issued setting a date after which all the citizens shall be required when necessary to offer proof to the police that they have mastered the Thousand Character Textbook; a fine of one copper shall be levied upon those who have failed.

3. After a certain date those who cannot read shall be required to pay an ignorance tax of say ten cents per month, this tax to be partly borne by the "ignorant" and partly by the master of the shop, or head of the family.

4. Masters who in any way interfere with reasonable arrangements made for their employees to study shall be heavily fined.

Back to the Farm.

As China is essentially an agricultural country, 90 per cent. of our people live in the country. The popular education movement is mainly a rural movement and should be carried on with greater stress in the rural districts. By taking advantage of their summer and winter vacations during which they return to their own towns, the students can render the most valuable service to the movement. We want them to work for it by taking home with them the Thousand Character Text-book and to proceed as follows: First, to gather together all those who are literate and give them a short course of training so that upon their graduation they know how to teach the members of their family. Second, to select from among the illiterates the clever ones to form a class in which they will be taught four lessons per day. At the same time these students will be asked to teach one lesson each day to the illiterates of their family so that at the end of one month they will have finished all the four books themselves and one book with the members of his family. Third. to persuade the village tutors to use the "Thousand Character Text" as text book and to teach the villagers at their leisure.

The Hsiangshan Children's Home of the Western Hills, Peking has adopted a plan for educating the common people in the neighbourhood of Western Hills. The plan is to utilize the few primary schools as the centers of education, the neighbouring families being asked to send one student each to the schools and to learn the thousand character text. When the students have finished their course, they will be sent home to teach the other members of their family.

Female Illiteracy.

A large number of the illiterates in this country are women. The fact that most of the students in the people's school are grown-up and have not had previous training, has made it inconvenient to adopt the co-educational system and more difficult to solve the problem of removing among the female sex. Our solution for this problem includes the following: (1) The establishment of People's Schools for the female sex; (2) the establishment of more people's reading circles in the family; (3) During their summer and winter holidays the girl students are asked to teach country women and girls how to read; (4) To promote higher education for girls in order that more leaders may be trained for the promotion of popular education among the female sex.

Continuation of Education.

Although the four months' training in the Thousand Character Text may be of some practical value, yet the accomplishment of the students is negligible indeed. Therefore our work should not stop here. How to utilize the little knowledge which the common people have gained through the reading of the Thousand Character Text so that these characters may not soon be forgotten and may be of practical use is a problem of real importance. Therefore, while we are promoting the popular educational movement on the one hand, we have been on the other hand constantly planning how to do the follow-up work. The following has been suggested:—

1. We will cooperate with one of the most widely-circulated newspapers in this country to insert a section in it, to be called the Common People's Weekly Section. This section is to be circulated together with the paper as well as sold separately to the graduates of the People's School so that they may also enjoy the reading of newspapers, learn the news of the world and be taught the essetials of good citizenship through the papers. For this purpose we have asked Mr. Chu King to be the Editor-in-Chief of this section; he will cooperate with the Shun Pao of Shanghai, and beginning from June 28th, 1924 this section will appear in that paper. It is estimated that about sixty thousand copies will be ciirculated.

LITERATURE FOR THE COMMON PEOPLE:

2. In addition we have requested over forty specially trained persons to compile various literatures on different subjects for the use of the common people. And it is also expected that the National Asociation for Vocational Education will also undertake to compile booklets for the people on vocational subjects. In order to make the circulation of these literatures and the weekly as wide as possible it is our intention to sell them on trains and steamers, as well as in the villages. We have also consulted expert librarians regarding the establishment of the Common People's reading rooms in the centers of the various cities so that the common people may read books and newspapers in those rooms at their leisure.

FURTHER VOCATIONAL TRAINING:

3. There are some students who after four months' work wish to continue in vocational training so as to improve their modes of living. This is to be encouraged. We hope that the National Association of vocational Education would pay special attention to the solution of the problem.

PICKED PUPILS

4. Among the students who enroll in the People's Schools we have already discovered quite a few who are gifted for advanced education. In our opinion, these students should be given further opportunities to pursue higher education. We pay special attention to them and hope to be able to afford them regular school training.

Training Leaders and Teachers.

As the promotion of the education for the common people must necessarily be a movement on a large scale, and as the duties and the responsibilities of those who undertake the work are varied and heavy, we need to train capable men to divide our labour and to cooperate with us. In the first place, we must train capable leaders who can be entrusted by the National Association with the work for the extension of the popular educational system in the various provinces and who can render valuable assistance to the local organizations in training proper men for carrying on the work in their respective localities. In this respect, the National Association should be responsible for the proper training and guidance of the executives in the provincial organizations; the provincial organizations, for those in the district and city organizations; and the district and city organizations, in turn, should be responsible for those in the rural and street organizations.

In the second place we must train teachers. The training of teachers for the Common People's School is done through conferences in which the various aspects of the problem have been fully discussed. The training of assistants follows closely the methods used in the normal schools.

In the third place, as the educational inspectors appointed by the provincial authorities and by the districts are the most important persons through whom the work for the promotion of popular education could be effectively carried out, conferences with them would be called for the purpose of discussing the problems for the extension of popular education. These conferences will be called in the near future.

Authorities and People.

Although the Movement might have aroused the suspicion of a section of the people we are glad to say that it has received the hearty welcome and support of the people in general and the co-operation and assistance of the government authorities as well. The movement is a patriotic one and has neither political nor religious significance. Wherever it is extended to, it has always received the hearty cooperation of the people of different sections.

The enthusiatic support from the educational circles has come up to our expectation. A large number of teachers and students, prompted by their untiring spirit of helping others have been rendering invaluable assistance in teaching, in investigation work and in helping us to extend the movement. For them we have high respect and great admiration.

Prompted by their altrusim the Christians and many Y. M. C. A. workers have been helping in the extension of this nation-wide movement for which we feel very grateful.

There are quite a number of enthusiastic supporters of the movement among the merchants. Upon this class of people depends the success of the movement in the different cities. Among the keenest supporters. we may mention Mr. Chow, the President of the Hankow Chamber of Commerce, who has established several People's Schools which are producing good results. We understand that he is contemplating the establishment off 25 more new schools as further experiment. The Hankow merchants in this connection can be taken as the models for all. We have several factory owners who are personally interested in the movement, among whom we may mention Mr. Li Chih-yun of Wuchang. We hope that the factories throughout this country will all further the movement for the benefit of their employees.

Story-Tellers.

In Nanking there are over 50 story-tellers who are interested in the movement. While they are telling stories to their audiences which generally are composed of lower classes of people, they try to make their hearers realize the importance of literature by adding to their stories interesting talks pertaining to it. They also engage themselves in giving street lectures inside and around the city on the 3rd, 6th and 9th days of every 10 days of the Chinese moon. They sing their audiences such folk lore or popular songs as they have purposely composed with the object of arousing the people's interest to study. These story-tellers know the psychology of the common people better than anybody else and therefore they make the best teachers for these people.

Provincial Governors:

General Chi Hsi-yuan, Tuchun of Kiangsu, has donated a large fund which makes it possible for the experiment on people's education to begin its work at Nanking. He is the first to welcome the movement, and this generosity and farsightedness has been greatly appreciated and admired. Among other military leaders who have given support to the movement are General Hsiao Yao-nan, Tuchun of Hupei; General Tsai Cheng-hsum. Toli of Kiangsi; General Wu Ching-piao, Co-Director of Kiangsi; General Chang Hsi-yuan, Tutung of Charhar. Of late, both General Chi Hsi-yuan and General Chang Tso-lin have given instruction that all the soldiers under their command shall learn the Thousand Character Text. Among the civil governors of the provinces, Mr. Han Chih-shih of Kiangsu and Mr. Lu Tiao-yuan of Anhui, were the first to welcome the movement. The latter has made the body guards of his Yamen read the Thousand Character Text. One class was formed in the Yamen of the Civil Governor of Hupei. This class has graduated and another class is being formed. When Mr. Chang Tan-hou was Chief of the Educational Bureau of Anhui, he compelled all the servants of that bureau to read, this being the first measure of compulsory education. The servants stopped for a time, but they have resumed their study since Mr. Lu Shao-liu assumed the post. The Educational Bureaux of Kiangsi and Hupei are following the example of Anhui. Taoyin Fang of Wuhu and Taoyin Chang of Charhar are particularly interested in the movement. There are also many Hsien Yamens where the movement has been welcomed. The position of police authorities in big cities is just as important as that of merchants with respect to the activities of the work. The efforts made by Police Superintendent Wang Chin-chuan of Nanking and Police Superintendent Tsui of Wuchang in promoting common education should be admired. The Police officers of Nanking are personally teaching common people to read. Policemen are encouraging the people to take up reading. Under the auspices of the Police Administration of Wuchang, there are 20 People Reading Circles. The illiterate members among the policemen and servants are required to study and the cost of disobedience is dismissal. The police authorities of Kiukiang are also promoting the people's education, with much enthusiasm.

Prisons

The convicts in the prisons, besides doing manual work, as required by the regulations, have plenty of time to devote to other good things. There is a good opportunity to teach them to read, and to reform themselves through reading good books. The prisoners in Anking, Nanchang, Nanking, Wuchang, Hankow, etc., are being given lessons on the Thousand Character Text. The literate convicts volunteer to teach their illiterate comrades.

Unification of the Country

Although the country is not yet united, the North and the South are co-operating in the movement. Kuangtung, Yunnan, Hunan, Fengtien, Kirin, Heilungkiang, Szechuan and other provinces, are making good progress in the work. This shows every-body knows to do what is good. Politically there exists in China what is termed lock of unification. But from the educational point of view, China is everywhere united. We hope "educational, unification" will expedite "political unification."

BEATING THE BOUNDS

By oak and ash and old elm-tree,
With laugh and song and merriment,
To beat the bounds of Charlbury
The children went, the children went.

By many a hawthorn-broidered lane,
With merriment, with laugh and song,
Into the woods and out again,
They danced along, they danced along,

With bluebells and with columbine,
With waterlilies from the pool,
With orchises and eglantine,
Their hands were full, their hands were full.

Through buttercups and meadowsweet,
They made a road, they made a road,
Until their pollen-powdered feet
Came dancing to the Evenlode.

Ah, do you know that silent stream,
The Evenlode, it runs so deep;
The Evenlode, its waters dream,
It seems asleep, it seems asleep.

Of jack and bream the still abode,
Haunt of the glittering dragon-fly,
The willow-bordered Evenlode,
Where kingfishers go flashing by.

The boat was ready on the brink,
They crowded in, they crowded in,
How could so light a cargo sink!
Tears end what laughter doth begin!

Their dance is stopped, their song is sped!
To flow as you have always flowed,
With these three little flounderers dead,
Oh, cruel, cruel Evenlode!

Three lilies thro' its waters trail,
And o'er that darking pool resounds
The moon-impassioned nightingale—
And three small spirits beat the bounds.

WHAT THE COMMUNISTS ARE DOING IN ENGLAND

Exploiting the "Minority Movement" in Industrial Disputes

From a Manchester Correspondent.

For the first time it may perhaps be said that the Communists are not entirely negligible in England. It would be easy to exaggerate the importance of their activities and there is even a disadvantage in recording them without bias or exaggeration, for every mention advertises their movement and there is nothing which they so much covet as publicity, nothing that they resent more than obscurity. The disadvantages, however, are more than counterbalanced by the necessity of exposing clearly the campaign on which they have embarked in the hope of gaining control of the Labour movement in England. This campaign has two sides, the one political and the other industrial, and the thing about it which really matters is that it is not haphazard or spasmodic in its intention but is the result of a definite strategy. It is the plan of the Communist General Staff in this country, so far as one exists.

The obstacle that the British Communists have to overcome is not merely the obviously bourgeois classes—the political Tories and Liberals—but the Labour party itself. British Labour is, by inclination and policy, anti-Communist. The Labour party has repeatedly rejected the request of the Communist wing for affiliation. Its argument to the Communists has always been this "You seek affiliation in order to work against the Labour movement from within. Those are your orders from Moscow. You are like the boll-weevil you would live in and upon the bud until you have destroyed it. We shall not give you the opportunity." Therefore the Communists have to pursue a more insidious policy.

Labour's Three Sections

To the Communists, the British Labour Party is that accursed thing—"middle-class." They would say precisely the same of Labour in the United States.) There are three sections in the Labour Party—all middle-class."

(1) The trade-union element, which for the most part has done or is doing manual labour, and is moderate, law-abiding, conservative in outlook and method, and not at heart "Socialist" at all.

(2) The members of the Independent Labour Party, who are really Socialists. For the most part they are not and never have been manual workers, but are "black-coated" or "middle-class" in origin and habit of mind.

(3) The ex-Liberals who have joined the Labour Party—the so-called "intellectuals," some of them aristocrats and all of them as "middle-class" as they well could be.

Only among the rank and file of the first section can the Communists find the proletarians of their heart's desire. For the leaders of all three sections they express the utmost scorn and hatred. From a collection of speeches and manifestoes by the Communist spokesmen about the present leaders of our Labour movement it emerges that the Communist policy is to enter the Labour party, work against and subvert the present leadership ("treacherous middle-class leadership" it is called) and conduct the rank and file to revolution—if need be to violent revolution. On public platforms nowadays the Communists make no bones about this. "The Labour Party," says one spokesman, "will have to be fought one day." Says another "we understand the Labour pary and all its treacherous motives and possibilities. Our job is to get inside and upset their leadership." If necessary, violence is eventually to be used. One of the leading Communists said recently: "Like the Irishmen who entered the boxing match, we want to put a horseshoe in our boxing-glove just for luck" and the president of our Communist party said openly, "If the working classes were determined to get into the saddle themselves, they must be prepared even for the use of violence."

The Policy Defined.

The plan of the Communists in the field of politics was defined only a few weeks ago at their annual congress:—

"The Communist party considers it its duty to enter into the ranks of the Labour party in order to strengthen the militant and fighting elements of the Labour movement, and to unmask the treacherous elements in the Labour party and free the workers from their influence. The Communist party does not aim at the united front with MacDonald, Snowden, and Thomas, but at the organization of the mass front of the workers. It enters Parliament not in order to delude the workers that they can achieve emancipation by its means, but to use Parliament as a tribune whence to issue rallying calls and watchwords to the masses. The Congress therefore reaffirms the decision of the Communist party to apply for affiliation to the labour party."

Failing to obtain affiliation, the Communists are aiming systematically at putting forward candidates for Parliament and securing for them the sanction of the Labour party. It is parodoxical that the Labour party, which will not accept the Communists as an affiliated body, should accept as Labour candidates individual Communists who make no attempt to conceal their contempt and hatred for the Labour party and its leaders. But so it is; the ordinary rule is that any candidate, Communist or not, who accepts and signs the Labour "Constitution" is accepted as a Labour candidate—and, if he is elected to Parliament, he enters the Labour party and works for its destruction! This ridiculous rule is now likely to be modified, for in a by-election which has just been held at Glasgow the Communist candidate owing to the violence of the propaganda on his behalf found that the Labour party approval which he had at first received was eventually withdrawn. It is indeed an extraordinary anomaly—that Communists whose view is that the Trade Union and Independent Labour leaders, including Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and all his Ministry, are "traitors" to the interest of the people, should receive their blessing in order the more easily to carry on their work of mining and sapping the constitutional cause. Such a practice is only conceivable so long as the Communists are a negligible force. If they now begin to grow more powerful in the industrial field, as they show signs of doing, the Labour party will be compelled to fight them in the political arena.

The Minority Movement.

The activity of the English Communists in industrial disputes is the new thing to watch.

They are in favour of local strikes, lightning strikes, any sort of strike or sudden movement that will embarrass the employers or hold up the public in order to obtain what they want, and often, in pursuing these tactics they defy the authority of their own unions and their own officials. This is in general what is called the "minority movement" in the unions, and the new strategy of the Communists may in a word, be said to be the encouragement of the "minority movement" wherever there is discontents afoot in the hope of undermining the trade union authorities and through them of injuring the Parliamentary Labour party and the whole system of orderly, constitutional action. The triumph of Communistic theory would then naturally follow. The programme thus consists of Action first and Theory afterwards. The Communists have themselves set out their strategy quite frankly, as this extract from a recent manifesto shows:—

"Any organization which wishes to rally the working masses around a working-class leadership and programme must begin first and foremost by development their class-consciousness, always taking account of different and varying stages of development.

"This process will involve approaching the trade union rank and file with practical solutions for their own special problems, before they can begin to comprehend the need for attempting the solution of problems lying outside their immediate points of view. If they become convinced in the field of action that such an organization understands their needs, they then will be ready to listen to its theories.

"It may be that this process will necessitate. for the time being. that the organization in question does not insist on pressing its full programme in this sphere of activity. But this is a price worth paying in return for gaining the ear of the masses."

Their Methods in Practice.

We are now obtaining actual evidence that the Communists are putting this insidious policy into operation. When the great trade unions of their own free will make a national settlement with the employers, the Communist organ denounces it as "humiliating" in order to stimulate the discontent of the extremists. When as at Southampton the other day, a minority of the shipyard workers revolt against their own unions and bring about a lockout on a national scale, the Communist leaders hurried down to Southampton to encourage them in their revolt. They denounced the unions as "blatant and cynical" in their betrayal of the workers. One of their organs published a manifesto of the Red International of Labour Unions which abused the English Trade Union officials for "cowardice, vacillation and low intrigue" and went on, "The R.I.L.U. Bureau urges the workers in Southampton to stand firm." Their weekly journal summed the matter up by saying that the Southampton rebels, "know that the Communists have done all that they can to help them." It is undeniable, of course, that the Labour conditions do give the Communists a great opportunity. When the scale of wages is such that a skilled shipyard mechanic only gets £2.7.6 per week, while a dustman gets £2.7.3, a tram-conductor £2.15.0, a docker (unskilled) £3.0.6, and a policeman £3.10.0, it is no wonder that the engineers become impatient and exasperated. That is the Communist's chance. He is out to make the workers despise and reject the trade union leaders who have done so little for them.

The latest strike of "shipmen," in the London tubes and on the Great Western Railway is another instance of Communist activity. The National Union of Railwaymen say flatly that Communist influence has been at the back of this strike, and certainly the Communists would not repudiate the charge. It is an entirely irregular strike, a blow at Trade Union authority by a rebellious minority, and an attempt to hold the public to ransom.

The working men and women in England will not listen in any numbers to Communist theory. They do not understand it, they distrust and fear it, and they have heard of the great Russian example. Therefore the Communist plan is Action First to disgust them with Trade Union caution, to break down the Trade Union organizations, to destroy the Trade Union leaders and the "middle-class" politicians of the Parliamentary Labour Party and then, but only then, to summon the workers to the class-revolution and the proletarian war. The common-sense and shrewdness of British Labout will reject these tactics. Their only chance of even a partial success lies in the low wages that unfortunately so many British workers now receive.

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

His Origin and His Powers

By George E. Sokolsky.

Woodrow Wilson, writing on the government of the United States said:—

"The political institutions of the United States are in the main the political institutions of England, transplanted by English colonists to a new soil and worked out through a fresh development to new and characteristic forms."

The President of the United States is one of these new and characteristic forms worked out in the American colonies previous to the American revolution. There were 13 colonies in which lived about 3,000,000 people. Each colony came to be a more or less self-governing commonwealth, with a legislature of its own, passing laws based upon the general legal ideas of English common law. There was no political connexion among these colonies, save in the British crown. As far back as 1696, however, William Penn proposed that all the colonies be united with a chief executive head, to be known as the President.

The colonies all had written constitutions from the very beginning, in that their charters from the Crown were in effect constitutions. They were used to government within the meaning of the words of this legal instrument. These charters were based largely upon the theories of government developed under the British Constitution as up to the time of George III. The British Constitution, not being a written document and changing rather by evolution than by radical legislative action, is very different to-day from what it was in the time of the Mad German. At that time the Crown and its ministers regarded the Executive as being to a large extent independent of the legislative. Ministers did not feel altogether obliged to follow the will of the House of Commons. We need only read of the activities of Pitt, elder and younger, and of Fox, quite to understand the struggle between the legislative branch and the executive under the English Constitution.

In the United States this idea of the independence of the three branches of the government came to mean very much more than in England. It was the premise of the strongest battles in the Constitutional Convention and Alexander Hamilton devotes several articles of the Federalist to a discussion of the necessity for checks and balances. To Hamilton, the President was comparable in many ways to the Governor of a State, as the colonies came to be called. The people quite understood the duties of the Governor. He was the executive officer, but he was also a check on the radicalism of the mob. He had veto power over legislature. He protected minorities in the State.

An Autocrat in Strings.

There was naturally a fear of monarchy during the formative period of American history. But the Americans of those days were weary of irresponsibility which almost lost them their war. They wanted fixed responsibility though limited constitutionally. They gave the President very wide powers, but always effected a control of those powers. For instance, the President may veto any act of Congress, but that veto can be over-ruled by a two-thirds vote. The President may appoint officials, but with the advice and consent of the Senate. The President may make treaties, but also with the advice and consent the Senate. The President may not declare war for that is a duty of Congress, but once war is declared he becomes Commander-in-Chief of the army and navy with exceptionally wide powers amounting almost to a military dictatorship.

The President of the United States is elected for a term of four years. He must be 35 years of age, a native-born citizen and resident within the United States for 14 years immediately prior to election. He is eligible for re-election for as many terms as the American people should care to have him. Washington, however, declined to be President more than two terms and no one has ever succeeded in breaking this precedent.

The President may be impeached should his services be unsatisfactory. The writers of the constitution had the example of Warren Hastings before them and made impeachment a process of further protecting the people against an oppressive President. In case of impeachment, the House of Representative impeaches, the Senate acts as a court with the Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court as the Presiding Judge. A two-thirds vote is required to make an impeachment effective. Only one president, Andrew Johnson, was impeached and he was acquitted.

Omnipotent in War.

In time of war, the powers of the President are extraordinarily broad. In his capacity as chief of the army and the navy he can order all measures taken in the national defence. He may subjugate an enemy's country, but he cannot add to the boundaries of the United States without the usual legislative consent. A war President stands out in American history as a greater figure because under such circumstances he had more power; he is less circumscribed by senatorial prerogatives. Nevertheless, all appropriation bills must rise in the House of Representatives and be passed by both Houses of Congress, and since the effective carrying out of any programme is dependent upon the fiscal measures voted by the legislative branch of the government, he is even in this respect controlled. The courts have, however, held that power actually given to the President by the constitution of the United States cannot be controlled or restricted by Congress save as provided by the Constitution.

The Vice-President is a substitute for the President. During the life and activity of the President, the Vice-President has no executive powers. He is President of the Senate and therefore a member of the legislative branch of the government. He is usually an unimportant personality or one, like Roosevelt (Vice-President to McKinley), who is important and politically dangerous, and is therefore given a position of great distinction where political careers are buried.

President's Choice of Cabinet.

The Cabinet is in reality little more than a Board of Secretaries. The Cabinet is responsible to no one but the President. He appoints them with the advice and consent of the Senate, but very seldom has the Senate interfered with such appointments. The Cabinet is not responsible to the legislative arm of the government nor directly to the people. The members are not elected. They may not even be well-known nationally when appointed. The President is responsible for the Cabinet members. The President has no representative in Congress. He sends an annual message or occasionally messages dealing with specific topics. Washington and Wilson appeared in Congress and read their messages. Other presidents have sent them to be printed and read. The political partisans of the President however do his work for him in the Congress.

The President, in addition to being the chief executive officer of the country, also has certain legislative functions. An act of Congress to become a law must have his approval. If he disapproves of a law he vetoes it within ten days, stating his objections. Congress may pass the bill over his head as already indicated.

The President of the United States is in reality the only national officer elected by the people. The Senators represent their respective states. Their states are their first interest. The members of the House of Representatives represent their particular districts and together with the Senators from their states work for particularism. This has been the cause of much of the constitutional difficulties of the United States, sectionalism being the principal cause of the Civil War. The President, in theory and in practice, represents the entire people, the whole nation. He is usually more popular than any individual leader because he does represent the entire people. A strong President, like Roosevelt, when differing with a legislator went into his State and appealed to the people for support.

The Heel of Achilles.

The greatest weakness of the President is that he is the leader of his own political party. This lessens his influence to some extent. For instance, because Wilson was a Democrat a coalition cabinet was impossible during the war. The Republican Party had experienced diplomats in its ranks, such men as Elihu Root or Ex-President Taft; yet Mr. Wilson did not feel free to call on them because it might strengthen an opposing party. However, again strong Presidents have had members of opposing parties in their cabinets and have utilized them in many ways.

The President combines the social and political position of the British crown, the political functions of the Premier and assumes the responsibility of the entire British cabinet. He is thus in many ways the most powerful ruler in the world. Yet that rule is circumscribed by the shortness of tenure of office, the prerogatives of Congress and the force of public opinion as expressed at the ballot box every four years.

FLIRTATION'S END

You're the cherry in my cocktail
And the ice-cream in my dish—
As the coffee to the dinner,
As the dressing to the fish,
As the glow-worm to the evening
And the foam upon the wave:
Like a trimplet in the shadow
Or the talcum on a shave

Close the fan! The pictures vanish
But its breeze is somewhere still—
When the temple bells are silent
Echoes linger on the hill. . . .
Like the Indian Kiss its flavour.
Like the cigarette its puff,
Minutes oft can live for ever
If intangible enough!

Cyclops.

A "trimplet," of course, is the hole made in a shadow by a sunbeam; and "Indian Kiss" is the popular and partially-adequate term for a Crême de Cacao. Both of which appellations will be readily recognized by the duly initiated.

COUNTRY OF THE NORSEMEN TO-DAY

A Review of the Industries and Fascinations of Norway: Energy and Prosperity

One remembers reading not so very long ago an article on the changed character of guide-books and nothing could be better illustrative of this than "The Norway Year Book." It is not a guide-book and not a history book, nor yet a trade directory, but it is a combination of all three and is written in such a style that, skipping the statistical tables which are a necessity for many people but a bore to most, the book can be read through and provide more enjoyment than many a modern novel. It offers very interesting reading for anybody who wishes to know something about Norway, its geography, history, administration, finance, etc. It also deals with education, literature, arts, sports, museums, sciences, agriculture, forestry, fisheries, mining, shipping, labour, banks, industries, communications, trade, whaling and other subjects.

"The Norway Year Book" tells one about Norway as a country for tourists, with railways traversing the high mountains and passing through the loveliest scenery, about the facilities for yachting, ski-ing, shooting, fishing and other sports.

Ski-ing, of course, is a national sport, invented in Norway, where everybody, including the Royal Family, enjoy it. The Crown Prince, only 21 years of age, is a very keen skier and has taken part in numerous jumping competitions and won many prizes. The country is wonderfully well adapted for the sport and the most prominent ski-runners in the world are found in Norway. The world records for skating also have been held by Norwegians for many years.

Of the summer sports it is particularly yachting which is popular, and the conditions for yachting in the summer months, when there are almost no nights, are almost ideal. The Royal Norwegian Yacht Club has about 4,000 members, with about 1,000 boats. Norwegian Yachtsmen have distinguished themselves in many international competitions. In 1920, for instance, during the Olympic races at Antwerp, the Norwegian boats obtained 28 points, winning in practically all the classes in which they competed. The Royal Norwegian Yacht Club holds the Coupe de France, the Gold Cup, the Oresund Cup and the Kattegat Cup.

As for angling, no country in Europe offers nearly such good natural conditions as Norway. In most of the rivers the salmon only is able to force its way up comparatively short distances, but these reaches, owing to the formation of the country, are full of pools and rapids. There are excellent opportunities for hiring fishing rights and a number of hotels own fishing rights which are placed at the disposal of guests. There is an abundance of trout—sea trout as well as freshwater trout. For those, who prefer shooting, there are bear, elk, red deer and reindeer. The country, consisting mainly of high and low mountain ranges and big forests, tests the sportsman's skill with the gun and even more, perhaps, his physical endurance, sense of locality and knowledge of the habits of game.

Norway During the War.

From the commencement of the war to its conclusion the object of the Government was to preserve a policy of strict neutrality, but one could not fail to notice that the great majority of the people sympathised with the Allies. The mercantile marine of Norway suffered a relatively greater loss of vessels than that of any other country, 829 ships being lost, with a total capacity of 1.2 million tons, and 1,162 lives were lost through vessels being torpedoed or mined. In addition, 65 vessels, with crews numbering 975 men, disappeared in the war zone from unknown causes.

At the same time, the level of prices rose higher in Norway than in any other country, due, inter alia, to the large amount of commodities which had to be imported from overseas countries. Norway itself cannot grow more than half of the grain, etc., consumed in the country. One often hears that Norwegian shipping, trade and industries derived high profits from the war, but the truth is that the country did not get any lasting economic advantages from it. What money was earned went to pay for necessities and to rebuild at fantastic prices in other countries the mercantile marine.

Forestry.

The Government has done a great deal to preserve the forests and has enjoyed the co-operation of various private societies. By law it is prohibited to fell trees of less than certain dimensions and the planting of trees is greatly encouraged. About 35 per cent. of the value of the total exports of the country consists of wood and wood-products, including paper.

Fisheries.

The products of fishing, whaling, etc., constitute 32 per cent. of the exports and the fishing fleet has become very effective since the introduction of motor-fishing boats. The catch is exported as dried fish (mostly cod), salt herring and tinned fish. Salt herring exports have had a tendency lately of being replaced by the export of fresh iced herring. Other fish products are the well known cod liver oil and salted roe. Herring oil and fish meal have also become well known articles of export.

Whaling.

Whaling is an old Norwegian trade previously carried on in northern waters. From 1904, however, operations were extended to the South Seas and the value of the trade grew rapidly. Other countries followed, but Norway's share of the world's whaling is still bigger than all other countries' taken together. The market value of the products of the Norwegian whaling may be estimated at about 40 to 50 million kroner a year.

Shipping.

In proportion to its population, Norway is first among all seafaring nations, and about 17 per cent. of the entire male population take to the sea for their livelihood. About half of the tonnage was lost during the war, but now has been replaced, and for each 1,000 inhabitants of the country there are nearly 1,000 tons Norwegian owned. Most of the Norwegian tonnage was before engaged in the ordinary tramp trade, but during later years the owners have paid greater attention to regular liner-trade.

Norwegian export articles others than those mentioned above include iron ore, aluminium and other metals, carbide of calcium, cement, tinned goods, nitrate of lime, etc. The value of the export of canned goods (mainly sardines) amounts to about 50 million kroner a year. Nitrate of lime (Norway salpetre) and by-products are manufactured in huge works utilizing the Norwegian invention for producing nitrates from atmospheric nitrogen through an electric process. Norway possesses no coal (except at Spitzbergen) but has an abundance of waterfalls from which electric power is generated. This power can be supplied at a very cheap rate and in such large quantities that it is very suitable for power for factories manufacturing on a large scale. Moreover, the supply is generally available in places where there are conveniently situated sites for factories, near good ice-free harbours. According to calculations the available Norwegian water-power should be able to yield 12 million horse-power (at low water). So far, only about 1.2 million is being used.

The First Prohibitionists.

It is impossible to review every subject dealt with in this very interesting book, but it will come as a surprise to many people to learn that Norway was the first prohibitionist country. As long ago as 1827 it was advocated and in 1842 a Parliamentary majority agreed to it, but the decision did not receive the Royal sanction. On the outbreak of the World War total prohibition was enforced, apparently, if an outsider may judge, as much with a view to conserving food supplies as anything. After a few months the order was relaxed, but again it was fully enforced in 1916. In 1919 on a plebiscite there was a majority of roughly 180,000, on a total vote of 800,000, in favour of prohibition, but considerable difficulties arose on account of treaty obligations with wine-producing countries and now there is a law in force that probably only a native of the country can understand. Obviously, however, amongst those who advocate prohibition, Norway is deserving of full credit for being the first in the field.

Other sections of the book deal with literature (Henrik Ibsen was the greatest dramatist of his time): music (Edward Grieg is world famous): painting and sculpture exploration.

IMPRESSIONS OF CHINA

Saving the Costs

By George E. Sokolsky.

In Shansi there is an Association for the Prevention of Law Suits which meets in the shadow of the sacred Wu Tai Shan. Here those who have disagreed meet to talk things over in the presence of the local gentry who charge nothing for listening to tales of woe and who keep out of the trials and tribulations, expensive lawyers and the delay of courts. Shansi seems to be full of novelties and brilliant ideas, of efficient officials and progressive people. But why is there only one Shansi in this great country? Why should there be only one "model province," where everywhere men might labour to make their country a land worthy of her sages?

Tittle-Tattle.

To speak truthfully and frankly, to criticize when a wrong is seen, to call attention to error and to hope for future greatness, is neither indicative of hatred nor snobbishness. Some Chinese, particularly those younger men, foreign educated and labouring for the favour of those who grease the pots, take umbrage at every word of criticism of their country when spoken by a foreigner. They grow irritable when one speaks of Peking or Tuchuns or such as rob the state and ruin the country. They walk the back alleys, make difficulties for foreigners who constantly strive to help China, while these young men, capable and energetic, squeeze gently that they may some day squeeze well. They denounce even those who in moments of stress have sacrificed themselves for China, when they might have thought, as these young men think, only of themselves. Yet in the end the Chinese people will know good from bad. They will know what to do with their own young men who have betrayed them in the sad days of this decade. They will know how to honour the foreigners who have laboured for reconstruction.

Tsai Ao.

They are beginning to honour Tsai Ao. They are beginning to appreciate his merit. On Christmas Day, 1915, this young man in distant Yunnan raised the standard of revolt against Yuan Shih-kai because he would not see his country under a military dictatorship. Per- conversation. Then he spoke. "The foreigners are no better than we are. They are just as corrupt. Only they distrust each other more. We take a man at his word and, if he fails, we attribute his failure to the general condition of human nature. The foreigners have all kinds of contrivances, mechanical and human, to prevent a man from failing. They watch him closely. They have auditors and accountants. They use cash registers. And then when it is all over, they have large gaols and busy courts. But human nature is the same with them as with us."

An elderly Chinese listened to much talk on the ills of China. He listened attentively, engrossed in the haps Tsai Ao failed in his ideal, that is, to avoid the monarchy and to see his country a true democracy. Those things come neither in a day nor with one revolution. But his province has never acknowledged the authority of those in Peking, nor has it played much with Canton. Yunnan has developed on its own lines, under very difficult circumstances, for the province is poor and hard to cultivate. Yet, the mines are rich and some day will be worked. Tsai Ao will not be forgotten in the history of China.

BOOK NOTES AND NEWS

English authors who have made the experiment of "broadcasting" report that, as an immediate result, there has been an increased demand for their books. The curious thing, however, is that this demand only lasts a few days, and the moral, perhaps, which one must draw is either that broadcasters are hard to please with books or that they are not very ardent readers. One or two authors, however, have had fuller results from broadcasting and especially, the writer of a recent book about the "Zoo" found, to his pleasure, the broadcasting some of its contents drove it into several editions.

Last month the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals celebrated its centenary; and Captain Fairholme's record of the work, entitled "A Century of Work for Animals" was published by Mr. Murray on the 16th. The efforts of this greatly beneficent institution can hardly fail to appeal to a large public, for nowadays the lovers of animals are legion. A Foreword from the President, H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, enhances the value of the book and Thomas Hardy contributes an Ode to "Compassion."

Next to his version of "Omar" the memory of Fitz Gerald is hardly less securely lodged in his letters to his friends. It is difficult to write a private letter which can be read with pleasure a hundred years after its composition, but though Fitz Gerald's letters have not yet attained their century, it is no rash prophecy to say that they have placed their author in the same company with Gray and Cowper, says Augustine Birrell in the "Empire Review."

Mr. Rudyard Kipling is rather hard to approach for literary favours, but when boys or soldiers ask him he is amiability itself. He recently heard that a company of the American Legion had adopted as its motto his lines: "Simple service, simply given, to his own kind in the common need." He wrote out the whole verse and sent it back with his signature, and now that company of the American Legion are proudly showing it at their headquarters, thus:—

> "Not as a leader, from earth to heaven,
> Not as a witness to any creed,
> But simple service, simply given,
> To his own kind in the common need."

"New Friends in Old Chester" is the title of a book by Margaret Deland which Mr. Murray will publish shortly. Here are to be met new and unforgettable personalities portrayed with that warm human insight which has won for the author her high place in the hearts and imaginations of her readers.

A most notable addition to Murray's Two-Shilling Novels is "Her Father's Daughter" which Mr. Murray will publish. Millions of Gene Stratton-Porter's novels have already been sold and this new heroine—a self-reliant, delightful specimen of modern girlhood—will appeal to many hearts.

MERCANTILE PRACTICE

MERCANTILE PRACTICE.—By George Johnson, F.R.S.A., F.L.A.A. Effingham Wilson, 10/ net. Also of Kelly & Walsh, Ld., Shanghai.

A series of brief essays on certain phases of commercial practice, claculations and accounting. Although the book appears to be of particular use to students reading for the commercial and accountancy examinations it will also be found of great utility to those whose business it is to deal with underwriting, interest and investments, annuities, etc. Useful chapters are also included on cost accounts, depreciation, royalties, parities and so on. Apart from its value to students of mercantile practice it should be a work of reference found in every office library.

CHINA YEAR BOOK

The China Year Book for 1924, the largest and most complete compendium of information on China, is a valuable addition to the libraries, not only of sinologues and specialists in China, but of businessmen and others who from time to time may desire accurate details with regard to some question of the day.

For the merchant, there are chapters on trade and commerce, on products, geography, river improvements and habour works. For the industrialist, there is a chapter on labour with many details as to cost of living and wages paid. For the educator, there is a specially written chapter on education, with details as to the principal colleges and universities. The engineer will find a list of factories and industries. The physician will find a survey of the medical world in China. For those who desire to read original documents rather than summaries, there are documented accounts of the principal political and international questions before China during the year, namely the Lincheng Incident and the Sino-Russian Conference. The Washington Conference Agreements are included from the previous issue. Documents with regard to The Negotiations for the Rendition of Weihaiwei, Gold Franc Controversy, Trade Mark Law and the Canton Customs are included.

Mr. Rodney Gilbert of the staff of the "North China Daily News" has written a summary of the political situation in China during the year. Mr. George E. Sokolsky has dealt with the economic questions. Mr. Arthur de C. Sowerby has contributed on the fauna of China. Among the other contributors of articles on special subjects are, Mr. H. Von Heidenstamm, Mr. G. Padoux, Mr. D. MacDonald, and various officials of the Chinese government. The Inspectorate-General of the Customs, the posts and the Salt Administration have provided statistical data. Mr. H. H. Fox, H.B.M. Commercial Counsellor and the British consuls in China have assisted in compiling the factory list. There are also several Chinese contributors, among them being Professor Hu Shih of the Peking National University.

It is difficult in reviewing a book as full of information as the China Year Book to hit upon any one chapter as especially interesting. Every chapter has an interest for the particular person. But in view of the current activity with regard to Trade Marks, one naturally turns to page 891 of the Year Book to disover what there is on the subject. First, the various treaty stipulations are given, namely the Mackay Treaty, the Sino-Japanese Commercial Treaty, 1903, the Sino-American Treaty, 1903. Then the Chinese Trade Mark Law, promulgated May 3, 1923, is given in full. After that appears Detailed Regulations of the Trade Mark Law promulgated by Presidential Mandate, May 8, 1923. That is followed by a joint letter addressed to the Consular Body of Shanghai by the various foreign Chambers of Commerce in Shanghai. A cable to the London "Times" signed by important British firms in China together with the Note of the Diplomatic Body in Peking to Mr. Wellington Koo completes the chapter. Thus, one has before him a complete dossier on the Trade Mark Law.

Each chapter is dealt with in just this manner, documents rather than comment being provided, so that the reader of the leader for instance, on China's armies might turn to page 910 on China's Defences and obtain sufficient data for a fuller appreciation of the problems involved. How often have we discussed the Tuchuns and the Tuchunate? Yet, how many really understand what a Tuchun is, whether he is a military official only or something more. On page 913 of the Year Book, one can discover the full significance of the Tuchun system.

In an article on Labour, appears an analysis of strikes in China and the efforts of various bodies to improve the condition of the labourer. In the same chapter on page 660 one may read a document published by the Communist Party of China which clearly defines what that body of radicals intends for the country. It is as bitter an attack on the foreigners as has perhaps ever been published.

One can go on ad infinitum analysing chapters. But it would be much better to buy the book and to use it before jumping to conclusions on things Chinese.

SHORT STORIES FOR OUR CHINESE READERS

THE WORLD'S BEST SHORT STORIES. Selected and Edited by Henry Huizinga, M.A. PH. D., Commercial Press.

The editor of this collection of short stories had rendered a service to Chinese teachers of English in senior middle schools in China, which will greatly lighten their labours. His selection of stories is notably conservative, since, as he says, "even the writers of the greatest reputation cannot always be safely recommended to the young:" but his claim to have presented the most popular, wholesome and useful stories cannot be disputed.

In addition to the introduction for teachers and suggestions for students, almost every story or poem has notes and questions to aid the teacher in bringing out the best points of the narrative. The author leans to the familiar in his choice, but we must remember that the volume is intended for use in Chinese schools. Even at that, it does make one wince to read in the supplementary lists, "The Chinese student should be encouraged to read the best modern fiction," with a list appended in which Zane Grey, Gene Stratton Porter, Eleanor H. Porter, Ralph Connor, and Harold Bell Wright figure prominently.

HAVE WOMEN MADE PROGRESS?

"ANCILLA'S SHARE: An Indictment of Sex Antagonism." Anonymous. Hutchinson. 18s.

"Ancilla's Share" is a very ably written attempt to prove that, in spite of women's partial enfranchisement, there still exists in men all over the world a latent sex antagonism, founded on contempt and fear, which militates against complete sex equality. The author, who is anonymous—but who, we learn at the last moment, is Miss Elizabeth Robins—does not hesitate to admit that "the ultimate ideal, the goal of human enleavour, is a combination of the educated efforts of women with the educated efforts of men for the creation of a civilised society." But with this admission goes also the belief that only by "the temporary abandonment of the pretence that co-operation is here, abandonment even of trying to convince men that co-operation is 'the better way,'" can the ideal co-operation of both be achieved.

There is in this much to provoke both argument and disagreement. Many will remain unconvinced even by the very exhaustive and brilliantly written indictment of sex antagonism which forms the main purpose of the book. It is just as well that we should be reminded by such books as this that women have not yet won their rightful position in public or private life, but the writer appears to us unduly pessimistic about their present position, and not entirely to have proved either that co-operation with men, especially in political parties, is a failure, or that women can effect a solidarity of womanhood' that will bring peace to a war-ridden world. It is only fair in saying this to pay a high tribute to the writer's own admissions of the disabilities of women, both in working together and as peacemakers.

What appears to us a little illogical is the conclusion drawn that, in spite of their inability to remain solid even in the suffrage movement—an inability slightly exaggerated by the author—and in spite of the active share women took in war work, they can still be mobilized against war. It so happens many of them have to be converted both to solidarity and to peace; would it not be quicker after all to muddle through by a continued co-operation of such men and women as can work together and have a real will to peace? But whether "Ancilla's Share" excites agreement or hostility, it is a remarkable book and one that should not be neglected by those who are thinking along these lines to-day.—"Daily News."

THOMAS BURT

Coalminer and Privy Counsellor

"THOMAS BURT, M.P., D.C.L., PITMAN AND PRIVY COUNCILLORS An Autobiography." T. Fisher Unwin. 15s.

Thomas Burt had a romantic career, but he remained an unromantic man. His spare mouse-like figure astonished people who expected to find in a miners' leader at least a man of bulk. In his youth he had been overgrown, but overwork and lack of food as a growing boy dwarfed his stature, and perhaps may account for the lack of fire with which he described conditions which made Lord Shaftesbury cry to Heaven.

His autobiography stops short with his election for Norpeth as one of the first two working-men's representatives in Parliament. He meant to finish it in a time of leisure which never came, though he lived to be 85. He tells his story with a restraint that is alomst unnatural. The spoonful of egg given him by an aunt and remembered for years, is described with the same detachment as the way in which he was snatched back from being ground to death in the dark by a descending "cage."

It was not until he was 17 that he first began to walk the 18 miles to Newcastle and back to buy cheap classics in order to extend the reading offered by his father's remarkable library of sermons and biblical commentaries. He used to go home too tired to eat, fall asleep on the floor and plead not to be awakened; but when the call came to be secretary of the trade union he had to be forced into the job. It was no sinecure, and the salary was 27s. 6d. a week.

Burt grew up among strikes which proved almost uniformly disastrous to the men, and partly on this account, no doubt, regarded almost with horror the militant policy introduced by Keir Hardie.

An old friend, Mr. Aaron Watson, has supplied chapters dealing with his life as a national figure.

FATIMA AND THE FIRST WIFE

THE SECOND WIFE.—By Lilian Arnold. Thronton Butterworth. London 1924.

There is a mystery in the life of Courtney Blake connected with his first wife, which drives him abroad for 10 years. He returns, as sensitive as ever to the unjustly accusing finger which he sees in everyone he meets; and encounters Alison Seymour in his brother's consulting room. He must be protected, she is of the type of woman that must have some one to protect. And so she becomes "The Second Wife." Naturally she runs up against the mystery, in which an ex-maidservant of the former Mrs. Blake plays a large and villainous part, with the consequent misunderstanding, estrangement and and reconcilliation. The story is a little long drawn out but the lot is well handled and the characterization vigorous. The women are, perhaps naturally, better than the men. Courtney Blake is a little incredible, Allison exceedingly good. Judith strikes one as the sort of woman that some modern women are prone to deify, to whom they would point as the ideal of what self-reliant womanhood should be—a sort of female equivalent of the strong silent man once popular. One wishes she did not find it necessary to her self-reliance to use a certain adjective so freely and vigorously.

MAUPASSANT IN ENGLISH

A LIFE.—Newly translated into English by Marjorie Laurie. T. Werner Lawrie. London 1924.

It is a common-place of book-reviewing that translations are never really successful and that if we want the "right stuff" we must go to the author in his own language. Which, with Miss Laurie's wonderfully fine version of "A Life" before us strikes us as great nonsense. In one sense of course translation is bound to fail. It cannot turrn a French—or, indeed any other foreign, novel into an English one, least of all in the case of so individual and intensely French an author as Guy de Maupassant. And aware of her limitations in this respect, Miss Laurie has done a clever thing: she has kept as near to his style as possible, so that we can taste, even through the medium of another language, his unequalled terseness, his curious austerity and his mastery of description alike of people and places; and at the same time she has written excellent English. Even the best translations are occasionally by sentences which without being a mere construe are none the less un-English. Miss Laurie's book is singularly free from these. The present writer happens not to have read this particular story of de Maupassant's in the original but he has read a great many others and judging by them one would say that the reader of "A Life" in English will lose as little of the original as it would be possible for any translation to lose. Whether he will like the story is nother matter. Like Thomas Hardy, de Maupassant was a relentless writer. He conceives certain men and women and not by one hair's breath would he interfere with their natural development and mutual reaction's to spare the reader's feelings. But after all one does not praise de Maupassant nowadays any more than one does other classics. It is odd to recall the days when he was so little understood in England as to be considered rather a "naughty"

SEVEN QUESTIONS

"SEVEN QUESTIONS IN DISPUTE" By Williams Jennings Bryan, Fleming H. Revell Co.

It will be considerable comfort to those who have felt at times that there might be room for doubt as to the verbal inspiration of the Bible, the degree of deity of Christ, the Virgin Birth, the Blood Atonement, the Bodily Resurrection of Jesus, the Miracles, and the Origin of Man, to have Mr. Bryan settle things for them, as he does in this series of articles reprinted from "The Sunday Times."

In his preface the author writes: "The Bible Union of China has been organized to protect the Bible from the attacks of liberal missionaries. The question of pre-millennialism of post-millennialism does not enter into this discussion. But schools realize that Christ's Second Coming depends upon His First Coming; unless the Bible is inspired, He did not come as a Saviour at all; He was not divine; had no pre-existence; was not God incarnate in the flesh; was not conceived by the Holy Ghost; performed no miracles and never rose from the dead. In like fashion the story of man's creation and origin rest now and always on the authority of the Word of God. . . . All Christians of every sect and denomination should unite in defence of the Bible as the inspired and infallible Word of God and in defence of the Bible's Christ, Saviour as well as Example and Teacher. As modernism attacks all that is vital in the Christian religion, the real issue presented is: Shall Christianity remain Christian?

It will be a surprise to many to think of the Bible as needing defence and protection, but those who feel it is in danger will no doubt welcome Mr. Bryan's vigorous and uncompromising championship, delight which will delight those in agreement with it although it will hardly influence any who do not share the author's adamant conviction.

MISSIONARY MELODRAMA

"JANE IN THE ORIENT."—By Lois Hawka Swinehart. Fleming H. Revell Co.

Some frank observations on missions and missionaries are made by the heroine of this story, told by a missionary herself, stationed in the Southern Presbyterian Mission in Kwanju, Korea. "Jane" comes out to visit her missionary sister and brother-in-law, loathing "church machinery, missionary societies, and Bible classes in particular," and feeling that missionaries have no warrant for coming to a happy people with a new religion. It takes lepers, wife-beating heathen, a desert island, a diving girl, and a wreck, to say nothing of a virile missionary lover, to convert her, but it is accomplished in the last chapter. The heroine writes letters far more voluminous than any we have ever written, or received; but what's that in a lively story, told with humour and sympathy!

THE WOMAN'S PAGE

BALLADE OF ADVENTURESSES

By Elizabeth Pepys.

There were two ladies came over seas,
Eh, but they were clever,
Faring in quest of the Gold Fleece,
Heigh-ho, they faltered never.

To Shanghai's friendly shores they came
(A good field for endeavour)
With tales of money and of fame,
Ah me, but they were clever.

These heiresses were not too proud,
Fancy, did you ever?
To borrow where they were allowed,
But to repay, O never.

One pledged her troth and took a ring,
Heigh-ho, but she was clever,
Two rings indeed, the taking thing,
With no remorse whatever.

Shanghai is sadder since they left—
For best of friends must sever—
Kind friends, hotels and shroffs bereft
And no redress whatever.

Our guilelessness has had a blow,
Alas, we were not clever
With ladies fair we'll now go slow,
Remembering this forever.

BETTY BROWNELL

Charting the Stars.

By Elizabeth Pepys.

The Miss Brownell who appears in the accompanying illustration does not follow our preconceived ideas of astronomers, and in point of fact it is stars of the cinema whose path through the Far East this energetic young advance agent is charting. Miss Brownell is here as representative of "Ruth Roland, Inc.," considering scenarios and locations for the new pictures which Miss Roland proposes to make while on her world tour this autumn.

Miss Roland's picture "A Dollar Down," in which this talented actress plays opposite Henry Walthall, is to be released soon and it is the purpose of its star to accompany it, making a personal appearance. She is the possessor of a charming voice and has appeared with great success on the Orpheum Circuit, so that Shanghai will have the rare pleasure of seeing one of their film favourites appear in person and demonstrate that she is talented in many different directions. The plot of "A Dollar Down" shows up the fallacy of the instalment plan, and the wisdom of paying as you go—a somewhat heretical doctrine for Shanghai.

The plays which Miss Roland proposes to make will be something entirely new in movie production, combining the advantages of the educational film such as shown by Burton Holmes and the thrilling serials in which the lovely heroine is involved in wild adventures, skillfully contrived to set forth the scenic attractions of the port cities. Her idea is to have a connected narrative, but not to allow the interest of the plot to swamp the realism of the pictures, and to make such a series as may be shown to children in connexion with their school work.

The Advance Agent.

Miss Brownell's task is to see that suitable studio facilities are available along the route, to select suitable scenarios (and this is an invitation to submit your pet plots), choose locations, and arrange the hundred and one necessary details. She has been a close friend of Miss Roland's for 14 years, ever since the two girls met in the Balboa Studio and has been associated with her in much of her work.

Miss Brownell herself is a versatile young person, as besides her work in the cinema, she is a keen business woman and critic, and also sings and dances. As "Baby Betty" she achieved much juvenile popularity and later studied at Denishawn, coming out to Shanghai with the first Banvard tour of the Far East after the War, 1919-20, a very successful and delightful experience, during which she met many interesting people, among them the Sultan of Jehore, who entertained the company lavishly and presented Miss Brownell with a riding crop with an American shield in its handle, as a special souvenir. During the War Miss Brownell was one of the girls who entertained the soldiers at the front, and in 1919 she brightened the leisure of troops in Vladivostok, being prevented from going further into Siberia by the fighting up the line.

When Miss Brownell was asked in what plays she most enjoyed playing, she mentioned "The Hard Way," in which she played opposite Jack Pickford, "The Phantom Fortune," "Caleb Conover," in which she played the role of heroine to Tom Sanchi's hero, and other plays in which she appeared with Hobart Henley and George Faucett.

A Risky Business.

The comfortable illusion of "dummies" and doubles cherished by the audience when seeing acts of reckless daring pictured on the screen were rudely shattered when Miss Brownell showed me a scar on her elbow, acquired in making a flying leap from a horse to a motor. This time the jump fell short and she bruised her arm badly, an infection setting in which threatened the loss of the limb, and rendered it useless for a year.

Another harrowing experience occurred when Miss Brownell was playing in Caleb Conover. Her lover, the candidate for Governor, while speaking at a public meeting, is heckled by a gang of toughs who finally resort to violence, and are put out by the police after their attack upon her has roused her lover to a hand-to-hand fight. "It was a real fight, too," smiled Miss Brownell reminiscently, "Tom Sanchi got so excited he actually knocked one man's front tooth out. Nothing faked about that rough and tumble!"

When order has been restored and the audience is leaving, the heroine sees one of the gang who has hidden himself, draw a gun on her lover. She has no time to warn him, but defeats the assassin's purpose by flinging the bunch of flowers she is carrying into his face. The idea of the scenario was that the flowers would spoil the thugs's aim and the bullet would go straight up in the air. Miss Brownell, however, threw with such realism as to disconcert the gun man; his foot slipped, and the charge—only powder and wadding of course—went off right in Miss Brownell's face.

Playing the Game.

"For a time I thought the whole side of my face had been blown off," Miss Brownell said, "The explosion deafened me, the pain was intense, but my one thought was not to ruin the picture. Thinking that my teeth must have been knocked out, and realizing what a sight it would be, I put my hand to my face to hide it. Colin Campbell, who was directing, shouted, "Take your hand down, you're spoiling the picture!" Then the gun man exclaimed. "My God, I've shot Berry!" and Colin called out to the camera man, "Cut!"

"The poor chap who shot me really felt worse about it than I did," continued Miss Brownell, for although I was afraid to look at my face for fear that I should see that one eye was gone, when I realized that it was only a bad powder burn I was too thankful for words. Of course it was frightfully painful and I had to have daily treatments from specialists for four months. Damages? O, there was never any question of that. I figured that when I went into the cinema business I had to expect to take some chances, and it was one of those accidents that couldn't be helped. As long as it didn't wreck the picture it was all right."

"Some sporting spirit!" gasped the reporter. "Nothing out of the ordinary," returned Miss Brownell, "the papers may talk about jealousy in the profession; but I've always found that the bunch will stand by each other, and that they take the rough with the soft side of life. Now Ruth Roland, who never uses a double, when she was supposed to climb from a racing motor boat up a rope ladder to an aeroplane, was pulled into the water by the section of the plane's wings. It couldn't rise at once and she was jerked through the waves at a terrific rate until she was bruised all over. You never do know how you're coming out; but it's not a dull life."

TO CLORINA IN KULING

Shanghai Still Doing Business as Usual

Dear Clorinda: You remember asking me to let you know all the Shanghai foolishnesses while you were away with the family, I startwere away with the family, so I started a special memo pad labelled Folly, but so far no one has had energy enough to be very foolish. It takes pep to be foolish and more oxygen in the air to inspire any real spectacular parties. Don't worry, we'll wait till you get back to show us the way.

The chief activity of the town is going away on holidays, and I sometimes fear my disposition will not withstand the wear and tear of presenting gifts to those who are gallivanting off. 'Twould be far fitter for those departing to leave gifts to cheer up the stay-at-homes. And by that same token let me tell you that we are enjoying hugely the loan of your two electric fans, for to such a pass has the rising temperature brought me that I can scarcely contemplate ringing for the boy to move the fan about from plug to plug. Methinks every room should have three fans or so, which is also the requisite number of fireplaces properly to warm it for the winter.

Distressing Tresses.

Those that remain in town, finding little else to divert them, are shingling their hair. The snip, snip of the shears is heard on every side and I hear there is talk of the hairdressers forming a union to prevent overtime work. Every lady seems to think that nothing in her hair became her like the losing of it. For swimming parties it has many advantages, and as it is Ja cooler fashion there is no restraining the long line gaiting to escape the restrictions of chignons. I cannot being to tell you all your friends whose hair has fallen by the way. The daily papers, during the dull season, are seriously considering having a list of the bobbed and shingled sent in each night for publication, just as now the hotels send in the mames of their guests. Should this be made a feature I'll send you the clippings—the newspaper clippings I mean.

PLEATS IN JABOT AND SKIRIT AND THE TRAILING BOW AT THE SIDE ARE STYLE POINTS.

You know the new-faces-for-old stunt that different beauty aid manufacturers are always featuring? Well, as I have watched the U. S. Consulate-General and the Court House taking on new elegancies I have been reminded of the Institute de Beaute. First the workmen chip off the exterior of the bricks. That would correspond to the "skinning" operation I daresay. Next they whitewash, which might stand for bleaching. Then comes the bright red paint, which of course is rouge, and the new green blinds are doubtless the patent eye-brows and eye-lashes.

A soon as it gets a little cooler and things begin to happen again, expect further bulletins.

Fondly yours,
Elizabeth Pepys

SURFING IN HAWAII

Among the most exhilarating of moments are the flawless fleeting seconds when one triumphantly rides to shore on the crest of a great green wave, feeling oneself a part of the ocean, a partaker of its tremendous power. Floating idly on the lazy swells which ripple a cross the calm harbour inside the coral reef, one suddenly feels the freshening of the breeze, a beach-bound jade-gree wave starts on its journey. Then one must be at attention to catch the wave as it passes, choosing just the right moment to leap on its strong back, and speed on. Behind one the surf pounds like the trampling of galloping horses. The wave curled just behind threatens to fall upon on. But gaily one is swept onward, swift as a bird, spray-flecked, breeze-whipped. Faster and faster, nearer and nearer shore, until, the passion of its mad flight spent the wave slings down its burden on the welcoming shallows of the beach.

THE STRAIGHT AND THE BOUFFANT MODE ARE SEEN TOGETHER.

BOOKS FOR SUMMER READING

"Dreams, Books Are Each a World"

In Shanghai that popular fallacy of reading in the long winter evenings" has been completely exploded. We jolly well know that we may jazz, or see the pictures or the A. D. C. Show or a boxing match but, unless we happen to break an arm or leg we probably shall not find more time for literature in winter, no matter how long the evenings may be. But in summer there is a bit of a let-down from our business cares and social pleasures and in the quiet suggested by the heated season we may renew our friendship with books.

There is no particular brand of book for holiday reading, for every person has a special taste in books and probably a number of different tastes for different moods. The additional leisure will give opportunity for tackling a long book, or one whose technical content has demanded a concentration hitherto impossible, while for sheer relaxation lighter stuff will be demanded. Messrs. Kelly & Walsh, Ld. have provided for all members of the reading fraternity and a large invoice of book just received offers a number of excellent suggestions for the book box which should accompany all holiday luggage.

A Solid Foundation.

One of the most readable of modern biographies is the life of Willard Straight by Herbert Croly, a book of special interest for all who have lived in China. The manysided personality of its subject is clearly presented and with a completeness which would not have been possible if Mr. Straight had not kept careful diaries and made full notes. There are eight illustrations in full colour from his own drawings and many other pictures and maps.

"The Bolshevik Persecution of Christianity" by Capt. Francis McCullagh is a volume which has attracted much attention. It is dedicated by the author to Frank Munsey, owner and editor of the New York Herald "who by sending me as his representative to Russia enabled me to obtain the facts set forth in this book." The "Irish Independent" says of it: "Deserves a place in the library of every man concerned for the fate of religion and of democratic institutions."

"Constructive Conscious Control of the Individual," by F. Matthias Alexander with an introduction by Professor John Dewey is a scholarly and scientific treatise yet one bristling with applications which can be grasped by the lay reader. For sleepless nights the author not only gives the remedy, "conscious control of all activities," but shows the insomniac how to get that control. An appreciative reviewer says that the theory should revolutionize education and put humanity on a new basis. Sensory appreciation and its relation to happiness is a valuable section of the work.

A Faery Touch.

"The King of Elfland's Daughter," by Lord Dunsany, is a delightful mélange of fascinating tales, imaginatively and delicately told. The author says in his foreword: "Do not be frightened by the title, for though some of the action takes place in Elfland the scenes are as dear and familiar as your favourite English country." "The Dream," by H. G. Wells, shows modern English life from the standpoint of the Olympians many years later, and is a bright and suggestive satire.

Among the new novels just in is "David of King's," by E. F. Benson, continuing the adventures of David Blaize, with the hero more mature but with the same high spirits and the same engaging frankness which won him such hosts of friends upon his first appearance. The dialogue is said to be as bright and vivacious as that of "Dodo," but perfectly natural. Cambridge men will take especial pleasure in this volume, but every one is bound to enjoy it. "To-morrow and To-morrow," by Stephen McKenna, carries the "Sonia" series on to its natural conclusion. The War comes to an end on its first page and before the last page the Government which undertakes to bring peace back to the survivors has passed away. This phase of history is concluded with this volume which will be found of great interest.

"Wanderlight" by Ernest Raymond is another story of three years in the life of a young man, told with insight and sympathy by the author of "Tell England." "Ocean Tramps," by H. de Vere Stacpoole is a collection of stories of romance and adventure in the south seas by same raconteur who gave "The Blue Lagoon" to an appreciative public. "The Pipers of the Market Place," by Richard Dehan is a briskly moving narrative centering about Malvina, a creation said to be stronger than "Maggie Tulliver" or other outstanding original heroines, a "big, brave, beautiful, natural girl."

Humourous Tales.

"Leave it to Psmith," by Wodehouse, is absolutely guaranteed by William Lyons Phelps, as humour. The man who doesn't find this tale highly amusing is lamentably deficient, he declares, or words to that effect. So if we do not want this Professor of Literature to think us peculiar it would be well to join the eager line of buyers and annex this popular gloom-killer. And while one is about it, why not "Ukridge," by the same author? George Robey's "New Laughter Makers" will release the reader from the ignominy of having no stories to match the others going round, and "Quotable Anecdotes," by D. B. Knox, will be another aid to a jolly evening.

A trio of Chinese stories which will impart local colour and the history of Cathay in a painless and efficient manner is "Yellow Dragon," by Arthur Mills; The "Red Lacquer Case," by Patricia Wentworth; and "Chun Yut," by Cyril Weston. Three more of a kind, and these are especially suggested for thoughtful wives to take along with them to amuse husbands on the first rainy day, are "The Amateur Derby," by Harding Cox; "How to Win at Racing," by Bat Masters; and "Confessions of a Turf Crook," by A. Cathal. To show the range of selection possible at Messrs. Kelly & Walsh we close with the Anniversary Number of "Printer's Pie," contrasting with the "Royal Academy for 1924."

ECHO OF FUKIEN BANDIT OUTRAGE

Mr. Mackay Was Released without Ransom: Eye-witness's Story of How Brigands Were Outwitted by an Old Comrade Turned Soldier

It will be remembered that after news of the bandit attack upon Messrs. Dinsmore and Mackay, of the China Import & Export Lumber Co., in Pichi, Fukien, negotiations for the release of Mr. A. C. Mackay and three Chinese proceeded for some time, a large ransom being demanded. Next came a Reuter telegram saying that the prisoners had been released without ransom. How that release was brought about is now told by Mr. J. J. Carroll, senior forest inspector of the company in that district.

Mr. Carroll was on his way to join Messrs. Dinsmore and Mackay, but when he reached Shahsien he was met with the news that the body of Mr. Jay Dinsmore had just been brought down the river in a Chinese boat. He immediately demanded a military escort in order to set out in search of Mr. Mackay, but was held up there by the local military official who refused to furnish a guard even after the Foochow Governor had wired him to do so. Finally, Mr. Carroll said it was his intention to set out without a guard if such was not forthcoming by noon the next day, but that the General would be held responsible for his safety, and the authorities, albeit grumbling at such undue haste, furnished the escort. The delay was due to political intrigue between the local Fukien men and Marshal Wu Pei-fu's Northern army, each hoping to discredit the other, and using the captured foreigner as a pawn in his own game.

An Ex-bandit to Catch a Bandit.

This case of kidnapping was unusual in that the bandits did not at once send in letters making terms, but had to be hunted up by spies. When their whereabouts were discovered and communication opened through a middleman, the first ransom demanded was $60,000, a sum ridiculous on its face, as so much cash could not have been obtained in the province. While negotiations were going on, Brig-Gen. Goh approached Mr. Carroll, whom he had known before, and said that he had a marvellous plan to secure the release of the prisoners without paying ransom. Gen. Goh had previously been a bandit, but concluding that military life offered large pecuniary rewards to a man of his talents he had accepted an amnesty for himself and his men and the rank of major. Husbanding his resources he had enrolled more soldiers under his standard, until he now holds the rank of Brigadier-General.

He had been made responsible for the safe return of Mr. Mackay by the Tuli and in order to save his position, and at the same time make something for himself on the side, he worked out the following plan. Another band of bandits was on the point of joining his forces, but to carry on the scheme they were to pretend to join the first band of kidnappers, and later, after giving a signal to the General's men, would withdraw, allowing the soldiers to close in upon the bandits, capture them and carry off the prisoners. Cautioned by Mr. Carroll and by the representative of the Tuli as well, that nothing must be done which would jeopardize the safety of Mr. Mackay and the three Chinese, he insisted that there was no doubt of his project succeeding and permission was finally given him to try it, while $5,000 was advanced for the expenses of the expedition.

Robbers Outwitted.

By bribe the repentant bandits were admitted to the hiding place of the bandits, a camp in a mountain gorge. They represented themselves as coming from the company, with the promise of $15,000 for a ransom, and with an advance on account of $200. The bandits, believing that all was over except the final payments proceeded to invest the $200 for food and drink to celebrate a feast day which was imminent, and withdraw their outside guards. This gave the soldiers an opportunity to surround the camp and at the appointed signal they rushed in and put the bandits to flight.

Mr. Mackay was sleeping in a little hut on the side of the mountain a little removed from the camp, with one armed soldier at his feet and another at his side Always alert to the possibility of an attack he had made up his mind what course of action to pursue and the moment he heard the sound of guns (fired by the pseudo-bandits as a signal) he took the knife from the sleeping bandit at his side, tossed his bed-spread over the head of the others, rolled it about him and kicked him down the hill. He then made his escape, and although fired upon managed to hide in a charcoal oven until the bandits beat a retreat. The Chinese prisoners had not been so closely guarded and were also able to get away.

Mr. Mackay's Injuries.

The fortunate coincidence of the feast day, together with the fact that Gen. Goh was commemorating his father's death with funeral ceremonies and feasts, some of which were held in the Import & Export Lumber Co.'s hong, which was interpreted by the bandits as the hong's own celebration and as an indication that they were safe from attack, led to the relaxation of the guard without which the camp could not have been surprised.

Mr. Mackay was in a very bad condition when rescued, as he had been for ten days without shoes and stockings. His broken arm had been improperly set and there were great sores where he had been roughly bound. The night when they were captured he was fired at, but the bullet just grazed his head. The wound bled copiously and the rain which fell washed it clean, so that he escaped from the infection which caused Mr. Dinsmore's sad death.

PEKING, July 28.—On July 25 the Japanese Legation sent a Note to the Waichiaopu reminding the Chinese Government of the promise made by the latter in 1920 to open eight treaty ports along the Tsingtao-Tsinan railway.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

AMERICAN BOXER INDEMNITY

Remitted Funds to be Devoted to Educational and Cultural Purposes

DEMAND FOR SCIENTIFIC EDUCATION

Washington, July 27.

The Chinese Government will devote the funds resulting from remission by the United States of the balance of the Boxer Indemnity to further educational and cultural purposes, paying especial attention to scientific requirements, Minister Sze has informed Secretary Hughes.

The Minister's communication was in reply to one from the Secretary informing him that the President has signed the joint resolution approved at the close of the last session of Congress authorizing the President, in his discretion, to remit to China the balance of the Boxer Indemnity, such remission to begin as from October 1, 1917.

The correspondence was made public to-night, Minister Sze expressing the thanks of his people and Government for this "signal proof of American friendship for China." Recalling that the first remission by the American Government in 1908 enabled the Chinese Government," he added, "to continue payments of the indemnity, thus set free, to educational purposes, he said that the results of the experiment had convinced his Government of the wisdom of the step.

"It is the purpose of the Chinese Government," he added, "to continue the policy with the further payments remitted by the present act of the American Government with modifications as experience and the demands of the times may dictate. As the demand for scientific education has in recent years been increasingly urgent in China, my Government now proposes to devote the funds thus made available by the generosity of the American Government to educational and cultural purposes, paying especial attention to scientific requirements. Moreover, it is the intention of my Government to entrust the administration of the funds to a board which shall be composed of Chinese and American citizens as members and also to avail itself of the services of experts on working out the details along the lines indicated. Upon the formulation of some definite plan, I shall take pleasure in laying it before you for your consideration."—Reuter's American Service.

SOVIET AMBASSADOR TO CHINA

Karakhan's Credentials

Peking, July 31.

M. Karakhan presented his credentials as Ambassador to the President this morning. All the Cabinet Ministers attended the ceremony which was slightly more elaborate than in the case of a Minister and included the playing of the Soviet and Chinese national anthems.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

EXPORTATION OF SALT FROM TSINGTAO

Peking, July 29.

The Waichiaopu having suggested to the Japanese Legation the reopening of a conference with regard the exportation of Tsingtao salt, the latter has agreed to exchange views informally prior to the holding of a formal conference in this connexion.—Eastern News Agency.

PEKING DAY BY DAY

The Premier: Parliament and Its Perquisites: Soviet Demand for Its Pound of Flesh

From Our Own Correspondent.

Peking, July 22.

The House of Representatives has yet to approve or reject the nomination of Dr. Yen as Premier. We are promised a decision daily, but so far the House has been content to express itself in factional bids for privileges and the like. Dr. Yen's non-committal attitude is not helping the House to reveal itself one way or the other. He says in effect, "You have the nomination before you; act on it as you please"—which isn't very satisfying to Parliamentarians who want to be assured of the loaves and fishes before they say Aye or Nay to the candidature of anybody for anything. Dr. Yen is personally very popular in Parliamentarian circles, and that is an added perplexity, although of course personal popularity does not count for much in these hard time. On the gold franc issue, also, he is reputed to have maintained his non-committal attitude. In view of these circumstances it might be taken for granted that Dr. Yen is the busiest man in Peking just now.

A Point of Etiquette.

Parliament, ever a stickler over Constitutional forms, is now trying to prove that Dr. Wellington Koo's appointment as Premier ad interim is unconstitutional. It has been asserted that the appointment is not that of Acting Premier but of Officiating Premier; but this argument, I am told, is not in accordance with the Presidential mandate, which quite explicitly expresses Dr. Koo's acting capacity. According to the Constitution, the President may nominate an acting Premier only if the House is not in session; otherwise its approval must be sought. All this may not mean much to the average man, but in China, where there are varying shades of office, it means a great deal, and cannot be dismissed as a Chinese distinction without a difference. An Acting Premier could maintain the Premiership for an indefinite period as incumbent—it has been done on several occasions in the last few years—but an Officiating Premier's position is simply that of chairman of the Cabinet, a position which would inevitably have to be regularized soon after it was created.

Moscow's Awkward Questions

Sometime ago the Rosta News Agency circulated a statement to the effect that the Moscow authorities were beginning to doubt whether the Chinese Government was capable of fulfilling any of the obligations contained in the Sino-Russian agreement. It was a very naïve confession. Did the Moscow authorities really think that China would become unified politically to give effect to the Koo-Karakhan agreement? Surely not; yet such is the only interpretation of the fear that seems to have just dawned on the Soviet. Of course, Moscow cannot learn from the Legations of the other Powers, but if M. Karakhan had kept his Government informed about international developments in Peking since he arrived here, the Soviet would not have been under any misapprehension about a fate that awaits all foreign agreements, whether coloured white, pink, or red, that depend for their enforcement on the acquiescence of the country as a whole. At best they have to be taken as an earnest that when conditions improve they will be put into effect.

The Bolshevik's Brutal Way

Anyway, M. Karakhan is not trusting too much to the future. Already he has ruffled Chinese opinion by inquiring when certain obligations are to be fulfilled; for the main provisions, he is accepting the position in a way that would bring a mountain of abuse on the heads of the other Powers if they acted similarly. He has not only signed the instrument on behalf of Russia, but he is helping to make it effective in China itself. This does not show much respect either for the Central Government or the sovereignty of China. But what cares the Soviet? Deaf to China's request that the Conference should begin as soon as possible, it has transferred the discussion to Mukden, the seat of one of China's independent chieftains. Having gained a very important shadow, it now seeks the substance, which, judging from the scanty news that we get from the Manchurian capital, is even harder to gain. What Marshal Chang Tso-lin wants, and what every Chinese should want, is the return of the Chinese Eastern railway to the Chinese fold; but that is not the plan of the government that seeks nothing unequal, nothing unreciprocal. The Bolsheviks will try to maintain as tight a stranglehold over north Manchuria as their predecessors. The only difference is that they are working openly toward their object whereas the Tsarists had to be content with covert action.

Shanghai Goes to Peking

A growing number of Shanghailanders are choosing Peking as the venue of their annual holiday. Peking people welcome the tendency; it enables them to keep their houses occupied when they, too, are on holiday, for many visitors would rather take one of our Chinese houses than stay at a hotel. I don't know how general the attitude of a Shanghailander I questioned on the subject may be, but I give his point of view for what it is worth. He said: "I have been to Kuling and Mokanshan and Tsingtao many many times, and when I began to get fed-up with seeing the same round of people every year, it occurred to me that I had never seen Peking. I had had a few vagrant wishes before, of course, but it was very difficult to break away from my holiday habits. I came really for duty's sake—that I simply must see Peking. Well, I've been coming every year for the last three years, and every time I find something and somebody new." It should be mentioned, for fear this habit grows, that according to Mr. T. F. Millard, Peking is the only place in China where you can be pessimistic about China!

ROAD CONSTRUCTION IN CENTRAL CHINA

Marshal Wu Pei-fu's Scheme for the Employment of Provincial Troops

Peking, July 27.

Marshal Wu Pei-fu intends to use many of his troops in the construction of main roads throughout China, according to a report from Hankow. One of the first national enterprises of this nature will be a motor road from Loyang to Chêngtu, viâ Nanyangfu, Hsiangyang, Ichang and Chungking, and thence to the Szechuan capital. The troops in each province will be employed in constructing the highway in their own province, the reserve forces being used for the work. In Honan, Gen. Li Chih-yun will be responsible, using the men of the 3rd Division. From Nanyang to Hsiangyang, Gen. Chang Lian-sheng will be in charge, the work being done by the 17th Brigade. The 21st Brigade, under Gen. Wang Tu-ching, will carry out the construction from Hsiangyang to Ichang, while the section from Ichang to Wanhsien will be built by Gen. Lu Chin-shan, and the portion from Wanhsien to Chungking by Gen. Wang Yu-chin, these two Generals using whatever troops are available. From Chungking to Chêngtu will be under the direction of Gen. Yang Sen.

Gen. Yang Sen has telegraphed to the Government, and sent copies of the telegram to the provinces, urging support of Marshal Wu Pei-fu's suggestion to use the remitted Boxer Indemnities for railway construction. It is expected that similar messages will be forwarded in support of the one from Gen. Yang Sen.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking, July 28.—According to military circles, General Chang Hung-shen, representing the Yunnanese troops at Canton, has gone to Loyang in order to discuss the question of returning their allegiance to the Central Government.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

From the preparations that are under way, it would seem that the Panchan Lama himself, now in Lanchow, is soon to start for the Capital. A telegram has been received requesting the Government to instruct the Peking-Hankow and Lunghai Railways to make ready special cars for the transportation of the holy man to Peking.

CANTON AND MUKDEN ON SINO-RUSSIAN PACT

Dr. Sun Expresses Goodwill for Soviets But Attacks Peking for Recognizing Russia

Mr. Yang Ta-shin, who was appointed by Marshal Chang Tso-lin as Delegate to proceed to Kuangtung on a special mission, has returned to Shanghai. According to the "Shanghai Journal of Commerce," Mr. Yang gave the following opinions of Canton and Mukden on the recently concluded Sino-Russian Agreement:—

"My present mission was made necessary by the signing of the Sino-Russian Agreement which was brought about, in the opinion of Fengtien, by negotiations not properly conducted, and the terms of which are inimical to the interests of the Three Eastern Provinces. I was instructed to ascertain the views of Kuangtung and Shanghai. I was also instructed to express the thanks of Marshal Chang to the generals and officers in Kuangtung who sent presents on the occasion of his Excellency's last birthday.

"Regarding the Sino-Russian Agreement, all important persons in Shanghai agree that Article 6 in that Agreement is most objectionable, as the stipulation that "all anti-government organizations and their movements shall be strictly suppressed" would be most harmful to both the Independent Government of Kuangtung and the autonomous provinces controlled by Mukden. Besides, there is a matter specially concerning Mukden, which must be carried out in six months' time according to this Agreement. Marshal Wu Pei-fu, using the name of the Peking Government, will try to subjugate and reclaim Outer Mongolia by force; and if Mukden should then show any opposition to Marshal Wu's expedition, Soviet Russia could, by virtue of Clause 6 of this Agreement, send troops to co-operate or interfere, which would entail harmful consequences to China beyond imagination. I have reported these views of Shanghai before I went to Canton.

"The Goverment at Canton also takes exception to the mode of procedure followed in the negotiations for this Agreement; and the Kuomingtang has already declared that although the Chinese people should feel grateful for the goodwill shown them by Soviet Russia, yet there is none the less necessity effectively to destroy and eradicate the Peking Government which forms the stumbling block to the actual execution of the Agreement. Dr. Sun himself has repeated the same sentiment to me."

In short, Mr. Yang says, Fengtien will never recognize the Sino-Russian Agreement in its present form, and there is therefore no need for it to be represented or to make any statement at the forthcoming formal conference. "Fengtien will have to devise means for its own protection, that being the only course it can possibly take," concludes Delegate Yang Ta-shih.

REORGANIZATION LOAN

Denial of Chinese Press Report of Non-Payment of Bonds

Peking, July 28.

The Chinese press states to-day that the banks concerned in London are not paying the drawn bonds and coupons of the Reorganization Loan. This is false, for the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank paid promptly every drawn bond and coupon presented and is still paying. The Russo-Asiatic Bank is also paying.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CONCESSION LEASES IN CHINA

British Government's Firm Attitude

London, July 28.

In the House of Commons to-day, replying to Mr. W. Foot Mitchell (Conservative) regarding the renewal of concession leases in China, Mr. F. W. Jowett, the First Commissioner of Works, said that there was no prospect of a reversal of the decision of the Government.—Reuter.

PEKING WITHOUT A PREMIER

Parliament Blocking Appointment of Dr. W. W. Yen

Peking, July 26.

Four hundred and 26 members of the House of Representatives were present yesterday afternoon when the main question on the agenda was the vote on the nomination of Dr. W. W. Yen as Premier.

The Opposition insisted on altering the agenda by first taking a vote on the motion to impeach the Cabinet on the ground that the settlement of the Sino-German Agreement was illegal.

No one took the motion seriously beyond seeing in it an attempt to prevent the vote on the nomination of Dr. Yen.

After some discussion the Speaker ordered a vote by standing, regarding the impeachment, which resulted adversely to the Government. The latter's supporters then challenged the count and insisted on a ballot, in which 316 votes were cast, 181 for the motion and 135 against, 110 not voting; but the name-cards did not agree with the votes and the ballot was declared invalid.

The House subsequently adjourned. There was much disorder throughout the proceedings.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE RUSSIAN LEGATION IN PEKING

Soviet in Hopes of Getting It Under Their Control

Peking, July 25.

There seems a likelihood that the Russian Legation question will be settled shortly as negotiations are proceeding between M. Karakhan and Dr. Schurman, the latter being the Senior Protocol Minister at present in Peking in the absence of M. Oudendijk, who has left for Japan. The mediation of the Waichiaopu is responsible for the favourable outlook.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking, July 29.

It has been decided that a meeting of the Diplomatic Body will be held at the American Legation on August 1 at 8 a.m. to decide the attitude of the Diplomatic Body in anticipation of negotiations to be conducted between M. Karakhan and the Diplomatic Body after M. Karakhan's presentation to President Tsao Kun of his credentials on the 31st instant. It is probable that the question of the transfer of the former Russian Legation will be settled amicably.—Eastern News Agency.

U. S. MINISTER IN PEKING GOING ON LEAVE

The Question of Deanship of Diplomatic Body

Peking, July 22.

Dr. Schurman will leave Shanghai on August 16 for the United States on leave. Probably he will not return to Peking before the end of the year. As regards the Deanship the position is that before leaving Peking M. Oudendijk informed Dr. Wellington Koo that he was going to Japan and would be away about four weeks. The Netherlands Minister then suggested that in the event of any important question arising which would require the attenton of the Diplomatic Body Dr. Koo should communicate with the Senior Minister then in Peking. Meanwhile the archives of the Deconate remain at the Netherlands Legation, and routine matters are being attended to by the staff of the Netherlands Legation, who are familiar with the regular routine of the Deanship. Dr. Schurman is now the Senior Minister in Peking. This practical arrangement made by the Netherlands Minister was due to the fact his absence from China would be so short that it was not worth while transferring the Deconate, particularly in view of the absence from Peking of several of the Senior Ministers.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHINESE (1913) BONDS

Russian Issue in Awkward Position Caused by Soviet Seizures

A meeting of the holders of Chinese 5 per cent. 1913 Reorganization Bonds (Russian issue), who are unable to get their bonds exchanged for the new green bonds, was held on June 18, at the offices of Messrs. A. Keyser & Co., 31 Throgmorton Street, London when the following consented to serve on a committee with a view to getting the bonds put in order:—Mr. Arthur E. Franklin, of Messrs. A. Keyser & Co.; Mr. G. Abbott, of Mortimer, Harley & Co., Ld.; Mr. R. Sefton Turner, of National Securities Corporation, Ld.; Mr. S. Springer, of Messrs. Simpson, Miller & Springer.

From a statement supplied to the meeting, it appears that out of an issue of about £2,800,000 a vast number of bonds are stated to have been seized by the Soviet Government when they took over the banks in Russia. In 1920 the Soviet Government entered into special arrangements whereby they were permitted to sell certain of these bonds on the market here. The original block was a small one, but it appears to have been followed by sundry other indiscriminate sales, and over a period of years the bonds have so passed from hand to hand that the tracing of ownership has become virtually impossible. The Chinese Government, however, about 18 months ago took steps to replace these bonds (which were yellow in colour), substituting a fresh issue of green bonds, the rights of which they recognized. They called, however, upon all holders of the yellow bonds not merely to exchange into the green bonds but to prove their right to exchange the same by proving where the original bonds were held and by whom previous to December 27, 1917.

Therefore, the position would seem to be that an innocent holder who may have bought bonds of this particular series in good faith, but is obviously unable to furnish the necessary information, is in the position of holding what, unless the Chinese Government takes a different view of the matter, is a worthless piece of paper. The position is, of course, admittedly a difficult one, but assuming the Chinese Government to have received value originally for the bonds, it would certainly seem, in the interests of China as well as of the bondholders, that anything even bearing the resemblance of repudiation should be avoided.

It would appear that the holders of the bonds are having their property taken from them in order to make good the loss caused to the holders of scrip by the action of the Soviet Government in taking possession of the bonds held against the scrip. It is a question whether, first of all, this loss should not fall upon the scrip holders, and, secondly, whether it should not be borne by the Russo-Asiatic Bank, who, by having signed the scrip, rendered themselves responsible for the safe custody of the bonds. And, thirdly, whether the Chinese Government should, by taking the action they did in repudiating the old bonds and substituting new ones, and making good the loss of the bonds taken by the Soviets, be held responsible for the consequences of this action, which consequences might involve recognition, not only of the orignal holders of the bonds bought for value, but also of the scrip holders.

It may also be pointed out that in all probability, in consequence of the disturbances in Russia and the action of the Soviets, or other authorities, in seizing the contents of the banks, many of the bonds may have been destroyed, or may be in the possession of Soviets, or other authorities, who, not having received them for value, may be held not able (now that the Chinese Government has taken action) to give a good title. It has also been discovered that, in the case of many of the bonds, the exchange of which into green bonds has been refused, coupons have been paid prior to December 27, 1917.

His Majesty's Government, in conjunction with the Government of the United States, is pressing the Chinese Government to recognize the yellow bonds held by their nationals, and is inviting the Chinese Government, in case it cannot see its way to agree to this, to submit the matter to the Tribunal of The Hague.

ARMED ROBBER AND STREET UNION

July 28.

THE remarks of the Acting Commissioner of Police on armed robberies, their cause and cure, in the last issue of the Municipal Gazette encourages us to refer once more to this subject. It was on July 8 that Major Hilton-Johnson met the representatives of the Street Unions in conference on the best methods of dealing with a crime that has become a serious menace to the Settlement. Bismarck is reported to have said that London would be a magnificent city to loot. Doubtless, numbers of members of the robber profession, who have made successful hauls in the interior, come to Shanghai to recruit their energies and rest their tired nerves after a long spell of hard work in which they played alternately the rôles of hunters and hunted. On these occasions they probably enjoy the amenities of our city, and admire its many admirable features, with its facilities for pleasure and recreation. But the business man sees Shanghai as a place for doing business in, the sailor as a harbour in which to dock his ship. Every visitor sees those characteristics in which he himself is particularly interested and our friends of the armed robber persuasion see us, first and foremost, as "a magnificent city to loot." Imagination pictures the chief of a robber gang sauntering down the Bund, gazing longingly at the towering bank buildings in which are stored, as he believes, illimitable wealth. The shops with their jewellery, their silks and satins and the numbers of portly gentlemen and fair ladies who, if carried off and held to ransom, would prove very remunerative "cash tickets." All these things must be very tempting to a bold buccaneer even when on pleasure he is bent and, when the possibilities of the situation are envisaged, it must be admitted that a successful raid could be carried out, given the determined leader, the necessary equipment and a grain of luck. It was therefore no merely imaginary peril that Major Hilton Johnson called on the people's representatives to face. Our Luchowfu correspondent told us how thousands of the inhabitants of that city deserted their homes at the mere rumour of the approach of the robbers, numbering only a few hundred men, who had captured Liuan, sixty miles away. Truly, a wealthy city whose inhabitants are sheep must be a terrible temptation to Robin Hood and his merry men.

We were particularly struck with the suggestions made by the Canton Road Street Union. The men who compose that body are, we presume, elected in some fashion by the people of their district. They hold meetings to discuss "sovereign rights" and other important matters and send telegrams broadcast to high military and civil officials urging certain actions which appear to them to be desirable. What plan did these representative men suggest for dealing with the robber menace in the Settlement? They thought that the Council should take a census of all unemployed persons and erect factories in order to give them work. Could anything be more inept and childish? Where is the money to come from? The obsession in the mind of these men was that the Municipal Council had at its disposal an unlimited fund; a lucky bag, into which it need only dip its hand to provide the tens of millions of taels needed to build "factories" to give work to all and sundry who, unless provided with easy and remunerative employment at the public expense, would join the ranks of the armed robbers. But suppose it possible to get over the initial difficulty of finding capital for the factories, what are they going to manufacture once we have them built? Shall they be cotton mills or silk filatures? And what will the people say who have already put their money into enterprises of this kind if we propose to establish semi-philanthropic institutions which will compete with them in the open market? Finally, we doubt whether the material of which the robber bands are composed could be turned into capable workmen by any process which did not involve compulsion. We fear the "factories" would not run a week before the converts to industrialism would "down tools," reach for their automatics and take to the road once more. We certainly do believe in the root principle of the scheme, though. The country needs roads to be built, canals digged, irrigation works made and rivers straightened and confined between their banks. These are remunerative schemes that will not encroach on the individual rights of others, but they cannot be carried out by a Municipal Council, however willing. They are national works and the armies of derelicts who might be employed on their construction would have to be placed under military discipline like a Labour Corps. It would be for China's everlasting good to be so disciplined but, as the Irish vagrant said, "This is a free country and a man can go barefoot in it if he wants to."

Meanwhile, until the Street Unions produce some more practical idea, there is no use in conferences. Major Hilton-Johnson asked for information about the whereabouts of desperadoes and to use their influence in getting the "cat" made available in the Mixed Court. There is little doubt that the average Chinese resident is continually in possession of information about armed robbers which would be invaluable to the police. Yet how very, very seldom is it ever given. As for the "cat," now employed against crimes of violence and white slavery in many highly civilized countries, the only response to Major Hilton-Johnson's representations is that corporal punishment is contrary to the principles of democratic Government. Yet it is notorious that the bamboo is used in every yamên in China. It is this hopeless attitude of make-believe and refusal to face facts which makes one almost weep. The Street Unions have been given a magnificent chance of actually co-operating in the Government of Shanghai for ends of the utmost utility and importance. They appear utterly incapable of rising to the occasion. If this is all they can do in a matter so urgently important to public welfare, how can they expect to be listened to when they speak on other topics?

THE CASE OF MR. SCHERER

July 29.

ALTHOUGH we have already twice referred to the case of Mr. Scherer at Mukden, who was sentenced to seven years imprisonment with hard labour on a charge of causing the death of a Chinese school boy, our readers will, we hope, forgive our returning to it. The case is undoubtedly one of great importance, certainly for the unfortunate Mr. Scherer, for all foreigners, and for the Chinese, whose chances of getting extraterritorial rights abolished are by no means improved by incidents of this kind. We have received further details from an independent source, which not only confirm the first impression that there has been a grave miscarriage of justice, but also indicate that there was a good deal of propaganda by northern Chinese newspapers which must be corrected. For example, the "North China Star" stated, on the authority of some message from Peking, that the Ministry of Justice has received the report that the foreigners in Manchuria seem to be well satisfied on the whole with the working of the Manchurian courts .....the District Court at Mukden conducted the entire trial (of Scherer) in the open and to the obvious satisfaction of all the foreign residents in the city, who were interested to see how a foreign national, deprived of the consular jurisdiction, would be treated in a Chinese court.

In passing, we can see no possible reason why the Mukden Court should not have "conducted the entire trial in public": the suggestion of the quoted statement that the Court acquired merit by doing so is absurd. But the mischievous statement is that foreigners in Mukden (though it is admitted that they thought the verdict too severe) were well satisfied with the working of the Court. They certainly were not and we do not see how they could have been.

To recall the case in broad outline, Mr. Scherer, who has been an employee of the Mukden arsenal for some time and speaks Chinese fluently, lost his temper with a small boy who called insulting names after him, jumped out of his ricsha and ran after the boy with the intention of hitting him with the stick he carried. There is no trustworthy evidence that Mr. Scherer ever actually touched the boy. The latter fell into a ditch in his flight and struck his head. This was on May 19 and on May 28 the boy died. We understand that Mr. Scherer maintains that, shortly after the boy was hurt, he paid the family $600, and we have not seen this statement denied; and his case is that the boy died of blood-poisoning due to the cut in his forehead having been washed with dirty water and rags. The coroner's report was against accused, who was sentenced as stated above.

So far from foreigners being satisfied with the conduct of the trial, one writer has not hesitated to describe it as a travesty of justice. In the first place no doctor was ever called to give evidence either at the inquest or at the trial, as having attended the child, although it is a fact that on the sixth day after his injury he was taken to the Japanese Red Cross Hospital by his relations, treated by a Japanese doctor and taken away again immediately. There was only one witness at the trial against Scherer, namely, an aunt of the deceased, who swore that she saw the assault. Scherer on the other hand declared that no one was present but his ricsha coolie and a waterman, who both corroborated this statement. Scherer, however, admitted under cross-examination that he had been informed by the German consular authorities that there was a witness for the prosecution. This statement is, of course, valueless unless the German Consul were called to prove it, which does not seem to have been done. But the Court immediately argued with great perspicuity that "as it was admitted that there was a witness and as the woman was the only one who had come forward as such, she must be the witness admitted by Scherer." The stick with which the assault is alleged to have been committed was never produced in court. But great emphasis was laid on a ruling in an ancient Chinese law book dating from about 1200 A. D., to the effect that anyone who has been assaulted by another and who subsequently dies within reasonable time, no matter for what cause, may justly claim to have been murdered by the person who committed the assault. This ruling, says our correspondent, appears to have been the principal basis on which the unfortunate Mr. Scherer is to be sent to prison with hard labour for seven years, unless a new trial can be obtained. It may be added that Mr. Scherer has the reputation of being a humane man, kind to children, and that the occasion when he ran after the boy was by no means the first on which the latter had insulted him.

It has been suggested that German merchants, if not officials, are to blame for trying to curry favour with the Chinese and to get business by too openly declaring that they are quite satisfied to come under Chinese law, as it is from China that they get their bread. But this has nothing whatever to do with the case. Whether true or not, the Germans could not help themselves. The treaties with Chile in 1915 and with Switzerland in 1918 are the last that contain extraterritorial rights and it is unlikely that these will ever be granted again. But the fact that China has got jurisdiction over Germans, Austrians and Russians, and is most anxious to get it over others still outside her courts, should make her doubly careful how her judges proceed towards foreigners who come before them. She is on her trial in such instances at least as much as they. The facts as related above in Mr. Scherer's case have reached us from a source we believe to be absolutely trustworthy; and if, as we are sure they may be, those facts can be believed, they set up an irresistible case for a new trial. Incidentally, Marshal Chang Tso-lin is undoubtedly anxious to govern, and does in many ways that contrast strongly with other parts of China govern Manchuria well. Will he be satisfied that the court in his own capital city of Mukden should remain under the slur of having allowed such a miscarriage of justice?

EMIGRATION OF SKILLED LABOUR

July 29.

TRADES-UNIONISM in Great Britain is a power which has come to stay and increase, and there is no reason why the trades unions, if wisely guided and directed and working in a spirit of understanding with the employers—which is the ideal of trades-unionism and not the antithesis as some of the extremists would have us believe—should not permanently constitute a means of co-operative protection so far as the workers themselves are concerned, and a channel of mutual confidence and assistance between employer and man. Although it cannot be denied that there is an unreasonable and unreasoning extremist element in some of the trades unions at Home, it is equally certain that the majority of our present-day trades-union leaders take a serious view of their positions and their responsibilities, not only to those they directly represent, but also to the community generally. Such a one would appear to be Mr. F. E. Watts who, in his recent presidential address to the National Foremen's Association, made a thoughtful and serious reference to the matter of the emigration of skilled workers to America, South Africa and Australia. Mr. Watts went so far as to say that if the country knew, and if the higher management of the engineering firms fully realized, what this emigration of highly skilled mechanics meant, the present uneasiness as to the future would be intensified. He very appositely remarked that the very qualities of initiative and enterprise which marked these men from their fellows were the urging forces which sent them overseas, and asserted that the standard and quality of general engineering work done in Great Britain would suffer in consequence.

While it is much to be regretted that some of Britain's best craftsmen are leaving the country, the situation would not seem to be so gloomy as Mr. Watts would appear to imagine. Skilled workers have been emigrating from Great Britain for more than forty years, but others, equally skilled, have always arisen to take their places. It is natural evolution brought about by the apprenticeship system at Home, and there is no reason to believe that the present-day apprentice is any less intelligent or less adaptable than his predecessors who are now leaving in large numbers for abroad—the British colonies themselves taking a large proportion. As a matter of fact, the present emigration may prove to be something of an advantage. Many of the men who have gone and are going abroad were specially skilled in armament work, which will never again reach its former dimensions (at least so we hope), and for the performance of which there are ample trained men left behind in the United Kingdom. Since the armistice thousands of apprentices have been trained in British industrial works, and when economic conditions improve and there is full scope for them all to be employed, it is extremely improbable that they will fail to justify their training or to uphold the reputation of the British mechanic for quality and reliability.

THE JESSFIELD ZOO

July 30.

SEVERAL years ago the present writer concocted an article in favour of putting a "zoo" in Jessfield Park, then not long acquired by the Council from the late Mr. Jenner Hogg and still regarded by quite a number of people as too far out to be ever useful as a popular resort. He even made an alleged joke on the obvious usefulness of the proximity of a well known semi-missionary establishment as a means of providing the cassowaries with their conventional food and he enlarged appropriately or inappropriately on the educational benefits of zoological gardens for the young. As to the latter, he has since developed misgivings. Nature study strikes one rather like Latin verses, which those who can write need no teaching and those who cannot will never learn to write. The boy or girl with a wild-beast-y instinct will gratify it in one way or another; while those without it would never really develop it even if they passed half their time in a zoo. They are like the lady who remarked that "she liked flowers: she always thought that flowers were such pretty things." They are conscious that, let us say, a caracal is more charming than a cayman; but five minutes after leaving the zoo they have forgotten which is which. The other boy wants a specimen of each to go to bed with him.

These rather personal reflexions, it is hoped the kind reader will forgive, as a preliminary to a confession: that whatever the writer said in favour of a zoo before there was one at Jessfield, he now most heartily repents and recants. This humble frame of mind is brought about partly by Mr. Sowerby's appealing letter in yesterday's paper, partly by observation. Mr. Sowerby says that the monkeys appear happy enough, perhaps because they were mostly born in captivity. Well, that is an improvement on what was recorded a year or two ago by one lady who commented strongly on the unsuitability, or at any rate the monotony of the monkeys' food, the want of anything for them to play with, and their generally bored and melancholy mien. But what about the rabbits of which Mr. Sowerby writes:—

> There are at least five times more animals in the enclosure they occupy than is consistent with their well-being. The result is that the whole colony is a mangy-looking skinny bunch of ragamuffins. Rabbits like lots of green grass to feed on and run on. These poor creatures have nothing but a bare brown bank to burrow in.

This is no exaggeration. The other day some children were seen picking handfuls of grass for the rabbits, which literally fought for it. Rabbits are not indigenous to China, we believe, and, with the example of Australia, one would not advocate turning loose creatures which multiply so rapidly. But if it is necessary to keep rabbits for educational purposes, why not enable those purposes to radiate in an ever widening circle by giving away the surplus offspring or the unnecessary parent and let the remainder live in comfort? As for the raccoon-dog "with his aristocratic title" and "his three sound legs and one gamey one," > forced to trot and trot and trot round his little paddock, looking longingly out into the open spaces from which he is barred,

—surely there is only one thing to do with such a beast, and that is to send him back where he belongs and turn him loose. There are creatures which appear to live happily enough in a cage. The smaller monkeys in the Zoological Gardens in London are a merry-looking crowd, though one feels sad for the large apes. But assuredly raccoon-dogs and wolves and the big birds of prey can never be more than life-long captives, as wretched as those words suggest.

Mr. Sowerby thinks that the cages "might be judiciously scattered throughout the Park, and no animal that could not be adequately caged according to his life habits and natural environment should be kept." But the sequel shows that he fears expense will bar the way. We would go farther and urge that the whole zoo be given up. What, after all, is really the value educational or otherwise of keeping animals in cages? If it is their natural habits we wish to study, we may be sure we shall get little chance of seeing those in captivity. If it is only the appearance of the beasts, there are not only innumerable books splendidly illustrated, but the cinematograph now takes us straight to the haunts of the beasts even in the very heart of Africa. Nothing could exceed the interest of the wild animal pictures which we had in Shanghai a year ago, when we saw them as they are in their natural state. But however much we may try to gild the cage with artificial rocks and hidden barriers, we can never make it less than a prison; we can never give to a wild beast as much space as Nature meant him to have; he can never be aught but a convict for whom there is no ticket of leave. Better a thousand times that he run the risk of being killed off in his natural state than be forced to drag out a weary life through cruel kindness.

ROADS AND WATER-WAYS

July 31.

It is interesting to see that Field-Marshal Wu Pei-fu is arranging to use his spare troops for the construction of roads, principally a grand trunk from Loyang to Chêngtu by way of Ichang and Chungking. Different districts are assigned to different generals, and they certainly do not lack troops for the work. We wish the project better luck than the last one for opening land communication between Ichang and Chungking. That was the famous Szechuan railways scheme of 1910-11—a counterblast to the old Four Power central China railway proposals—on which something like $15,000,000 principally raised by forced contributions from the merchants, was frittered away with nothing to show for it but some six or seven miles of very badly laid track and a few cars. Among the items of expenditure disclosed when all the money was gone, we remember an amount of over $200,000 for "student expenses." It was a gorgeous fiasco. Of course the country from Ichang to Chungking presents difficulties which it would need the most expert railway engineers to overcome. Since the advent of steamers in the Gorges, of which we do not think there was one actually plying in 1910—though the late Mr. Archibald Little had built the old Kinsha for the purpose several years earlier, and the Shutung must have come very soon after—less has been said of the possibilities of a railway from Chungking to Ichang. An ordinary road, however, should be fairly practicable. Meanwhile, it appears that Marshal Wu sticks strongly to his argument that the remitted Boxer indemnity should be used for railway-building. Canton naturally opposes him: "Chinese education is hanging on a thread and is almost on the point of extinction," says a Kuomintang manifesto. To which the obvious answer is that if Chinese revenues were properly used and not misappropriated by the bureaucrats and squandered on futile civil wars there would be ample money for education. There appears no reason why the indemnity money should not build railways and the railways provide money for schools. The disposal of the British Boxer indemnity is now in the hands of an advisory committee, but discretion is given to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs as to its ultimate use. One hopes that Marshal Wu will stick to his advocacy and that the Secretary of State will give it fair consideration.

More than one military man is building roads at present. General Lu Yung-hsiang projected a great trunk road all through Chêkiang from Hangchow to the Fukien border and, using his soldiers for the work, had done a good deal, we believe, when the threat of invasion compelled him to take off the soldiers to guard his frontiers. In the north of this province, General Bei Bao-san is said to have made quite an extensive network of excellent roads, largely with a view to facilitating the operations against robbers. And we must not forget the Good Roads Movement, which, no doubt, means well. Assuredly all this road-making is not to be undervalued. But one would ask to be allowed to voice a strong wish that China will not forget the roads she already has and will do something for them. By roads, we mean waterways. It is a commonplace that China is the best watered country in the world and, it must be added, the most reckless and careless of her heritage. In addition to the great rivers that all the world knows—the Yellow, the Yangtze and the triple streams that find the sea through the Canton delta—are other rivers bigger than any but the very biggest in Europe; and these again are connected and interlaced by creeks so wide and long that the thickest black line would be needed, if they existed on a map of England, to give their true proportion. Were all these watercourses kept in proper condition, they would provide for the movement of cargo as efficaciously and quickly as China is likely to need it moved for many years to come. To say this, is in no sense whatever to argue against railways. They and the canals should mutually assist each other, as is done most notably, perhaps, in France and Germany. But it must be a work of many years and millions of money to provide China with all the railways she wants and meanwhile she actually has the rivers and canals which, with an expenditure that would be comparatively little felt—for every village could be made to supply a certain amount of labour for the dredging and bunding in the time-honoured Chinese way—might serve her ten times as well as they do at present.

While we are speaking of waterways, may we put in a word for early attention to the Soochow Creek? The Whangpoo Conservancy's offer to dredge it for nothing has, as everybody knows, been rejected and we have been told that the Chinese authorities along the creek see their way to raising money for the work, partly by voluntary contributions. Also in yesterday's paper, quoted from the Chinese press, was a statement that the Anhui Rice Association were about to subscribe $10,000, levying a tax therefor on their rice boats. Meanwhile, valuable time is slipping away and there is no sign of anything being done. When November comes round, the time when water is lowest, we are assured by people whose opinion may be taken, that the shallowness of the creek and consequent congestion of traffic is likely far to exceed anything seen last year. The prospects for the mills along the creek and for the Shanghai districts food supply are really most serious, and no one will be more affected than the Chinese themselves. If, as they assure us, the authorities have, or can get, the requisite money, they are most earnestly to be urged to set to on the dredging before the summer is any older.

ON "EXTRALITY"

Aug. 1.

It is hard to convince some idealists that, human nature being what it is, all national progress if it is to be enduring must necessarily be slow. It is a mistake to think a nation can change its ways of thinking, its customs and manners, and clothe itself with the civilization of another country as easily as a man changes his garments. Particularly is this true of law and its administration. At the present time the laws and system of legal procedure of China are being revised so as to bring them into greater harmony with those of other countries. But it is vain to expect that the great mass of the Chinese people, accustomed to primitive laws and punishments primarily enacted to maintain authority rather than to ensure justice between man and man, will be able without a long period of gradual education and general enlightenment, to understand and observe new laws derived from the West, which are based on abstract principles of justice and the progressive experience of centuries of Western civilization. As Mr. David Landale said recently at the annual meeting of the China Association in London, "if China wishes to modify her present international status, her first duty is to put her house in order and then undergo a long course of preparation not merely in remodelling her legislation, but also in training officials who can be trusted to have it honestly enforced." The latter task alone is most difficult and will take a very long time to accomplish, unless there is a sudden and astonishing change of heart and moral reformation among the official classes. But unpractical political idealists wish to thrust legal reforms suddenly on a people which is not ready for them, and to entrust power over foreigners to officials who care far more for personal gain than for law and justice.

Various articles on this subject, more or less idealistic, have appeared in the "Chinese Recorder," which usually advocates the abolition of extraterritoriality—a word which the editor and some of the contributors so detest that they have shortened it to the graceful form, "extrality," an extraordinary (or shall we say "extranary"?) proceeding. It is therefore most refreshing to come across an article in the July issue, which takes the other side. It is written by an experienced missionary who knows the Chinese well, admires them for their good qualities, but has no illusions concerning recent political changes. Indeed, after many years of visitation of Chinese prisons he has come to the serious conclusion that there are more innocent men in Chinese prisons to-day than there used to be in Manchu days, and that, in the matter of torture, while there has been some improvement, it still exists and there is need of further improvement. He opposes the abolition of extraterritoriality on three grounds: (1) the abandonment of it at present would inflict a wrong on those who now possess the privilege; (2) the retention of extraterritoriality for the time being is no wrong to China as a republic or to any individual Chinese; (3) the retention of extraterritoriality is the best lever there is at present for raising the Chinese people to a higher level; its abandonment is more likely than any other movement to confirm the Chinese on their present level. He contends that "extraterritoriality is concerned only with a man's status in matters of law and legal administration. It is intended to mark the country on which it is imposed as one which has not attained to the standard of jurisprudence which the country imposing it has established. It is not so much an infringement of "sovereign rights" as a denial that the country on which it is imposed possesses a particular sovereign right which is attached to a just law and a just administration (the two clauses must both be used.)"

Probably most of our readers will agree with this argument. It seems strange that moral reformers, influenced by war-time propaganda, should apparently lay such slight weight on the moral power and educational value of laws administered with equity, justice and mercy. A foreign missionary was asked to settle a dispute between Chinese Christians. He had lived long and intimately with the Chinese which was not without its effect upon his own character. He proceeded to settle the affair in Chinese fashion by compromise and "saving the face" of all concerned. But the Chinese protested, saying they could easily settle the matter in this way themselves; what they wanted was the strict impartial justice of the foreigner. So they went to another foreigner. The Chinese may not admire foreigners for the manner, somewhat lacking in repose, with which they meet the provocations and mishaps of daily life; but in their hearts they do admire them for their justice, their fair-play, their respect for law and order. Why should such a moral lever as extraterritoriality with its moral and legal object lessons to the Chinese be prematurely surrendered? The concluding words of the "Recorder" article are those of a true and wise friend of China: "To abolish extraterritoriality now would be to pull us down to the Chinese level. Would that my Chinese brethren would raise the cry, 'Abolish extraterritoriality, but never till we have just laws and a just administration.'"

THE FLOOD DRAGON

Aug 2.

Floods in China are caused by a Dragon. This is one of the things that everybody knows. The Dragon hibernates during the winter; his long body spread under the earth and the veins under his scales are the currents of fengshui which it is deadly to disturb. But the Dragon was the symbol of monarchy in the old days and the Dragon flag was to the Chinese soldier as sacred as the Roman Eagle to Caesar's legions. Is there some occult connexion between the dethroned Dragon and the misfortunes of the Republic? Dragons are an ancient as well as a royal race and, presumably, view the phenomenon of a mushroom Republic with badly concealed antipathy. However that may be, it is certain that in recent years China has been afflicted by floods to an abnormal extent. Our correspondents tell us that all central Hunan—in the days of the monarchy one of China's richest provinces and, in times of famine, a granary of rice for the rest of the Empire—is one vast lake. In Hankow the water mark has reached 48 ft., the highest point for thirty-five years. Kiukiang is under water and travellers to Kuling sail part of the way by sampan and in their progress pass over bridges which in normal times they sail under. Tientsin is threatened by flood and the people there are clamouring for the authorities to adopt the desperate remedy of cutting the dykes which would mean flooding the fields of many small farmers to preserve the great city from disaster. High officials are proving their patriotism by heading subscription lists with thousands of taels which they, doubtless, can ill spare and there is talk of a tax to be levied on various commodities to provide funds for famine relief.

In the old days there was a Taotai in charge of the Yellow River and he was considered unfortunate if a breach in the banks did not occur during his tenure of office. In that case he retired to his home when his term was fulfilled a poor, but honest, man. If, through calamity sent down from heaven, the bank gave way, then large sums were remitted from the Imperial treasury, contractors were hired, coolies were pressed into the service and the Taotai wore himself out in heroic efforts to undo the damage caused by nature's ravages. Such patriotic services did not fail of reward and it was noticed that, while the district over which he ruled was appreciably the poorer on account of the catastrophe, the Taotai himself retired, when his work was done, in fairly affluent circumstances. Thus was demonstrated the truth of the well known proverb, "Good has a good reward and evil an evil reward." The Taotai had been doing good in striving to build up the banks destroyed by the unruly Dragon and, naturally, the good reward followed. These were the bad old days. We now live in an enlightened age when such actions are discouraged. But there are those who whisper that an excuse for the imposition of a surtax, the proceeds of which can be known only to the tax-gatherer, is not viewed with serious disfavour by some of the successors of the unenlightened Taotais of days that are gone. It may, indeed, be that the sudden blaze of zeal on the part of the Chapei authorities for imposing licences on cafés and restaurants outside Settlement limits is meant as a measure of famine relief. In that case those who will pay more for their refreshment in days to come will have the satisfaction of knowing that they are making a contribution to the welfare of the land we live in and may look on the extra charge with equanimity if not with pleasure.

But we must be fair even to the Dragon. Possibly he is, after all, the benevolent beast that Chinese legends always depict him. It is just possible that the floods that are causing such widespread misery are not at all due to any choler on the Dragon's part. Rivers have a habit of silting up in the course of hundreds of years. They carry, we do not know how many million cubic feet of silt down to the sea, annually, and the silt, very inconsiderately, precipitates itself right in the channel at the river's mouth. The consequence is that the outlet is blocked, the waters are dammed back, and floods follow as a matter of course. The silting up of a river is a slow and relentless process and it is the bad fortune of our generation that it seems to have come to a head now. It is also the bad fortune of those who are governing the Republic that this should have happened just at a time when they wanted nothing but to be left alone to put in the few years of office which are a necessary preliminary to retiring on a modest competency to enjoy the fruits of a strenuous life spent in their country's service. But such is the situation. Floods widespread over the land; vast quantities of grain destroyed; multitudes of people ruined and the treasury empty. To grapple successfully with the problem one would need to be an expert at making bricks without straw and Chinese rulers are not good at making bricks even when straw is plentiful.

THE Moscow Government proposes to change the name of Sunday into Lenin-day and to replace all the names of days in the week by prominent Communistic names.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

Smuggled Arms

The answer to the letter published to-day in our correspondence column from the Messageries Maritimes with regard to the recent seizure of arms and ammunitions on board their ships, is that we shall give exactly the same pulicity, and have done so in the past, to any other ship on which similar discoveries are made. It ought to be unnecessary to say that we are in no way actuated by animus against any particular line. The matter is far too important for anything but the fullest publicity to be given. No one fails to appreciate the assistance given by the authorities of the Messageries Maritimes to the River police in their searches, but the trouble does not lie here. It lies at the port where the weapons were put on board. It may be at Marseilles, at Kobe, at San Francisco, at Hamburg, we cannot tell where. But the strictness or otherwise of regulations governing the ordinary purchase of pistols and ammunition must have a big influence in the matter. What these regulations may be in other countries we do not know, but in Great Britain it is a matter of extreme difficulty to purchase a revolver or other pistol; the gunsmith will not sell it without being sure that his customer has a licence to carry weapons, and that licence has to be obtained from the police who do not issue it without being absolutely satisfied as to its being justifiable. The responsibility in Shanghai remains always the same: that responsibility consists in getting far more drastic punishments inflicted on arms smugglers than are actually available. But at the same time we are justified, by the very large consignments of smuggled arms and ammunition which are undoubtedly finding their way into Shanghai, in thinking that inadequate means are taken at the other end, in whatever port it may be, to prevent the consignments from going on board. Nobody can be more interested than the shipping companies in seeing that preventive measures at Home are tightened up, as it is naturally most displeasing to them to have the names of their ships continually dragged into publicity as having been found with smuggled arms on board.

Under the Red Robe

We commend to the attention of "Shanghailander," the sane and temperate interview with a "Lover of Russia" which appears in another column of this issue. While the proscriptions of the earlier years of Red rule have apparently subsided, it does not appear that Russia is a very safe place to live in for those associated with White sympathies, nor very comfortable for anybody. Furthermore, it seems clear from many sources that the situation is as a "Lover of Russia" describes it, namely that Bolshevism is a government by a tiny minority, who were clever enough to push themselves to the top in abnormal times of revolution and keep themselves there by ruthlessness. Why the Russian people have endured them so long is one of the mysteries of Russian nature. But it does not follow that other peoples need be so subservient. A few Powers have recognized the Soviet government, but there has come no satisfaction from doing so. British and Russian delegates have been sitting in conference for weeks and the silence surrounding their doings and the evasive replies made to questions thereon in the House show how little has been done. Italy has recognized the Soviet, and if she had got anything by doing so we should certainly have been told by Signor Mussolini's well-trained Press Bureau. China has recognized the Soviet and got nothing but bullying, harassing and rudeness ever since. Whether "Shanghailander" really loves his brother Bolshevik as much as his letter suggests or whether, like the baby in "Alice in Wonderland,"

> He only does it to annoy
> Because he knows it teases—

we do not know. But we see little prospect of material advantage in having any dealings with the mad dogs of moscow and certainly no credit.

Letters to the Editor

Contributors to our correspondence columns certainly deserve our gratitude for the diversity and quantity of good reading material they provide us with, especially in times when the grasshopper becomes a burden and it is very, very difficult to find interesting news. (Some day, perhaps, a psychologist will trace the connexion between Parliament being "up" and the diminution in crime: We do not pretend to explain it, we merely note the fact.) But there is one more kindness that writers of "letters to the editor" might do us, and that is to leave more space between the lines when they type. The other day we received a long letter typed with an old machine which blotted all the o's and e's, typed single spacing and full of corrections and interlinings by pen only just possible to make out. Of course such a letter is usually retyped, but there is not always time for that. To read such typescript is bad for a foreigner; for a Chinese who has to set it up, it means about twice as long over the job as it should. Some of our outport correspondents might kindly take heed of this note. Single-space typing is hard to read and almost impossible to edit.

Better Than Langkats

Memories of three great men—Palmerston, Disraeli and de Lesseps—must have been recalled in the House of Commons on June 19 when, in reply to a question by Sir John Marriott, who sought information regarding the value of the Britsh Government's holdings of Suez Canal shares, and what return the latest dividend represented on the original purchase price, Mr. Snowden stated that the estimated value of the shares on June 10 was £25,672,951; that the sterling value of the interest and dividends for the year ended March 31 last was £878,202, and that this represented a return of 21¾ per cent. on the orignal purchase price. Those who have not forgotten all their history may remember that the original scheme for the construction of the Canal was strongly opposed by Palmerston who, probably the greatest imperialist that Britain ever had, was apprehensive that the presence of a powerful French organization in Egypt would involve Britain in grave political troubles and possibly would result in a war with France. With these considerations solely in mind, he apparently lost sight of the strategical importance and huge commercial significance of the project. This, however, proved to be one of the few matters in which Palmerston was overruled, as, although he was openly hostile, the scheme was approved by an international commission and the work started in 1860. De Lesseps' masterpiece cost originally about £20,000,000, another £4,000,000 being spent on it in the years 1886-9. In the early 'seventies Disraeli realized the great future of the Canal, and it was on his advice and urging that in 1875 the British Government paid to the Khedive of Egypt the sum of £4,000,000 for his holding of 176,602 shares. Disraeli did many great things for the Empire, but none of greater service than this, whether viewed economically or commercially.

Chinese Lotteries

The time should arrive soon when the word "Gilbertian" as illustrative of something supremely whimsical will pass out of use, to be supplanted by "Chinese," for the most amazing things happen in this strange country. It is curious, too, that the Chinese, who, when he has money is a royal spender, even to the point of such reckless extravagance as to suggest that he has no knowledge of its value, passes the whole of his life in a tremendous struggle to make money, and most of the particularly ridiculous happenings centre round the money-making issue. We quote from a Government publication, the "Chinese Economic Monthly":—

> Kiangsu officials are levying a duty on lottery tickets. Arrangements have been made with the companies issuing lottery tickets for a payment of a yearly royalty of $250,000 to the Kiangsu authorities, who will also establish a special office in Shanghai to collect stamp duty. Ten cents has to be paid on each ticket issued. It is estimated that several thousand dollars a month will be realized from this source in addition to the yearly royalty.

All gambling is by the strict letter of the law illegal in China and in no place has a more strenuous endeavour been made to suppress it than in Shanghai. It is a matter of local history that a "wheel" was run for several years in North Honan Road, in Chinese territory. Periodically, Chinese police were marched in and closed the place, but always it was reopened, until a wonderful gambling palace was erected to replace it and that the Defence Commissioner absolutely refused to allow to open. Yet it is fairly common knowledge that another "wheel" recently has been started at Minghong, also by foreigners, and the story runs that it remains in practice because it is backed by a high Chinese official who has been taking a leading part in the suppression of gambling! Now we go a step farther and find that lottery gambling in this province actually is to receive official sanction and the authorities will open a special office in Shanghai—presumably the Native City—for the collection of their squeeze. Our police have had trouble sufficient in trying to prevent the public sale of lottery tickets in the Settlement, but now, of course, where there was one saiesman before there will be ten, for the percentage will have to be made up and with money coming in the authorities will not worry if there are fifty lotteries a day.

"Calling the Police"

With reference to complaints of dilatoriness on the part of police in the French Concession, it may be fair to remember that mistakes will occur in the best regulated families. No public organization is immune from slips such as those mentioned by our correspondent, and very properly brought to the notice of the authorities, we may hope with satisfactory results so far as the complainant is concerned and the public generally. At the same time, we should not allow criticism to outweigh the great amount of excellent work the police are doing, and particularly at the present time when their duties are carried out in circumstances of some danger. It may be pointed out that residents in the French Concession who may have occasion to summon the police will facilitate matters and ensure proper attention by telephoning to the Intelligence Department (Central 6675), where there is a foreigner on duty day and night, and with a motor car at his disposal, and this should be done in preference to ringing up the nearest Poste. This latter course, we understand, was taken in the Père Robert case mentioned by our correspondent, and some confusion occurred. Upon inquiry being made next day, two officers were found to have been at fault and were punished.

Finger Prints by Cable

Tuesday's telegram from New York announcing a successful experiment in the telegraphic transmission of finger prints left the reader in some doubt as to whether or not there was actual photographic transmission. We know that pictures have been transmitted in this way, and the presumption is that the police have made use of this wonderful invention. On the other hand, it is possible that some means other than pictorial telegraphy was used; and, if this were so, it may be pointed out that four years ago a system of sending finger prints by cable was introduced at New Scotland Yard, London. "A telegraphic code for finger print formulæ" was invented by Mr. Charles Stockley Collins, for many years in charge of the Yard's finger print bureau, and it has been used with success. Without attempting any description of this highly technical "formulæ," it may be stated that code letters and numbers are provided for all finger print characteristics, and the message is decoded by placing a finger print of the individual concerned under a specially constructed reading glass, marked with a number of fine parallel lines which define special areas of the print to be examined. A typical finger print code reads:

D7D12D19C8C9E9G6ES8L.

The expert decoding this message would know that "D7" indicated "Right thumb: Ulnar loop with 7 counts; D12, Right fore finger: Ulnar loop with 12 counts," and so on; and he would examine the finger print of the man under arrest to see if its markings were similar. It has been recognized of course that identification by this method can never be relied upon absolutely, and must be subject to subsequent confirmation by comparison of the actual finger impressions. But with finger prints strongly individualized as they are, this ingenious system makes identification or otherwise tolerably certain.

The Cassowary's Taste

A distinguished correspondent takes us to task for a phrase used in our leading article on the Jessfield "zoo" in connexion with the cassowary's well known preference in food. He writes:—

> If you mean St. John's University by "semi-missionary institution" in your editorial of this morning, it is a very unfortunate slip even in this hot weather. There is nothing "semi" here either in education or religion.

We do not print the writer's name, because we are not sure whether he is really annoyed by the phrase or whether his letter is meant for "a goak." If the former, we can only express our regrets. Surely the meaning of the phrase is clear. Jessfield University could not be called a missionary establishment in the ordinary sense, nor, we think, does it exclude students because they are non-Christians. On the other hand we believe it desires to make its students Christians, and to this extent is missionary. We trust that we have not misunderstood or misrepresented its position. Meanwhile, if the letter was meant as a joke, then another apology is due for the hot weather dullness that has not seen it.

Famine Surtax

A correspondent has raised a protest against the imposition of surtaxes on railway tickets, posts and telegraphs, as indicated from Peking. It is an extremely ungracious measure to object to any method which is designed to provide money for the unhappy victims of the flooded areas. But none the less we join strongly in the objection raised by our correspondent, for the very simple reason that there is absolutely no guarantee that the money thus raised would get anywhere near the famine areas and a great deal of natural suspicion that it would go into the pockets of the collectors. These surtaxes were first introduced, if we remember rightly, in the summer of 1922, for the same purpose as they are now suggested. No accounts of any kind were ever published as to the money collected or what it was used for. Furthermore, the collection continued to be levied for months and months after all reason for the collection had disappeared. Peking was continually called upon to produce accounts, which it never did, and it was only under the strongest pressure of public opinion that the imposition was eventually lifted. We suggest that that public opinion be exerted before and not after the levy is instituted. As regards the surtax on the Customs we do not suppose for a moment that merchants will object: in that case there is no difficulty in knowing what money is collected or how it is used. But surtaxes on railway tickets and so forth are simply a pretext for filling official pockets, against which the Chinese public should lose no time in protesting.

PEKING, July 27.—After reporting that the peace discussions at Chuanchow between Generals Shen Hung-ying and Lu Yung-ting, mediation, had reached a stage removing all danger of further conflict, General Ma Chi has asked the Government for permission to return to Hengchow, Hunan, and establish his headquarters there.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

AN account of another big arms deal appears in the Chinese press. A large consignment of arms and ammunition, reported to have been purchased by Marshal Wu Pei-fu from Germany and shipped to Shanghai by the O. S. K. S. Altai Maru (says the Chinese reporter) transhipped to Tientsin by the Choshu Maru which left port on Thursday. The consignment consisted of over 500 cases of arms, over 300 being for Wu Pei-fu and the balance "for another Militarist in the North."

NEWS FROM THE OUTPORTS

SPECIAL PROVISION FOR THE FLOOD DISASTER IN ALL PROVINCES

Chihli, Kiangsi, Hunan, Fukien and Kuangtung All Severely Hit: Tientsin's Fate Uncertain: International Commission's Projects

Peking, July 25.

The number of urgency appeals which the China International Famine Relief Commission has received from both Chinese and foreign sources indicates that the present flood emergency is of such proportions that early and decisive steps must be taken if adequate relief is to be provided and further loss of life averted.

In Chihli, Kiangsi, Hunan, Fukien and Kuangtung catastrophes have occurred, and it is not yet certain whether the city of Tientsin will be saved, while Hankow is under water in some sections.

At an emergency meeting of the Commission yesterday afternoon plans were made for a national relief campaign and appropriations made for emergency relief in Hunan and Kalgan.

The Commission, believing that public subscriptions will be inadequate to meet the situation, has adopted the following resolution, which is addressed to the Chinese Government and the Diplomatic Body in Peking:—

The Customs Invoked.

"The Commission, through whose constituent committees the previous Maritime Customs famine relief surtax was administered, views with grave apprehension the conditions in several provinces of China brought about by severe floods. To provide funds to relieve the extreme suffering which is an inevitable aftermath of such a calamity, it is organizing a national flood relief campaign, but it further feels that Government funds should be made available, as heretofore, if the emergency is to be met in a comprehensive way. To this end the Commission has resolved: (1) that the Chinese Government and the Diplomatic Body shall be approached with the proposal that a surtax be placed on the Maritime Customs to provide funds to meet this emergency; (2) that the proceeds of the surtax be paid into a fund under the custody of the Commission; (3) that the allocation of the fund shall be made by a joint committee on which the Cabinet, the Diplomatic Body and the Commission shall be equally represented; (4) that the actual administration of the relief be conducted by the Commission through its regular organization, thereby assuring international supervision of the funds; (5) that the established principles of labour relief which have been adopted by the Commission shall be followed; and (6) that as far as possible the funds shall be expended on a loan basis in order that those who shall be benefited will make a return, thereby establishing a revolving fund: in the interim between distress this fund to be devoted to enterprises such as river conservancy, irrigation and other purposes which would improve the economic status of the people and make future emergencies less likely or less severe."

A Revolving Fund

The provision that as far as possible the funds shall not be given away, but used on a loan basis will provide relief not only in this emergency, but establish a revolving fund which may be devoted to flood and famine prevention enterprises when the present emergency is past.

The Head Office of the Commission is in Peking. It has eight committees which are organized to cover 10 provinces.

In Peking, Shanghai, Hankow and Kaifeng offices are maintained and the personnel and the resources of the Commission are being mobilized to meet the distress which occurs as an aftermath of floods.

The officers of the Commission are: Mr. M. T. Liang, Chairman; Dr. G. D. Gray, Vice-Chairman; Admiral Tsai Ting-kan and Mr. J. E. Baker, Treasurers; Mr. W. H. Mallory, Executive Secretary; Mr. Y. S. Djang, Associate Executive Secretary; Dr. W. W. Yen, Bishop White, Mr. Tseng Wu-chi, the Rev. J. C. Harlow, Dr. S. H. Chuan, Mr. W. E. Southcott and Dr. E. L. Hall, members of the Executive Committee.

The above information is derived from the Commission.

The Old Imposition Once More.

A Cabinet meeting this morning resolved in favour of imposing for six months railway, telegraphs, postal and navigation surtaxes to aid sufferers from the floods, following the lines of the famine surtax of 1920. The question of the navigation surtax has been referred to the Shuiwuchu for consideration. It is understood that the Diplomatic Corps will be approached regarding a Customs surtax, which the Government also intends to impose.

Following instructions from President Tsao Kun for all high officials in Peking to contribute personally to flood relief, a special Chinese flood Relief Committee for the Metropolitan Area and certain other parts of Chihli province has been formed. Mr. Kao Ling-wei, Director of the Shuiwuchu, has been appointed Chairman of the Committee and Admiral Wu Yu-lin, Minister of Communications, Vice-Chairman. Messrs Chang Yao-kuei, President of the National Conservancy Bureau, Chang Ting-ao, Salt Commissioner at Hotung, and several other Government officials are members of the Committee.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking, July 28.

The Chinese press states that a conference of officials of the Ministry of Communications yesterday resolved to recommend flood surtaxes as follows:—

Railways.—Twenty cents on each first-class ticket, 20 cents on each second-class ticket and 5 cents on each third-class ticket, all regardless of distance, and also 5 per cent. on freight charges.

Posts.—Five per cent. on parcels charges and nothing on ordinary mail.

Telegraphs.—Twenty cents. on each telegram.

These surtaxes to be effective from August 15.

These recommendations will be submitted to the Cabinet to-morrow.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Peking, July 29.

A meeting of the Cabinet, at which Dr. Wellington Koo presided, this morning approved the Finance Ministry's proposal to exempt from taxation for a period of four months all articles of clothing, foodstuffs and shelter materials intended for the relief of the flood sufferers. The Cabinet decided to make this applicable to all the provinces.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Appalling Distress in Hunan: Sufferings of Kalgan

The China International Famine Relief Commission at a special meeting last week voted $5,000 for emergency relief at Kalgan. The U. S. Consul at that place will be invited to assist in organizing an international committee to supervise the relief. Grain is being shipped by the Commission from Peking due to the shortage of supplies in Kalgan.

Latest telegraphic advices from foreign sources in Hunan report 1,000,000 flood victims. Thirty per cent. of the entire provincial rice crop is estimated to be destroyed and since there is a total destruction of the crops in the flooded areas the suffering will be acute in areas along the river.

It is stated by the Hunan Branch of the China International Famine Relief Commission that the worst distress will occur within the next two months, but that in the worst places help will be needed by the population for a whole year. The Executive Committee of the Commission has voted an initial sum of $40,000 to be used on a loan basis for rehabilitating the population and providing seed rice. These loans will be repayable within one year.

Flood Conditions in Chihli.

Reports received on July 24 reveal that on the south side of the Yungtingho, Section 2, there were two breaks in the dyke with a combined width of 4,000 feet. Among the five affected villages, the following three suffered more seriously: Paohochuang, Niukiachuang, and Chukiakang. Over 2,000 people are taking refuge on the south dyke.

In Section 3, on the same side, a break of over 3,000 feet has occurred. Among the six inundated villages, Siakiachuang, Mankun, and Fotsun were more seriously affected. More than 200 villagers have flocked to the top of the dyke for safety. Relief is being given by the Peking Welfare Association.

At Paoti the suburbs were inflowed, causing a break of 289 feet through the dyke. More than 40 villages were flooded, and about 400 houses destroyed. Hundreds of people are exposed to the weather. The number of suffering families is about 5,000, at a low estimate. Only a little grain is in stock.

At Paoti the suburbs were inundated. Seven breaks were made through the different dykes.

Reports which had been received by the Head Office of the China International Famine Relief Commission up to July 24 state that the flooding of 727 villages in Chihli Province in addition to Kalgan, Paotingfu, Chochow and the low lying districts of Hsushin and Hsihli hsiens. The floods are due to breaks in the dykes or the overflow of the Yungtingho, Pei Yun Ho, Ching Ho and the Sha Ho as well as many mountain streams. The reports are incomplete and are still coming in.

At Kalgan the flood passed through the west suburb to the river. The rapidity of the flow washed out part of the bridge over the river, the water being six feet higher than the bridge. The houses along both sides of the river were all destroyed, and a great many people made homeless. The number of casualties was over 3,000. Distribution of bread is being made by the Methodist Mission and the Salvation Army. The China International Famine Relief Commission the local officials and the police together with the Red Cross and the Salvation Army are devising relief schemes.

Dykes Breaking Along the Yutingho: More Torrential Rains

From Our Own Correspondent.

Peking, July 25.

Still more towns and districts along the Yutingho River have been affected by the floods in the North, according to the latest report of the China International Famine Relief Commission, dated July 25. Tree-retards have been used with success in some localities.

Mr. Yang sent by the Commission to investigate the flood conditions in this area states that the excessive rainfall caused too rapid a rise of the river on July 13, it burst through its south dyke in Sections 3 and 2, on the 14th. On the night of the 14th, another break was made not far away. The width of the break in Section 3 was about 300 feet.

All the villages in the vicinity of the broken dykes were inundated, the flood sufferers taking refuge on the dyke or in the temple near by.

In Section 2, on the south side of the river, of all the affected villages, Paohochung, Niukiachang and Chukiakang suffered most severely, as they are only about four li from the break. There was great damage to houses and property.

In Section 3, the following six villages are most seriously affected: —Siakiachung, Tutsun, Mantsun, Chaoohung, Sichangtsun, Kungyichuang.

Of these villages, Siakiachang suffered most. It is no longer a village but a little mound submerged in the water. The flood sufferers are taking refuge on the dyke, living on the bread given by the Peking Welfare Association.

Futsun and Mantsun are only half a li apart; both are situated in the southwest about two li from the break. In the southwestern section of Futsun, more than 10 houses with over 60 rooms were swept away. The total loss is estimated at about $200,000. The flood sufferers are taking refuge in the temples.

In the northwestern section of Mantsun, all the houses were destroyed; some damage was also done in the northern section. Every place is covered with mud. The condition is worse than that in Kungyichung.

According to the statement of the villagers, the tress they anchored along the dyke kept Futsun and Mantsun from total destruction, otherwise the two villages would have been washed out like Siakiachang.

Mud Three Feet Deep.

Kungyichang is about 3 li from the break. More than 100 rooms were either destroyed or washed out. The streets are covered with mud about three feet deep.

The conditions in Chaichuang and Sichangtsun are reported as not so serious though many houses were destroyed and streets buried in mud.

More towns and districts are reported to have been affected, the following being a summary of the reports: Towtienchen — Torrential rain made Huenho burst through its dyke. All the villages in the south-eastern vicinity were inundated. There was a considerable loss of life. Relief is being gven by the Metropolitan authorities.

Yungching.—Incessant rainfall inundated all those villages lying in the low area. The water pouring from the break in the south dyke of the Yungtingho, made the Chungtingho rise so rapidly that it burst through its dyke at Hsinanchen. Over 20 villages south of Tsinanchen are seriously affected. There was a considerable loss of houses, cattle and property.

Hsinpaoan.—Excessive rains inundated the low-lying area of the district. The over-flow of the Tungfanho caused the Yangho in the south of the city to rise so rapidly that the reclaimed land along both sides of the latter river was washed out. So far 100 casualties were buried by the Red Cross Society of Kalgan.

Lihsien.—Torrential rainfall caused nine breaks in the dykes at Siwufu, Chungwufu, and Tachuti along the Chulungho, and at Koolingshan, Pehchung, Pehpuwan, and Tsaiwhangchuang along the Tangho. The widths of the breaks vary from 20 feet to over 100 feet. Many houses were destroyed and cattle and property washed away. Crops were inundated. The number of casualties is under investigation.

Canton in Serious Danger of Inundation: Relief Work by Volunteer Corps

Canton, July 22.

Reports from the flood area the last few days indicate that the Shek-kok Dyke, by which Canton and the vicinity are protected from water, is in danger. Should it break, Canton would suffer another inundation similar to that of 1915, when the whole western suburb was 7 or 8 feet under water. The police and the merchant volunteer corps are taking precautions and preparing for emergency calls to special service if this misfortune should occur. Reports from Wuchow, Shiuhing, Samshui, Sainam, Siutong, Fatshan, Szewui, Kohming and other places in the Canton Delta are pessimistic, all showing that the water is still rising. Communication by train between Shekwaitong and the Fatshan station of the Canton-Samshui Railway had to be suspended on July 17 on account of damage to the track by water.

Flood relief, as far as immediate aid in the way of supplying food and medicine to the needy is concerned, is being undertaken by the Canton Volunteers. The Volunteers are going out on their third relief mission, while charitable organizations and the Government are endeavouring to raise funds. The merchants have a ready command of food supplies and materials for repairing dykes, and can call on the Volunteer Corps, which is nearly 13,000 strong, it an emergency should arise.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

River Falling at Hankow: Last Year's Record Beaten

From Our Own Correspondent.

Wuchang, July 24.

In Hankow, the river seems to have reached its highest level and has begun to abate. The water rose a few inches over the edge of the bund front, sufficient to cover the footpath and encroach on the grass-border, but not enough to reach the road itself. This was the case from the British Concession right down as far as the S. A. D.

In the Japanese Concession, special measures were taken to prevent the water flowing over the edge of the bund, in the form of a small temporary embankment.

In the native city, the Han has risen over its bank and covered the river-street to a depth of six or seven inches.

This rise of the river has just beaten last year's record, which was the highest since 1870.

Tientsin Flood Situation: River Like A Rapid Near the Viceroy's Bridge.

Tientsin, July 28.

The outlook, so far as the floods are concerned, is steadily getting worse (says the "Peking & Tientsin Times"). The Hsi Ho at Ti Liu Pu has risen, since Friday, from 7.74 metres to 7.83 metres. Considerable anxiety is now felt in regard to the Red Bridge. The water at this point is like a veritable mill-race, its speed being not less than 15 ft. per second, and the scour threatens to cause the collapse of the bridge which would probably have serious consequences for the Hailo. At the Viceroy's Bridge the river was above the top of the piers yesterday, and was like a rapid between the steel bridge and the bridge of boats a little further down. Some of the boats were removed from the middle of the latter during the day.

As a practical measure the dyke inspection which took place yesterday was sheer camouflage. The only really illuminating part of the trip was the visit—across country—to the Hsi Ho, near Yang Liu Ching. Here the top of the dyke has been raised several feet since the waters began to rise, but the water level is now only a foot or a foot and a half from the top of the improvised dyke, which has been constructed on top of the regular embankment. If the water continues to rise this new and flimsy superstructure must go. In the meantime it is heading up the water, the very thing which the technical members of the Chihli River Commission deprecate.

The sole hope of any improvement in the situation may be said to consist in a prolonged period of dry weather here, in Peking, and in the mountains whence the Chihli rivers spring.

Hunan City's Fate: Appalling Flood Disasters in Centre of Province

From Our Own Correspondent.

Changsha, July 21.

As news comes in from the more distant parts of Hunan province, the recent flood disasters become more and more appalling.

Paoking, right in the centre of the province sends one of the worst accounts. Hitherto the water has occasionally entered the city gates, which stand on quite a high bluff and are not level with the ordinary banks. At first those who knew the city thought there was some mistake in the absurd story of boats sailing over the city wall But, there was no mistake. Four out of five of the city gates were utterly full of water. Hundreds of houses have collapsed.

Messrs. Jardine, Matheson have lost thousands of taels' worth of sugar. The new hospital of the Wesleyan Methodist Mission was considered to be so far above any possibility of flood that the lower storey was built of sun-burnt bricks. When the plot was purchased, the oldest inhabitant of the neighbourhood pointed out a temple, considerably lower than the lowest point in the new compound where the water had once touched. This time, it was 10 feet deep in the compound. A strip of the boundary wall, the gatekeeper's house, sundry old buildings which seem to have been standing on the plot for a century, the new waiting room, and the walls (but not the framework) of the hospital have all collapsed.

Damage to Rice Crops

In Yuankiang, one of the counties bordering on the south of the Tungting Lake, 37 out of 38 "enclosures" into which the whole county is divided, have given way and all crops are lost. Very little, if any of this land will be available for a second planting. No one really knows the percentage of the rice land of the province that has been affected—nor is it likely that anything more than guesses will be available in the near future.

The Floods in Hupeh and Hunan

Peking, July 27.

General Fu Liang-tso, Anfu Vice-Minister of War, and Mr. Tsao Yu-lin, Anfu Minister of Communications, have sent a joint telegram to the provinces announcing that Marshal Tuan Chi-jui has donated $5,000 to flood relief and asking the provincial authorities to invite public subscriptions for relief in Hunan.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Hankow, July 29.

In view of the fact that reports concerning floods are reaching here from various parts in Hupeh province, Gen. Hsiao Yao-nan, Inspector-General of Hupeh and Hunan, yesterday invited leading civil and military officers of the province to discuss with him measures for the prevention of floods as well as relief measures. As a result of this meeting, it has been decided to provide the sum of $10,000 as relief funds.—Eastern News Agency.

Hankow, July 30.

The level of the river has now reached 48 ft., the highest point for 35 years. Continuous pumping of the drains has kept the concession from flooding, but if the river rises much further, a flood cannot be prevented.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Conditions Worse Along Upper Chumaho: River Risen 200 Feet

The following report on the floods in Chihli and the Metropolitan area was issued by the China International Famine Relief Commission on July 26.

Ninotsing.—The incessant rains have resulted in the inundation of crops in the neighbourhood of the river, but so far only slight damage has been done.

Tanghsien.—Excessive rainfall from July 8 to 15 flooded the low-lying area of the river, and destroyed a small portion of the crops in the neighburhood of the district. Conditions on the whole are not yet very serious.

Anhsin.—Continuous rainfall at the beginning of July and the big storm on the 10th ultimo caused the river to rise to a height of over 10 feet. On the night of the 17th, the south dyke and several places in the dyke at Santaitsun collapsed, but the dykes were immediately repaired.

Chinhsien.—Owing to the continuous rainfall in the beginning of the month and the downpour on the 13th, the river rose suddenly. The dyke at Changlitsun broke along a width of over 100 feet, and the dyke at Fengtsun was also breached by over 200 feet. The neighbouring villages, such as Yukie-chuang, Shanli, and Tahsha, were flooded. Countless number houses and culitvated areas were either swept over or destroyed by the flood. The breaks are now repaired. Food supplies running short but immediate relief is expected.

Yungcheng.— Owing to the wind storms and torrential rains from July 10 to 12, the upper Chumaho has suddenly risen to a height of over 200 feet, inundating the north-western villages. Four breaks have been made in the dykes at the lower Tashingho, Wanghsiangwu, and Shupekow; each break is about 80 feet wide. All the neighbouring villages have been inundated, and over 1500 houses destroyed. Grain in storage and property have mostly been washed away. Conditions are very serious.

The storms on the 15th and the 20th caused both the Nanchuho and the Pingpacho to burst their dykes, and also made worse the break in the dyke at the Tachingho. The villages in the vicinity of these rivers have been seriously affected, as well as an additional 49 in the same area. Immediate relief is needed. The local Magistrate has appealed to the Civil Governor for relief funds.

Chinghwayuan.—The incessant rains during the first half of the month have caused the river to rise to a height of over 10 feet—about three feet higher than the ground level.

The water remains high, and is expected to go down in about a week's time. Many houses have been destroyed.

Siyuan.—Some water has accumulated in the low-lying area due to the continuous rain, but there is no flood.

Shansan.—Incessant rains have flooded the place; the water is about two feet above the ground, but it is going down. Lots of houses have been destroyed. The natives are poor, and the flood has made the their condition worse.

Unfavourable weather has delayed the departure of a party which was to have taken pictures of the flooded area from an aeroplane.

USE OF WIRELESS ON JAPANESE SHIPS

Now To Be Made Compulsory as Result of Recent Disasters at Sea

Tokio, July 24.

The recent tragedy to the steamer Matsuyama Maru, which sank with all hands but one, off the Goto Islands, has impressed the authorities with the necessity of a combulsory wireless outfit on all Japanese vessels.

A set of regulations is now being prepared by the Department of Communications, and will be promulgated next month to take effect from the beginning of 1925.

The proposed regulations will also insist on the employment of radio operators on board all vessels.

At present very few ships with a tonnage of less than 5,000 tons are equipped with wireless, and while many of them carry wireless, there are no operators on board to work it—Reuter's Pacific Service.

SOVIET EXECUTIONS

Amnesty or Not Numbers Put to Death for White Sympathies or Economic "Crime"

A correspondent writes from up country:

In view of your translation of the Soviet amnesty to Whites, as advertised in the columns of the "North-China Daily News," it would but seem fair that the following should be given all the publicity possible. It is from the "Times" Riga correspondent writing on June 14:—

Executions in Soviet Russia continue unceasingly. Many are for recently committed "economic offences," but many former adherents of Admiral Koltchak and Generals Denikin and Wrangel and former members of the Tsarist police, whose offences belong to the prerevolutionary period, are still being put to death.

The Soviet Press reports only a small proportion of these executions, but during the last few days the lists of victims published have included Captain Rosselevitch, for serving under Savinoff; M. Vulkoff, a former officer of the Tsarist police; Colonel Yudin, for communicating with the British cruiser Kent at Vladivostok in 1919; a man named Yefimoff, for smuggling; MM. Kalasnikoff, Yevlakhin, Mahly, and Kravtsoff, for adherence to Petlura; and Dr. Poliansky. The death sentences passed on the following persons have been confirmed:—Two directors, Antonoff and Grossman, for economic offenecs; Ossipoff, Sorokin, Kultianka, Naidonova, Kniazkoff, Maritsary, Kovaleff, Kamaroff, for alleged espionage; Ozol, for formerly serving in the Secret Police. Ozol, after his sentence had been confirmed, overpowered his warders and escaped, but he was tracked by police dogs, recaptured while boarding a train for Finland, and shot.

FIRE ON MOTOR-SHIP IN PHILIPPINES

Manila, July 30.

Sixty persons are missing from the motor-ship Agusan, which is on fire off Misamis, Mindanao. Sixty of the complement were rescued by the steamer Antonio Cosim yesterday, according to Constabulary reports. The Agusan plies between Cebu and Mindanao. The passengers are mostly native. —Reuter's Pacific Service.

TENSION IN TSINGTAO WITH THE NAVY

Admiral Wen's Demand for Funds: Governor's Threat to Resign

Tsingtao, July 27.

Although on the surface things here have appeared [illegible] peaceful, there has recently been a certain tenseness in the situation at the back of the scenes. Reuter's correspondent learns on very good authority that both Governor Kao En-hung and Mr. Shao Heng-chun, the Managing Director of the Kiao-Tsi Railway, were seriously considering resignation. Admiral Wen [illegible]-teh's squadron is said to be at the bottom of the trouble, their upkeep forming a considerable item of expenditure. In theory this expense should be borne by Peking, but actually the Kiaochou Territory has to meet it. The sums already transferred to the squadron and the prospect of having to disburse very heavy amounts in the near future for the overhaul of the ships have not tended to cement closer relations between the civil and naval authorities. Just when Tsingtao is struggling to rehabilitate itself financially, calls are being made upon it for sums which can ill be spared.

The tension has, however, been temporarily relieved by promises made by representatives of Marshal Wu Pei-fu that he will smooth over all difficulties. This is interpreted as meaning that the Loyang War Lord has given assurances that he will obtain funds elsewhere to defray the naval expenses. With what success his endeavours will be attended is yet to be seen.

Tsingtao University.

The endowment fund for the Tsingtao University is progressing favourably. The Governor has donated $10,000 and Mr. Liu Tsi-shan, a wealthy business man, has doubled the Tupan's gift. An exhibition and sale of rare curios, some dating back more than 2,000 years, is being held to raise further funds. The principal exhibit, a porcelain bowl of the Sung Dynasty in perfect condition, is valued at $100,000. The Administration has donated a large piece of property at Iltis Hook, upon which a marine biological laboratory will be built. The foundation of this institution was suggested by Professor Arthur Jacot of the Shantung Christian College. The building will include an aquarium.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHANGSHA'S TRIBUTE TO MR. GILES

Presentation by British Colony to H. M. Consul on His Approaching Transfer

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Changsha, July 21.

On the occasion of the approaching transfer of Mr. L. Giles, H. M. Consul, to another port after 25 years' in the Consular Service, a third of which period has been spent in Changsha, British residents on Saturday evening assembled at the house of Mr. and Mrs. Edwards to offer Mr. Giles their congratulations. As a token of the appreciation in which Mr. and Mrs. Giles are held in the port, it was announced that a committee which had collected subcriptions from British residents had been able to send home an order to Messrs. Mappin & Webb for a solid silver tea service for presentation to Mr. Giles. The service is to be inscribed: "Presented to Lancelot Giles, Esquire, H.B.M. Consul, Changsha, by his British friends in the port, on his completion of 25 years in the Consular Service, of which a little less than one-third has been spent in Changsha." The subscription was not only limited to British subjects, but in their case to a comparative few, who immediately responded most cordially.

There was a goodly muster of British residents, eight of whom were ladies, at Mrs. Edwards's house. Flood damage to cables had recently interfered with electric lighting installations at most houses here, but happily as Messrs. Butterfield & Swire's bungalow has a Delco lighting plant, the dinner was partaken of amid the usual comforts of European houses in the hot weather.

Mr. Giles, who was received with "He's a jolly good fellow," responded most cordially, and afterwards Mrs. Giles said how cheered they had been after the prospect of removal from Changsha had come upon them with the kindness which they were experiencing from the British community.

TO MOKANSHAN IN SIX HOURS

Chance for Good Roads Movement: Only Short Extension of Present Motor Road Needed

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Hangchow, July 29.

If the Hangchow-Yuhang motor-road were extended to Vukang, Mokanshan could be reached in six hours, instead of 12 as at present despite the excellent transport facilities offered, for from Vukang to the top of the mountain is but a short journey.

One wonders why this extension cannot be carried out, for the popularity of Mokanshan is such that in many cases, holiday-makers visit the resort but once or twice and the house-building fever gets hold of them.

Fires are still a daily occurrence in Hangchow. Insurance companies, both Chinese and foreign, are said to be suffering great losses.

The meeting of the Exhibition Committee has been postponed until August 2, as the Provincial Good Roads movement meets on the 1st.

Students of the First Normal School are indignant over the replacement of their principal, Mr. Chin, by Mr. Sen, from Peking.

TROUBLE MONGERS AND WU PEI-FU

Loyang Chieftain's Bitter Comment on Those Who Embroil Him with Nanking

In a telegram to the Peking Government, Marshal Wu Pei-fu vehemently denies several press reports which, he says, were evidently purposely published by trouble mongers with a view to causing ill-feeling between himself and the other governors. He declares that the reports of his advocating the replacing of the present Tuli of Anhui by General Yen Chih-tang, and the despatch of a joint expedition by four provinces against Generals Chuang Chi-ping and Yang Hua-chao in Chèkiang, are not based on facts. As affairs in Anhui have always been directed by Marshal Chi Hsieh-yuan, how can Loyang interfere? Although he, Wu, earnestly hopes to see the troops of Chuang and Yang in Chèkiang disbanded and sent home, as their prolonged stay in Chèkiang cannot be of any earthly use to Marshal Lu Yung-hsiang, while they may well be used as a catspaw by the radical party, he has advocated no such extreme measures to be taken. He would be pleased if the gentry of Chèkiang, Anhui and Fukien would adopt peaceful means for the sake of their provinces to have them paid and repatriated; or perhaps the fund should be furnished by the Central Government. The Press report about the Nanking ruler refusing to approve of Loyang's advocacy to use force against Chuang's men in Chèkiang, is a pure lie, since Marshal Chi is not a man that would care to make any such frank avowal. Marshal Wu bitterly complains of the ceaseless intriguing going on to cause misunderstanding between Loyang and Nanking.

RUSSIAN INSTRUCTORS IN DR. SUN'S ARMY

Peking, July 24.

It is reported that a number of Russian tutors have been sent to assist in the operations on the East River and that an order has been issued by Dr. Sun Yat-sen's Headquarters prohibiting publication of information about their movements. —Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHINESE HOSPITAL IN WUCHANG

Adjunct to Medical College: Scheme Long Needed

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Wuchang, July 24.

It is proposed now to erect a Chinese hospital in Wuchang, in connexion with the Medical College. The Tuchun himself has opened the subscription list by promising $10,000 from his own yamên, and all the leading officials, merchants and citizens will be asked to support the scheme. In order to arouse interest in the project, a big dinner was given last Saturday at the Medical College, to which 500 guests were invited. The Tuchun being unable to leave his affairs, sent his aide-de-camp Mr. Hsiung Shih-yu as his representative. Among others present were the heads of the education, judicial, finance and police departments, and many of the leading magistrates and business men of Wuchang beside members of the Provincial Assembly. Mr. Hsiung, in his speech referred to the double need for a hospital, as an adjunct to the Medical College, and, as a means of giving help to the sick. He made an interesting reference to the big hospital in Berlin, which was founded by the Emperor William.

It is certainly time that the Chinese bestirred themselves to some effort of this kind. Apart from the hospital of the Benevolent Association on the Maloo in Hankow, the only medical work carried out on Western lines in the whole Province of Hupeh is being done by missionaries. The Wuchang Medical College, although founded several years ago has had no institution in which its students may gain practical experience.

AVIATION IN JAPAN

General Interest Aroused by Visits of Foreign World-Fliers

Tokio, July 23.

The recent visits of world-fliers, American, French, and British, have given a fillip to aviation in this country and aroused considerable interest among the general public, who are realizing how far Japan is behind the rest of the world in aeronautics, both commercial and as a means of national defence.

Mention has already been made of the voluntary offerings of contributions on the part of all classes of Japanese towards the bolstering up of the study and practice of aviation here. These former contributions have all been dwarfed by the offer of one hundred thousand yen to the Army Aviation Bureau by an Osaka banker, who requests that the money be spent on some aspect of national air defence.

At the present time one of Japan's foremost civilian fliers, Yukichi Goto, is planning a round-Japan flight, the route he is to follow taking in Osaka, Kakoshima, Kukuoka, Fusan, Seoul, Dairen, Nagasaki, Kanagawa, Muroran, Kasumigaura, Tokorozawa, Kagamigahara, and back to Osaka.

The expansion of the military and naval air arms is engaging the attention of the departments concerned, while forecasts of their plans find prominence in the press from time to time. Both the Navy and the War departments are convinced of the imperative need of enlarging the number of aviation corps, provided the necessary funds can be found, and, according to announcements, are plannint to curtail in one direction in order to expand in that.

According to reports the War Office intends to add within the next three years five aviation corps to the present six at an additional cost of from Y. 25,000,000 to Y. 30,000,000, while the Navy plans during 1925 to complete the air equipment at Kasumigaura, and embark on additional air-crops at Kure, Sasebo, and Omura.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE SERVANTS' STRIKE AT SHAMEEN

Strikers Obviously in the Hands of Agitators Now Demanding Absurd Terms: Shameen Picketed by Lawless Elements: The Question of Passports

It is clear that the strike of servants at Shameen, the foreign settlement of Canton has reached a very unpleasant stage. The latest reported demands of the strikers—that the policing of the island must be handed over to the Chinese, and that the British Consul-General must be withdrawn—are absurd enough no doubt. But they illustrate the mood of the strikers, or rather of the agitators who are leading, and are a fair example of the habit of such disputes to swell beyond all relation to the original point of difference and beyond all bounds of reason. Nothing now but the most resolute firmness on the part of the Shameen authorities will serve to meet the case, or another fiasco like the end of the Hongkong strike will be the inevitable reward.

Intimidation Plain.

This belief is strengthened by the obvious fact that a screen of professional agitators, such as made themselves conspicuous in the Hongkong strike, has interposed itself between the servants of Shameen and their masters. It is impossible to believe that it is boys, cooks and house coolies who are picketing the gates of Shameen and beating up any Chinese caught smuggling food into the island. When we get the full reports of the strike, we shall probably find that intimidation played a considerable part in the starting of it, and there cannot be a shadow of doubt that intimidation has kept it going.

Looking back over the events of the past few weeks, it is to be inferred that the bomb outrage during the banquet to M. Merlin at the Hotel Victoria shook the nerves of Shameen very badly. It could hardly not do so. Not otherwise would the Consular Body have sent to the Canton Government its rather unwise note about the freedom given to malefactors, laying itself open to the obvious retort that if Shameen chose to do its own policing it must take the responsibility for its own protection.

The Passport Regulations.

Following on this we have been told, via Peking, that regulations were drawn up and approved at a general meeting of the foreign residents of Shameen, by which all Chinese servants were, after August 1, to carry passports, each one bearing its owner's portrait and that no Chinese would be admitted into Shameen after 9 p.m. without such a passport.

Now one is bound to say that these regulations do not appear to have been very wisely conceived. When we remember that even in Shanghai, where we have to deal with a much less proud and touchy people than Cantonese are, the invariable objection made to the intermittently proposed registration of Chinese servants is the indignity that they would feel in having to be registered with the police, it is easy to understand that the Cantonese servants lost no time in kicking against the proposed regulations. They objected especially to the apparent discrimination. They did not, we were told, mind having to show passports if others had to do the like. But they strongly resented having to prove their own bona fides when, apparently, Indians, Japanese and Annamites could come and go unquestioned.

We assume that it was only Chinese who were to carry passports, because there has never been any indication to the contrary. In any case the regulation strikes one as futile. A man who wanted to commit a bomb outrage could get in before 9 p.m. and conceal himself even in Shameen, while there is nothing to prevent anyone from landing by sampan at any point of the Bund he wished. Your real malefactor does not lack ingenuity and little enough of it is necessary in order to enter Shameen at any hour and almost at any point.

The servants went on strike on the evening of July 15, first only those of French and British, then of all, residents. The police stayed on duty until the 18th and then they went out, and at the same time a sympathetic strike of sampan men and women began. This fact alone would suggest that the strike movement had been taken charge of by the professional agitator class and all further news tends to confirm that inference. We hear of the approaches to the Shameen being strictly watched by strikers, of food smugglers being violently handled and of the preposterous terms mentioned in yesterday's telegram. This is not the work of boys and amahs.

Canton Government's Duty.

And it is here that we think the authorities of Shameen are justly entitled to demand that the Canton Government shall intervene. We venture to think that it would have no great difficulty in eliminating the agitators and middlemen if it wished to do so, and we think that it should. The damage to trade, in which Canton merchants are vitally affected, cannot be small and movements of this kind have an ugly knack of developing into public disorder in which the first people to get hurt are the innocent. There is certainly inconvenience, but no impossibility for the residents of Shameen to carry on the fight. It is a matter of sending women and children to Hongkong and of provisioning by means of foreign gunboats. And that, we take it, Shameen will certainly do rather than give way to intimidation. We doubt if the masters have ever yet seen their servants in negotiation. That should be the very first step and it is the duty of the Canton Government, in the general interests of law and order and for the sake of its own good name as the guardian of such, to see that agitators are eliminated and the parties directly concerned are brought directly face to face.

Women and Children Sent Away to Hongkong: No Progress Towards Settlement

Peking, July 24.

News, which reached Peking this morning through the medium of official telegrams, revealed that little, if any, progress has been made towards bring about a settlement of the Shameen strike. Steps have indeed been taken to send away the women and children from the Concession to Hongkong and elsewhere, and plans are being made to meet possible emergencies.

A meeting between the strikers and the Shameen authorities had been arranged for 6 p.m. on July 21, but the former failed to turn up. However, they sent along a series of demands, one being the unconditional reinstatement of the Shameen police who have joined in the strike. This seems to be one of the thorniest questions standing in the way of a settlement of the dispute.

Yesterday, it is reported, the British and French authorities put into force, as a temporary measure, the restrictions upon Chinese entering the Concession after nightfall which were the immediate cause of the trouble. In addition to a public announcement in regard to the measures necessary to be taken in case of an attack upon Shameen, the British Consul-General, at the request of the municipal authorities, forwarded to the Consular Body a suggestion that all women and children should be evacuated and this is now being done.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

PHILIPPINE SCOUTS ON TRIAL

Manila, P. I., July 29.

The court-martial of the 209 Philippine scouts at Fort McKinley opened to-day, with Brigadier-General Douglas MacArthur presiding. The defence attempted to show that the scout privates were victimized by non-commissioned officers and other organizers. Five of the officers on the court were challenged by the defence.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

BRIGAND HUNTING IN HUPEH

Province Mapped in Districts Each Under Special Command: "Big Swords" from Anhui

From Our Own Correspondent.

Wuchang, July 24.

Gvernor Hsiao is still determined to rid Hupeh of the brigands. Former plans, says the native press, have been handicapped owing to the large drafts of soldiers required for operations in Szechuan and Hunan. Now that these two provinces are more or less peaceful, it is possible to carry out the plans which have already been drafted for exterminating the bandit pest in Hupeh. The whole province is now to be divided in to 10 districts, in each of which a brigade-commander (lu-chang) is made responsible. When robbers are reported in any part, the officers in command of the adjoining districts will be able to cooperate and surround them.

An opportunity has immediately occurred of testing the efficiency of the above plan. The band of robbers which recently looted Luan in Anhui has crossed the border and entered Hupeh Province in the region of Lotien and Macheng. Their numbers are said to have increased from a mere 90 odd to 4 or 5,000 men. They are mostly deserted soldiers, who have joined the "Big Sword" Brigands. In order to deal with these invaders, two detachments of soldiers have been sent up, the one from Huangchow with Lotien as its objective, and the other from Wu-shenkuan to Huangan. The two detachments are to join forces and surround the robbers.

For the second time within 12 months, Hankow has a new Commissioner of Foreign Affairs. Some six months ago, Mr. Cheng Kiai was replaced by Mr. Shen Tzu-liang. Now the latter has been transferred to Hsinti, and his place is taken by Mr. Wu Yeh-chen. Mr. Wu is a graduate of Peking University, and has held the office of trade inspector in the three provinces of Chihli, Shantung and Hunan. He recently paid a visit to Hankow acting as interpreter to Senn Fen-lin.

MISSION PREMISES AS OFFICES

Canton Govt.'s Allegation That Mission Property Is Used for Commercial Purposes

From a Correspondent.

Hongkong, July 25.

The right of a missionary society to construct buildings which they will let on lands leased from the Chinese Government for religious and educational purposes is now questioned in Canton.

One Soo Yat-ming, a citizen of Canton, has called the attention of the authorities to the large number of office buildings just erected on lands in front of the Roman Catholic Church at Yi Tak Maloo. It is alleged that the French Catholic Mission in Canton is violating the terms of the lease granted it by the Chinese Government when it began in the last year or two to erect a series of buildings for business and office use and charge rent like any other real estate agencies. In the last 50 years or more the Mission at various times succeeded in getting from the Chinese Government concessions of lands for conducting its work, including the building of orphanages, hospitals, schools, dormitories for the missionaries and the like, and these grants had amounted to more than 60 mow of land, according to Chinese measurement. The Mission was to pay a nominal rent, in one instance two and a half cents for every 10 Chinese squares annually, for the use of the lands set aside for this service.

In Canton these days, not only the French Catholic Mission but also other missions are letting buildings for other educational purposes than strictly religous; but in practically every case, the proceeds are considered interest from endowment funds invested in office buildings for the support of the mission concerned.

A VISIT TO THE PANCHAN LAMA

Second Greatest Dignitary in Tibet: Seated in Room Hung with Green Sateen: He Hears of Wembley and World Flights

By Our Siningfu Correspondent

Lanchow, July 9.

Through the courtesy of a kind friend I was privileged to join their party in a visit to his holiness the Panchan Lama, the second Lama of importance in Tibet, who acted as Regent during the flight of the Dalai Lama 1904-1907 and during that period visited India. The hour of appointment was 9 a.m. There were four in the party representing four countries.

The Lama has taken up his residence in a temple beautifully situated on the hill side on the west side of the city. Within the Temple walls there is a large courtyard in which there is a lovely avenue of trees leading up to the rooms where the Lama has his residence. At night time Chinese lanterns hanging from these trees make it look like a fairy land. We were ushered into his presence by the Chinese official in charge of arrangements. We approached him one by one, handing over to him in Tibetan fashion, the "Scarf of blessing" which he received most graciously. We were then all invited to take our seats and tea and refreshments were handed round.

The Lama's own room has its walls covered with a light green sateen and carpets on the floor. The Lama was seated on the kang, gold brocaded satin covered the wall just behind him. There was nothing very elaborate about the room. He received us sitting, as becoming his position as a Living Buddha. In features he resembles the Mongolian rather than the Tibetan. Has a very amiable kindly face and a very pleasant smile. As the Chinese official was present all the time it was not opportune to find out why he had fled from Shigatse. He had avoided the main routes north and passed through very barren uninhabited country heading on the west of the Tsaidam, finally reaching Shachow six days west of Anhsichow where he first came in contact with the Chinese who were on the look-out for him.

We gave him information about the Mt. Everest Expedition, aeroplane flights round the world, Wembley exhibition, etc. He was in no hurry for us to go and seemed yearning to get information about the outside world. On leaving he presented us each with a "Scarf of Blessing" and as I accepted mine he took my hand and pressed it between his hands and smiled most benignly. Certainly he is far more attractive than the Dalai Lama was, on his visit here. One of the party took his photograph in the room but it was not a success so a better one was taken in front of the house among the trees.

He is staying here till the hot weather is over ere he proceeds to Peking and Wu-Tai Shan.

He desired to visit Labrang and Kumbum Lamaseries, but it appears Peking is not willing for him to go.

Reason of His Flight.

He fled, that is true, but the real reason is difficult to find out. A reason given me the other day was that the Panchan Lama had been putting up some new buildings in his Lamasery that are higher than the Potala, the Palace of the Dalai Lama, and he had not mentioned it to the Dalai Lama and the latter is angry, for he fears it may spoil his "Fengshui," or his luck. This, I am afraid, is too clearly a Chinese story. There is one thing evident and that it has to do with Britain in some way or another, for Britain always comes in part of the stories told. It is thought that the Dalai Lama is trying to throw in his lot with Britain and was making out a treaty of some kind to offer to Tibet and that the Panchan Lama has been approached with the hope of getting him to join and sign the Treaty. He on the other hand feels that Tibet being shut in on three sides by the Chinese Empire, it is more important that they should remain under Chinese rule and rather than sign the Treaty he fled north.

He on his part is not anti-British but is pro-Chinese. That the people of Lhasa are anti-Chinese has been a well known fact for many years.

It is practically certain that the Dalai Lama is at the root of the present trouble and the cause of the flight. That Great Britain has ever entertained any thoughts of rule in Tibet can easily be refuted. But for the help Great Britain has rendered China in Tibet, China's rule in Tibet to-day would have been almost nil.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY OF MANILA

Measures Taken to Prepare Country Against Earthquake Calamities

Manila, July 16.

A geological survey of the city of Manila and its immediate vicinity has been started by the division of mines of the Bureau of Science for the purpose of obtaining data by the aid of which the Board of Earthquakes hopes to map the earthquake lines immediately east and northeast of Manila and to recommend practicable means of preparedness or precautionary measures against any possible catastrophe.

The Board on Earthquake was created several months ago by an executive order, issued by the Governor-General, for the purpose of making a scientific study of the conditions existing in the Philippines, with a view to preparing the country against any calamity such as the earthquake in Japan last September, and of recommending precautionary measures.

Speaking of the importance of the geological work, Dr. R. E. Dickerson, member of the earthquake board said:—

"The recognition of recent earthquake lines of the Philippines, which is essentially geological, is of particular importance in the construction of dwelling houses, business buildings, water supply, cables and power transmission schemes. It is of particularly great importance to recognize these lines in advance of destructive earthquakes along them, in order that certain precautions can be taken in engineering structures.

"Manila is built upon the delta of the Pasig river and its soil is very unconsolidated. That such loosely filled areas suffer far more severely than bed-rock localities is evidenced by all large earthquakes. On this account Manila's higher buildings should be built upon a pile constructed foundation and preferably of reinforced concrete or steel frame construction, very strongly tied."—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE CIVIC SPIRIT IN PEKING

Vigorous Opposition to Police Tax Which Would Never Go to the Police

From Our Own Correspondent.

Peking, July 23.

Civic spirit in Peking is growing rapidly. It was vigorously encouraged by Sung Hung-yi when he was in the capital recently, and now it is expressing itself in opposition to the tax imposed on Peking residents by the police authorities, with the sanction of the Cabinet, for the payment of wages long overdue to the policemen. Various sections of the city have already been mulcted in this new levy, and I have heard of several foreigners who have paid it. But now, owing to the action of the Chinese residents, the Courts have ordered the suspension of the tax pending satisfactory argument on its admissibility; and the police authorities have issued the necessary order to the collectors.

OPIUM-GROWING IN JEHOL AREA

People Now Told to Pull Up Poppy After Having to Grow It and Pay a Tax

Peking, July 24.

The following has been issued by the International Anti-Opium Association, Peking:—

"One of the foreign Directors of the International Anti-Opium Association, who has recently made the trip by road from Peking to Jehol, sends the following report on the opium conditions which the party saw on the journey. The report is evidence of two important facts, firstly, that the Tartar General's knowledge of the export of Indian opium is very ancient, for not a pound of Indian opium has been sent to China since 1914, and, secondly, that some attempt has been made to uproot the opium which the Jehol Inspector General in Peking informed the Waichiaopu had not been planted, he (the General) having enforced measures of total suppression in 1923. The report states:—

Every Farm Its Patch.

Peking, July 22, 1924.

To the Hon. Secretary International Anti-Opium Association Peking.

June 22.—After leaving Chihli province and entering the jurisdiction of Jehol, there beside the river at Pei Ying Fang we saw the first field of poppy just coming into bloom. From that point we went by pack animal trails over a pass into the valley of the Pei Ho, White River, and every farm, almost, had its patch of poppy, from a few plants in the garden to a half mow and up to three mow in a plot, all the way to Jehol. The crop was being harvested and in the most advanced fields the flowers had about all dropped their petals and the men said the harvest would be over in 10 days. It was difficult to tell what proportion of the cultivated land was occupied by the poppy but I should now place it at more than a twentieth. Wherever there was fertile soil the brilliant bloom of the poppy was in evidence. Close beside one military station at the town of Hsin Chien, about 80 li from Jehol, there were several mow of the plant.

Parties who went by the main travelled road through Hupeik'ou to Jehol told me that they did not notice any poppy, but it was impossible to travel through these more remote districts without seeing it constantly.

Ordered to Plant.

Men working in the fields said that they heard that inspectors were coming through and that an order had come to pull it all up. They said that near Jehol it had been pulled up already and our observation confirmed it. They also declared that they had been ordered to plant and that they had to pay $7 per mow at the time of planting. Since then they had paid several assessments that went to subordinates. They understand that the first tax went to the Tartar General. Up to that time they had paid about $40 per mow and were liable to have to pay at least once again in harvest time. Still they expected to make a small profit if they were only allowed to harvest the entire crop. They accepted the order and its enforcement as a fate against which it was useless to resist but which they considered most unjust.

And Now to Pull up.

In conversation with my friend the Tartar General, he made no disguise of the fact that he had encouraged the planting. His excuse was that after China had stopped the planting in 1917 India sent in millions of the stuff and the country might better raise it herself. He thought the British effort to get China to stop planting was purely in the interest of her own opium trade. However, he said that the orders to pull it up would have to be obeyed and he had sent them out, but it was very hard on the poor people who had paid their tax on planting the crop. It looked to me as though the orders would not be pressed seriously until the crop was practically all harvested.

Many of the farmers declared that they did not smoke, that they sold it all, but in the city it was evident that it was smoked everywhere and many said that everyone smoked."—Reuter's Pacific Service.

GOVERNOR KAO EN-HUNG AND RACING

Speech at Opening of International Recreation's First Meeting at Tsingtao

From Our Own Correspondent.

Tsingtao, July 20.

Although the weather did its best to spoil the opening races at the first meeting of the International Recreation Club on Friday afternoon, more than 1,000 persons turned out to witness the revival of pony-racing, and hundreds more were doubtless kept away by the eccentricities of the weather. They filled the grand stand and bleachers and overflowed along the rails. A most cosmopolitan gathering it was and in both Governor Kao En-hung's dedicatory speech and Mr. Paul Jernigan's speech of inroduction allusion was made to the fact.

Mr. Jernigan, in officially opening the course, spoke of the enthuasiam which had greeted the formation of the club. He remarked that the Club would be of great assistance in promoting international friendship and co-operation. He also alluded to the Governor's lively interest in the club.

The Governor said he considered it an honour to speak on such an occasion. He called it a most auspicious opening, with a truly cosmopolitan gathering.

"I want to congratulate you," he said, "for having so successfully started such a club for I am sure it will contribute toward the promotion of international friendship and co-operation which, as you all know, is indispencable for a cosmopolitan city like Tsingtao."

"From the constitution of your Club I notice that you will have organized competition in athletics, pony-racing and all forms of recreation and outdoor sports and that they are planning to give an opportunity to the community to appreciate the value of physical education and develop the spirit of sportsmanship." The Governor endorsed such objects and wished the club long life and success.

The Governor and Admiral Wen were then presented with handsome ponies.

A POLICE TAX AT MOKANSHAN

Consular Sanction to Be Given to Scheme and Accounts Rendered through Board

From Our Own Correspondent.

Hangchow, July 23.

Officials have been engaged in amicable negotiations with the Board of Management concerning the levying, of an annual tax for police, road making, repairs and other public services at the popular holiday resort. I understand that Consular sanction is to be given to the scheme, and accounts rendered through the Board.

I have to report another big fire. The damage is estimated at $100,000.

The heat still continues and no rain falls. Rice is scarce, but Tupan Lu Yung-hsiang has relieved anxiety by making arrangements for bringing rice from other provinces before its price goes up very much in Hangchow.

We are informed that what promises to develop into a very important action has been filed at Hongkong, the plaintiff being a master mariner and the defendants one of the big local shipping companies. It is stated that the plaintiff was dismissed on account of alleged defective eyesight, after examination by one of the company's doctors, and that other medical men who examined him are not in agreement with the verdict of the first doctor. Very important issues are stated to be involved in the case, which it is understood will come up for hearing some time in October.

THE BODY OF KARL MARX

Russian Proposal to Remove to Moscow Strongly Resisted by Communist's Grandson

M. Jean Longuet, the senior descendant of Karl Marx, the apostle of Communism, has addressed the following letter to the British Prime Minister:—

My dear MacDonald,—I have learned by the Press that the Soviet Government delegation now staying in London had approached the British Home Minister with a proposal of the Russian Government to transfer to Moscow the remains of my grandfather, Karl Marx, buried since 37 years in the Hampstead Cemetery.

In the name of my brothers and sisters, as well as for my own sake, as only heirs of Karl Marx, I want to raise the most definite and energetic objection to any proposal of the kind.

Karl Marx has rested since 1883 in London, near his beloved wife Jenny, near his life companion and friend Hélène Demuth, near my youngest brother Harry Longuet, in the British soil, according to his most positive wishes. When, after the great defeat of the working class all over Europe in 1848, he came to the British shores as a political refugee, he found a safe asylum in this "mother of exiles—London." For more than 40 years he had lived in close contact with the British working class, and found in this country the scientific basis of his great book, "Capital."

His fundamental conception was that Socialist civilization could only grow in the more economically and industrially developed countries of Occident. I am sure that he would at the present time have followed with the deepest sympathy the efforts and realizations of the first great Labour Government that the world has seen and which you preside over with so much loyalty, devotion, and skill. I do not think that Marx would have accepted, whatever may have been his general sympathy for the great revolutionary upheaval of the Russian people, that his remains, his memory, should be monopolized by the present Russian type of Communism.

All his writings are indeed imbued with a deep mistrust of Russian methods, of the Russia of the Tsar and also of the Russia of Bakounine.

That he would have admired the marvellous fighting qualities of Lenin and his great devotion to the cause of world's revolution I do not doubt for a moment; but nobody has the right to say that he would have admitted that his achievements were inspired by the Marxian philosophy.

The most positive desire and will of all the heirs of Karl Marx is that his remains should not be removed from Hampstead, but that they should remain in the noble soil of the great English Labour democracy.—Believe me, my dear MacDonald, most fraternally yours,

Jean Longuet.

LIUANCHOW AFFAIR

Big Sword Society Bandits in Anhui Not So Black As Painted

From Our Own Correspondent.

Anking, An., July 21.

The authorities here have been kept busy by the activites of the Big Sword Society at Liuanchow, where reports credit their their numbers at 4,000 to 5,000. It is believed, however, that the number is greatly exaggerated and that 1,000 is more nearly accurate.

The fact that the Governor is disturbed over the situation, therefore, is not because of the large number of bandits, but because of their declared political motives. It appears, as the Reuter's telegrams from Peking indicate, that the objective of these bandits, who make themselves "invulnerable" by drinking the Taoist charm "dope" called fu, is not to riot, rape and rob defenceless towns and villages, but to overthrow the established officials and bring about their own ideas of justice and government.

The recent reports from eye-witnesses of the Liuanchow affair assert that little injury was done to private individuals—and their businesses—nor was the Post Office molested: and that the carrying off of foreigners, a Father and a Brother of the Catholic Church in that city, was not for ransom but with the idea of securing some protection from Tuli Ma's troops.

Flood Reports Exaggerated.

The floods reported recently as being general throughout the Yangtze provinces have not done much damage as yet in Anhui. In fact practically no rain has fallen so far this month. Though the river is very high and people in low-lying villages do their washing from their own door-steps there has been no serious appeal for flood relief from any section of the province.

An effort is being made to reorganize the International Famine Relief Committee in accordance with the plan of the general committee in Peking as carried out in other provinces. It is proposed to have six or eight members here, four at Wuhu and two at Pengpu—an equal number of Chinese and foreigners—which should constitute the permanent provincial committee.

NO SERIOUS FIGHTING IN KUANGTUNG

Gen. Chen "Standing Pat" and Dr. Sun in Need of Funds for Troops

Canton, July 22.

Neither Dr. Sun Yat-sen's nor Gen. Chen Chiung-ming's followers have been able to make any headway against one another during the last two months. Gen. Chen appears to be satisfied with the territory he now holds, while Dr. Sun is unable to make any further advance owing to lack of financial support. The abler and more influential commanders on both sides are helping themselves to the strips of land they are supposed to be defending, and the fighting in Kuangtung latterly has been between these bandit-troops and the local inhabitants, who are resisting further illegal military taxes. There have also been quarrels amongst rivals in Dr. Sun's army, who are scrambling for larger spheres of influence or more lucrative offices. Kuangtung's sufferings are not only those caused by the floods, but also by the disorganized, undisciplined, greedy and unfed troops, whom their Commander-in-Chief has not been able to support since July 7.

Dr. Sun, however, has the advantage of Gen. Chen in possessing Canton and some 19 districts around the city, which the Cantonese army under one of Sun's loyal commanders claims to hold. Land in Canton is worth more than that at Waichow and other cities, occupied by Gen. Chen. Dr. Sun is considering the sale of the last piece of large Government property, but it is doubtful whether he will receive a good price for it. He is offering for sale the compound of the Judicial Department, which contains the supreme, high and district courts of Canton, and also the garden and buildings now used as the Kuangtung Library. He calculates that he will get $500,000 for the first and $300,000 for the second sale.

East and South-Western Kuangtung is still under the control of General Chen's followers. He has established judicial courts within his sphere of influence and is assuming every function of government, not neglecting, of course, the duty of taxation. The Yunnanese mercenaries, nominally under Dr. Sun, have established themselves in Canton and the vicinity, along the North River and in cities around Sheklung, near the mouth of the East River. The Hunanese mercenaries and others are located around Sheklung and Poklo, east of Canton.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

A report printed in the "Seoul Press" states that Mr. Richardson, manager of the Singer Sewing Machine Co. in Seoul, has been fined approximately Y.4,000 for smuggling tobacco into Japan. Kozo Saigo, a Japanese clerk of the company, it was reported, was fined about Y.600 for complicity, Kaniehi Kubo of the company's branch at Heijo, Y.1,500 for being in the plot, and another fine of nearly Y.1,000 for a similar offence was inflicted upon Kaoru Fukuma of the Shin Gishu branch. Mr. Richardson and Saigo are said to have paid their fines.

JAPAN'S EYES ON SAGHALIEN

Mr. Yoshizawa's Recent Trip: Conflict of Japanese Civil and Military Policy

From Our Own Correspondent.

Peking, July 23.

Mr. Yoshizawa, the Japanese Minister, has returned from Saghalien, and is expected in Peking in a few days' time. He may then be able to tell us what in the world took him up there, for as yet no reasonable explanation has been given. One can only speculate that Japan, in her negotiations with the Soviet, is merely playing for time. By sending the Japanese Minister to Peking on a tour of investigation, the Government gave the impression that the status of Saghalien was still the subject of discussion in Tokyo and maintained the atmosphere, as it were, of Russo-Japanese conversations.

The more one studies the problem, the more one is impressed with the difficulty with which Japan is faced. The General Staff in Tokyo are not in need of Mr. Yoshizawa's report on the situation in the first stepping-off stone from the Siberian coast-line to Japan's breakwater of islands. They know the territory much better than he does. They also appreciate its peculiar importance.

On no other subject, it may be hazarded, is the attitude of the Japanese militarists so adamant and it now rests with them to win over the new Government and public opinion. Viscount Kato is already pledged to unconditional evacuation, but a man in opposition is not the same man in office, as Britons well know. Public opinion, however, is not subject to the such sudden fluctuation, and one hears that Kato's stand when he was out of office is meeting with growing support. Be that as it may, Japan was forced out of Siberia as much by the pressure of her own people as by the opinion of the outside world, and the situation in Northern Saghalien is an expression of the same policy that animated the militarists at the time of the allied intervention. The stress placed on the Nikolaievsk massacre in relation to Northern Saghalien is apparently not shared in foreign countries, for the Hughes Note at the time of the Washington Conference stated baldly that America expected Japan to evacuate the occupied territory and ignored the main event leading up to the occupation.

Several conferences with Russia have already been broken up by Japanese reluctance to part with occupied territory; it remains to be seen whether the old policy still prevails. The Nippon Dempo picturesquely applies the saying "To go for wool and return shorn" to Mr. Yoshizawa's visit to Tokyo; which argues that the militarists have given the cold shoulder to his liberalizing tendencies.

One hundred and 38 of the passengers and 54 of the crew are reported to have been drowned. Eighteen passengers and five of the crew landed in lifeboats at Notoro Village.

The cause of the disaster is variously reported as the vessel having struck rocks or collided with another vessel.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

TWELVE YEARS FOR SIKH POLICEMAN

For Attempted Murder in Hankow: Sergeant's Terrible Injuries

After an absence of 15 minutes the jury at H. M. Court, Hankow, on Thursday of last week brought in a verdict of guilty against Bishin Singh, an Indian police constable indicted for the attempted murder of the No. 1 Sergeant in the British Municipal Police. On the following day, his Honour Judge Sir Skinner Turner sentenced accused to 12 years imprisonment with hard labour. Addressing the prisoner, his Lordship said he had given a lot of thought to the case. Accused had a good record. For some reason or other not ascertained he had attempted to murder Kishin Singh with a knife and it was only by the mercy of God that he had not killed him.

The Crown Advocate (Mr. H. P. Wilkinson) prosecuted and Mr. R. A. Frost defended.

Prisoner pleaded not guilty.

The case for the Crown was that on June 10 at about 3.30 in the morning several Sikh constables in the police barracks were awakened by hearing cries of murder, coming from the No. 1's quarters at the top of the building. The first arrivals on the scene found the No. 1 grappling with the accused Bishin Singh on his verandah. By that time the No. 1 had been badly sliced with a meat chopper sustaining wounds on the jaw, side, shoulders, and leg. He was taken to the Roman Catholic Hospital where he was attended to by Dr. Lyon Brown, who found him in a collapsed condition through loss of blood.

Evidence was given by police constables that they had been awakened by cries of "murder" coming from the Sergeant's quarters, their sleeping quarters being on the floor below. Those who appeared there first had seen the sergeant and accused struggling while those who arrived later found the sergeant seated on a chair with blood pouring from his wounds. When Inspector Harper arrived he had the injured man taken to the hospital for treatment.

Victim's Ghastly Injuries.

Dr. Lyon said that on his arrival at the Roman Catholic Hospital at 3.40 a.m. he found the sergeant in a collapsed condition and bleeding profusely from the head, body and legs. Witness recognized him as the No. 1 Sergeant and asked him what had happened, but he was unable to answer. Witness then put him on the operating table and proceeded, assisted by Mr. Joseph Wong, to make a thorough examination. As the hemorrhage was profuse and he was suffering a great deal of pain, he was chloroformed. He had one wound, four inches in length on the head, which had fractured the jaw bone. Two wounds were inflicted on his left leg.

A 10-inch gash was ripped across his chest, four inches of it being to the depth of his ribs, the remaining six inches being only skin deep. His shoulders and back bore nine wounds and 12 scratches. Both hands were cut.

The sergeant was in a very weak state after the operation, and it was feared that there might be a permanent paralysis of the muscles that were severed in the jaw. The bone was wired and the result is satisfactory. Two large blood vessels had been cut in the four major wounds.

The Defence.

Mr. R. A. Frost stated that the case was peculiar in that he had only one witness, the accused, whom he wished placed in the witness box.

Accused, in evidence, stated that he was awakened by cries of "Murder" on the early morning of the June 10 and proceeded to the sergeant's room where the cries came from. He was accompanied by Constables 19 and 8. There he found the sergeant bleeding from several wounds, and he took him by the arm and led him to a chair. He said there was no enmity between him and the sergeant, only that the sergeant had reprimanded him a few days previously for not handling traffic properly when he was on point duty. The blood on his clothes must have come from the sergeant when he was leading him to a chair.

When questioned as to some of his statements in the lower court about the sergeant telling the other constables to bring accused to him so that he could rub some of his blood on his clothes, and that the Sergeant wished to lay a false accusation against him he replied that this was a mistake. Accused made the same reply when it was pointed out to him that in the lower court he said that he saw the Sergeant sitting in a chair in a wounded condition, and that now he said he found him standing and helped him to a chair.

In his closing address, the Crown Advocate said there seemed little doubt but that this attack must have been made from the inside, as witnesses had pointed out there was a man constantly on duty at the entrance gate and other two in the charge room. It was unlikely that an outsider could pass these three without detection. Further there was no way in by the back and this was the only route an assailant could enter by. They had the direct evidence of several constables that they saw the No. 1 Sergeant grappling with the accused when they first entered the Sergeant's quarters. The injured man himself recognized his assailant. It was extraordinary if this charge had been a put up job, as the accused had hinted, as none of the police in the force had backed up the accused in this. In view of all this counsel for the prosecution advised that the charge of "intent to murder" be brought in rather than the lighter offence of "doing bodily harm."

Lack of Motive.

Mr. R. A. Frost, for the accused, said he agreed that this was a case which did not call for long arguments. One or two points had struck him in the evidence given. At the time of the attack the only light coming into the Sergeant's room was from a street lamp, and it was after the attack that the lights in the room were switched on. It was possible that the Sergeant asleep with his bed partly on the verandah and partly in the room might have mistaken his assailant. It was a case of a number of witnesses swearing that the accused was the assailant and the other swearing that he was not. The first question is did the assailant intend to kill, if so why did he use a light food chopper? If he had gone just to do some bodily harm to the Sergeant then he could see the force of the weapon he used. The question of motive had not been brought up in the trial.

His Lordship, after pointing out to the jury the difference between the two charges, called upon them to retire to consider the verdict. After a retirement of a quarter of an hour the jury returned a unanimous verdict of guilty with intent to murder.

His Lordship then adjourned the proceedings until the following day, when prisoner would be brought up for sentence.

Twelve Years.

July 25.

Upon being placed in the dock Bishin Singh was asked if he had anything to say why sentence should not be passed upon him. Not the faintest sign of emotion crossed the countenance of the convicted Sikh. To the Judge's question, he replied: "Nothing."

Passing sentence, his Lordship said: "Bishin Singh, I have given a lot of thought to this. I have been endeavouring to find something in your favour. You are a young man with a good record. For some reason or other which we have not ascertained you attempted to murder Bishin Singh with a knife, and it is only by the mercy of God you did not kill him. As it is, the jury from the clearest of evidence have found you guilty of a very serious offence, after everything that could be said for you had been said. I have the power to send you to prison for life. I am not going to do that. I am giving you a sentence which will be a lesson for you and others. I imprison you for 12 years with hard labour. You will be sent to Shanghai and afterwards complete your sentence in India."

BISHIN SINGH'S BID FOR FREEDOM

Escape from Gaolers at Hankow on Eve of Undergoing 12 Years' Imprisonment

Bishin Singh, the Sikh policeman who was sentenced at H.M. Court, Hankow, last week to 12 years' imprisonment for attempted murder, tried to commit suicide in his cell early on Saturday morning following an unsuccessful attempt to escape from his guard before being transferred on board the str. Woosung, which was to bring him to Shanghai.

According to the "Central China Post" the convicted man was to leave on Saturday at 3 a.m. for imprisonment at Shanghai. About 12.30 he asked that a box of his private effects might be brought to him as he had I. O. U.'s to the value of $8,000 which he wanted. When in the police force, Bishin said he acted as a kind of banker for the other Sikhs. After going through his box he asked a Sikh to take it back to his old quarters. This the Sikh did. As soon as he was gone the prisoner felled the Chinese guard with a blow and made a bolt for it. The Chinese went pluckily after him, however, blowing his constable's whistle.

The chase continued till about opposite Molchanoff's Godowns where a Chinese plain clothes constable happened to be passing. Seeing what had occurred he tackled the prisoner, tripped him up and effected his capture.

After being put in the cells again the constable in charge said that he heard a queer noise issuing from the prisoner's cell. On investigation the prisoner was found with his throat cut. A small Chinese razor was found beside him. Medical assistance was immediately summoned and the prisoner removed to the Catholic Hospital.

The wound is not considered dangerous.

STORMY WEATHER AT CHEFOO

Small Craft Washed Away: New Road to Fusanhsien: Fire Brigade Reorganized

Chefoo, July 23.

Chefoo has had its share of the storms which prevailed throughout North China last week. The rain, though not heavy, is persistent and is still continuing. The new concrete bund has stood up well and shows no damage from the storm. Most of the small craft and bathing rafts along the sea front were washed away and few have been recovered.

The American Asiatic Squadron have now nearly all left for Tsingtao, where they will remain for a few days. They are expected to return to Chefoo again on July 25, after which a short manœuvre will be made along the coast. The U. S. naval transport Argonne is due on July 24 bringing new officers to relieve those returning home.

A new road from Chefoo to Fusanhsien has been opened under Chinese management as an extension of the Chefoo-Weihsien motor road. A regular carriage service has been organized.

The hair net and lace industries continue at low ebb. Many Chinese firms unable to stand the strain have been forced into liquidation. A slight demand for pongees had arisen for autumn shipment, but the market in this is again quiet.

The volunteer fire brigade has recently been reorganized and is now composed of five companies, each with three foreigners and seven or eight Chinese firemen. Chemical engines have been purchased and the brigade is well equipped in every way.

Mr. Sun Tan-lin, the former Minister of the Interior, has arrived in Chefoo to transact business in connexion with the new Five Provinces Bank to be organized under the auspices of Marshal Wu Pei-fu. —Reuter's Pacific Service.

LIVING BUDDHA'S SOCIABILITY

Welcomes Visits of Europeans at Lanchow: Cossack Gen. Annenkoff Freed

From Our Own Correspondent.

Lanchow, Kan., June 19.

Among the little foreign community in this city, perhaps the three most interesting events during the past month have been the arrival of the great Living Buddha, the Panchan Lama, the visit of Gen. Annenkoff, the Cossack commander from Siberia, and an exhibition held in the Mission Hospital, at which the Governor, the officials, and many gentry and merchants were present.

The Panchan Lama, second in all Tibet, is still with us. He seems to welcome the visits of Europeans, and is a quiet man, keenly interested in modern things, with an engaging air and almost seraphic smile.

To the many thousands of Tibetans who have come down to see him he is a god. It is pathetic to see these poor travel-stained pilgrims, trailing over the mountains with their loads on their backs, often barefoot, and sometimes footsore. Some of the Tibetan women are carrying their babies too, in this hot weather, from their homes 10 or 20 days' journey away, to Lanchow to see this man, and then back again.

Arrival of Gen. Annenkoff

Gen. Annenkoff is alert, lean, capable. He was kept as a hostage in Tihuafu for four years, till his troops had all been removed from the district, but the stories of his being manacled, etc., I learnt from his own lips were false. He brought some beautiful horses to Lanchow, one from the German Imperial stable, one an Arab, and others to the number of 20 or 30. Some have been sold here. The party now numbers only 13, and they hope to go to India through Szechuan if they are allowed to. The bizarre effect of their attire, cap on one side, a front lock and side lock of hair alone allowed to grow, their smart blue uniforms, with striped scarlet trousers, was very noticeable, when they first came. They are to be congratulated on preserving so much of their soldierly bearing and appearance, after all they have undergone.

Our genial Postmaster, Mr. N. B. Doodba, suggested the invitation of the officials and on a later date, of the gentry to inspect the mission hospital. Exhibits were prepared in the various departments, and the guests were able to observe the circulation of the blood through a tadpole's tail, or watch operations in the theatre, or the washing out of a dilated stomach, or surgical dressings or dispensing, at their pleasure. They got a glimpse into the inner working of an inland hospital that was an eye opener to many of them. As a result, some handsome donations have been promised.

Governor's Prayer for Rain Answered

City roads are being made up, macadamized is perhaps too strong a word, and the result looks good. The question is, will it last? There is no steamroller to compress the rubble, and North China cart-wheels have cogs like iron edges to spoil anything that can be spoiled.

Rains have now fallen in abundance and the dread of a drought has passed. Rain processions were frequent a few days ago, even the Governor himself went on foot at the head of his troops to pray for rain.

SHANGHAI MOTOR-BUSES AT LAST

Service Due to Start in August: Russians to Drive and Classes for Conductors: Unusual Colour Design: Company's Slogan "Every Passenger a Seat"

Shanghai is to be served by a fleet of motor omnibuses at last. The China General Omnibus Company intends to put out the first part of its fleet before the end of August, and as the months go on and they gain experience from the working of the first batch of 'buses, other routes will be decided on, and by November it is hoped to have a fleet of 40, at least six of which will be double-deckers, on the roads.

The company will commence operations on what is known as Route IX, that is from the Bund to Avenue Haig, with six buses and a six minute service which will be either accelerated or slowed down as the circumstances seem to require; but always the convenience of the public will be studied.

Unusual Features.

There are many unusual features in the way in which the company intends to work, from a Shanghai point of view, not the least of which is their main slogan, "For every passenger a seat." The 'buses are large and roomy, and absolutely no standing will be allowed. If it is found that at first people have to wait for 'buses as a result, then more machines will be put into service until there is room for all. Another excellent feature, particularly in Shanghai with its money difficulties, is that no coppers will be given or accepted. If a passenger tenders a 20 cent piece for, say, a 15 cent fare, he will receive in exchange a metal token worth five cents. This he can use to pay his fare on the company's 'buses at some other time, or, if he wishes, he can exchange it for cash at the company's offices in Arnhold Buildings.

A "North-China Daily News" representative spent a fascinating afternoon on Monday being conducted over the temporary works at Yangtszepoo, and seeing the 'buses in their various stages of construction.

An Experiment in Conductors.

Before going down to the works, however, our reporter was taken into a classroom where a number of Chinese were being trained as conductors. These men have been especially chosen for the work, and they are of a much more intelligent type than the men used for the same work on the tramways. This is an experiment on the company's part whereby they hope to get men able to converse intelligently with their passengers on such subjects as fares and routes, and who will, in addition, prove courteous. Because the company's officers believe that a tired employee is seldom a courteous employee, they are working their men in shifts of from four to five hours only.

The drivers will be Russians, and these men are also being trained carefully in their work. They are proving apt pupils and can be trusted confidently on the roads.

The machines the company are using are Tilling-Stevens 28-seater omnibuses. These are the famous 'buses used by the London General Omnibus Company; they are also used in many other large towns in England and extensively in Australia, Canada and India. One of their principal beauties from the Shanghai passengers' point of view will be that there is no suggestion of stooping or crouching for any man less than 5 ft. 6in. in height, while a 6ft. 3in. passenger will be able to stand perfectly upright even with a topee on.

No Crushes.

The terrible crushes to which we are subjected on the tramcars here will be conspicuous by their entire absence. The steps, by an ingenious piece of mechanism worked out by a local official of the company, will be raised by a lever before stopping or starting the 'bus, and as soon as a 'bus is full, the steps will be raised back, so that it will be impossible to mount or dismount. There are two doors to each 'bus, one at each end, and one will be used as an exit whilst the other is used as the entrance. This, again, will obviate the unseemly struggles between mounting and dismounting passengers. Neither will there be any distinct classes on each 'bus. The fare will be the same for all passengers, but it will be regulated in such a way that there will be no fear of foreigners and respectable Chinese being crowded out by sweating coolies. Up to date the fares have not been definitely decided upon as far as the smaller sections of the journey are concerned, but from the Bund to Avenue Haig, and vice versa, 20 cents will be charged. The minimum will be five cents. Another innovation the company intends to introduce is books of tickets, which will be sold at a reduction.

The Type of 'Bus.

The type of 'bus the company are using is ideal for Shanghai roads. The engines of the Tilling-Stevens are what is known as "petrol-electric. The petrol engine is, mechanically, absolutely isolated from the differential gear, doing away with gear-box and clutch. This means that no road shocks can possibly be transmitted direct to the engine and those unpleasant jerks and screechings which follow the faulty slipping of gears, etc., are thus done away with. The principle of the petrol-electric engine is very simple. The fly wheel of the petrol engine is connected up with a dynamo, which drives an electric motor, which, in turn, is connected up with the back wheels. Simplicity is the keynote of the control. All speeds are achieved by the resistance lever on the steering column, and consequently the driver can concentrate entirely on his steering; the value of this in Shanghai is very easily realized. The bodies of the cars are built of ash and oak, with polished mahogany inside. The colour design will be rather unusual, being rich blue lined with red. The company's monogram will be in silver framed with red, whilst the Chinese characters will also be in silver. The wheels, also, will be painted to blend with the rest of the car. Inside, the roofs will be painted white, giving a bright and cheery effect to the whole. The windows will be of the frameless variety, sliding up and down as in a London taxi, the only difference between the two being that London taxi windows never do.

Good Progress.

Ten chassis and sets of body works have arrived up to date, and these are being put together with all speed, consistent with thoroughness. The fitting together of a number has already been completed and the work of painting begun. The seats are extremely comfortable, and are covered with the best English leather.

Another great thing about these omnibuses is that the driver is placed alongside and parallel to his motor, instead of behind it. This results in a great saving of space, and in the opinion of many greater accuracy of judgment on the part of the driver.

The company's new garage is situated at the far end of Connaught Road, and is rapidly nearing completion. When finished it should be able to hold a fleet of 50 'buses, and it is hoped to extend it later on as needs require. The company does not, of course, limit itself to 40 machines. If more are necessary they will be brought out here. Quarters are also being built for the drivers and at a later date permanent office buildings will be added.

The Old Bell Punch.

What will strike the local man as being very homely will be the method adopted by the conductors in punching tickets. They will use the old familiar bell punch in vogue on nearly every tram and 'bus in Great Britain. The tickets will be marked in sections, and punched at that section to which the passenger is travelling. Each bus will also contain a map of the route situated in a prominent position and clearly marked with all the roads which branch from it, and with the sections; very similar, in fact, to the maps provided on the underground railways in London.

Whether the fleet will comprise more double-deckers than single-deckers when it is completed will depend on which is found the more convenient.

Following are the routes on which the company hopes to operate as time goes on:—

Route 1.—1st class only.—Szechuen Road and Extension, Dixwell Road for nearly one mile, and back.

Route II.—1st class only.—Szechuen Road, North Szechuen Road and Extension, Dixwell Road for nearly one half mile and back.

Route III.—1st class only—Junction of North Szechuen Road Extension and Dixwell Road to a point on the Kiangwan Road about a quarter of a mile beyond Hongkew Park and back.

Route IV.—1st and 2nd class.—Bund, Broadway and Muirhead Road, and back by East Seward Road to the Bund.

Route V.—1st and 2nd class.—Honan Road, North Honan Road, Boundary Road, North Shanse, Road, Elgin Road, North Honan and Honan Roads.

Route VI—1st and 2nd class.—New Engineering Works, along Yangtszepoo Road, Broadway, Chaufoong Road, East Yuhang-Tungchow Road, East Yalu-Urga Road, Dixwell Road to meet cars of Route 11 and back.

Route VII.—1st and 2nd class.—Foochow Road, Thibet Road, Peking Road and Bund, and vice versa.

Route VIII.—1st and 2nd class.—Peking Road, Thibet Road, Avenue Road (when widened) or Burkill Road to Carter and Bubbling Well Roads.

Route IX.—1st class.—Avenue Edward VII, Avenue Foch to Avenue Haig.

It should be understood that the 'buses themselves will be first and second class 'buses, and there will be no distinct classes on each 'bus.

A PICTURESQUE LOTTERY SCHEME

Shanghai Merchant's Offer to Peking

A scheme which will commend itself to those interested in the ingenious and picturesque was reported on Monday in the "Shunpao." This journal published a telegram purporting to have come from Peking, to the effect that a Jewish merchant of Shanghai has gone to Peking with an offer to loan the Government $2,000,000. The conditions of the loan are to be that the syndicate be permitted to organize and conduct a lottery in Shanghai, "ostensibly," (we quote the report) "for famine and flood relief." Further, they ask to be allowed to transport to Shanghai curios from the Palace of the ex-Emperor, these to be distributed by way of lottery prizes.

Such a cool proposal is doubly acceptable in these excessively warm days.

S. V. C. AND POLICE RAID FOR ARMED ROBBERS

Corps Mobilized and Notorious Foochow Road District Combed Out

The members of the S.V.C. last Friday evening added to their many activities a distinctly novel duty and one which, even though it did not achieve the full results hoped for, was not without its effects. In brief, they were mobilized to assist the Municipal Police in an attempt to comb one of the worst rookeries in the Settlement, known to the police to be the headquarters and hiding place of a very big and well-organized gang of armed robbers, arms and opium smugglers and miscellaneous miscreants. Its evil reputation is completed by the fact that within its area more than one shooting affray has occurred, in which policemen have been shot. The quarter is behind Thibet Road, off Foochow Road.

One Good Result

The Volunteers received what appeals to one now as rather too long a warning for mobilization and though the men were not made fully acquainted with the plan of action, the idea leaked out and it was fairly common knowledge amongst the foreign population that a raid in conjunction with the police was intended. If the information got as far as that it cannot be doubted that it also passed to the knowledge of the gang whose capture was sought and in such circumstances it is not surprising that the raid had very small results. Yet it can be imagined that one good purpose has been served. The police are well acquainted with the men they were after and had full details of their hiding places, but in such a warren it is practically impossible for a few score men to make any considerable capture. At the first alarm the gang naturally scatters and, with scores of exits to choose from, the majority must escape. After the happenings of last night, it is a certainty that fresh headquarters will be sought and men on the run or in unfamiliar places are by no means the danger they would be in familiar surroundings.

Drawing the Net.

All arms of the S.V.C. were warned for the parade and mustered on the Recreation Ground shortly after 9 p.m., in marching order and with ball ammunition. It is to the credit of the Corps that it was a very good parade, probably at least 70 per cent., if not more, being in attendance. The circumstances of the mobilization were briefly explained by the officers, after which the troops formed column and marched to Thibet Road, from where each unit dispersed to its appointed station.

The whole of the block was enclosed with a ring of bayonets, patrols traversed each street, double sentries guarded the mouth of each alleyway or outlet and mounted pickets of the Light Horse and Mounted Troop patrolled the vicinity of parts where a rush might be made and where they easily could cut down any fugitives. In addition the Engineers wired the ends of many of the streets, whilst the armoured cars and machine-guns were stationed where their devastating fire would have had the most effect.

The Search Begun

Many of the police already were on hand when the Volunteers took position and practically simultaneously with the arrivals of the troops, motor-cars and lorries drove up with strong detachments of the regular and reserve police. Certain of these were left at street corners outside the cordon, with handcuffs swinging ready at their belts, so that any fugitive who had the wonderful luck to escape all the police and Volunteers inside, but who would be certain to be captured on the outskirts, could be dealt with immediately.

No time was wasted and at 10 o'clock, by which hour all details were ordered to be in position, the police and reserves commenced their search. The orders to the cordon were to allow anyone who had the nerve to pass within the ring of bayonets, but on no account was anyone to be allowed to come out. The Volunteers interpreted their instructions very literally and doddering old men and women were turned back the same as healthy young men, silks equally with rags. At first some of the Chinese showed a measure of resentment, but it was useless to argue with such a show of force and after very few minutes they accepted the inevitable. No great attention was paid to the traffic on the outskirts, but every few minutes two or three specials would hold up a motor-car, carriage or riesha on chance and gave good examples of the thoroughness with which they conduct a search.

Up Go the Shutters

The area searched was that part enclosed by Pakhoi Road, Yunnan Road, Hoihow Road, Kwangse Road, Canton Road, Foochow Road, and Chêkiang Road. There was a complete cessation of anything sensational, the only excitement being in the teahouses and shops in the district, the staffs of which, immediately they saw what was happening, scampered about in a fever heat to run up their shutters and gates, from behind which they peered first with anxious but later with smiling faces. As previously indicated, the search was not productive of very much. Such a raid could not occur without the police getting something out of it and they secured much information which probably will prove valuable and they renewed acquaintance with many people who would have preferred to pass unnoticed, but the main object was not achieved.

The Community's Thanks

All units of the S.V.C. were mobilized except the Field Artillery, the Maritime, Chinese, Portuguese and Italian Companies (who all would have done as much and as willingly had it been considered necessary to call upon them) and the thanks of the community are due to all on parade for their public-spirited behaviour. The search was called off about 11 p.m.

IRREGULARITIES OF POST OFFICE

Newspapers Sent to Peitaiho Not One of Which Ever Reached the Reader

The irregularities of the Chinese Post Office have long become one of those irritating facts accepted with as much resignation as possible by the Shanghai business community. On the 11th ultimo one of our readers came to this office, and said he was taking a short holiday to Peitaiho; he was starting out the same day; therefore, would we please send on to him his usual copy of the "North-China Daily News." He left as arranged that same day and arrived at Peitaiho on the 15th ultimo, and left again on the 19th. His papers were despatched to him from this office daily from the 11th and the first copy should have been received on the 15th at the latest. From then onwards a steady service of papers should have been received by him until he left. Instead of that, however, he failed to receive a single copy.

In bandit-infested provinces in the interior, where everything is uncertain, such lapses are to a large extent excusable. But we fail to see the slightest excuse for mails going astray up and down the coast. There are steamers and there are reasonably good railways with which no-one interferes. This service should be as regular as any in the world. Yet mail still goes astray and it is possible to despatch at least four newspapers on succeeding days without one arriving at its destination. How many of the others went astray it is not possible to say, inasmuch as Mr. Morriss left the port on the fourth day. For some reason or other newspaper mail suffers worse in this way than letter mail. Letters seem to arrive at their destinations fairly regularly. But newspapers would seem to be a sort of nobody's child.

SUB-INSP. C. Powell, of the Traffic Branch of the Municipal Police, was presented with a handsome leather suit-case by his associates at Central Station, on the occasion of his departure within a few days on Home leave. Chief Insp. Young made the presentation at the Sub-Inspectors' Mess at tiffin on Saturday. Mr. Powell will leave for England, viâ Canada and the Unites States, by the str. Empress of Russia to-day.

THE MUNICIPAL STORY TELLER

Picturesque Figure of the Tea Houses Employed by Traffic Department to Train Chinese in the Difficult Art of Not Walking on the Road Way

Such is the text of the Municipal Story Teller, him of the mellifluous Soochow accents, the scholar's grave look, the dignified mien, and, yes, the spectacles of wisdom. Mounting a table in the largest of the Foochow Road tea-houses, he looks around the room which opens on balconies in front and is lined with mirrors at either end. He notes the elegant ladies, gay in their summer jackets of embroidered gauze, their more plainly dressed sisters in blue or white, the men of varied walks of life.

The Story Teller shakes out his black fan and begins: "This person is by profession a relater of imagined tales, whose feeble efforts having come to the attention of the Guardians of the Settlement and specially the Preservers of Safety upon the thoroughfares of this City above the Sea, he has been detailed to uplift his voice wherever men congregate in tea-houses, outside the doors of busy factories, or fair or temple, telling them of the perils which lurk by the roadside for the unwary and counselling all of the proper use of the highway to the end that these who open their ears to the wisdom of the Municipal Fathers may be ensured against the dangers of the road and the woes which descend upon the careless traveller. For it has been truly spoken that he who jostles not the motor-car is better advised than he who trieth conclusions with the horseless wagon whose food and drink is the ill-smelling gasoline and whose voice is as the sounding of a hundred trumpets."

Haec Fabula Docet.

By this time even the aristocratic patrons lolling in the reclining chairs set against the walls are listening and the scholar continues: "This teller of tales will now proceed to recount one of the histories of the Tang Dynasty of General Sih, well-known to the well-informed audience which I behold." Then in well-turned phrases and in flowery images the story-teller recounts one of the classic tales of General Sih, the only son of his parents, who was possessed of so prodigious an appetite that in one day he ate five catties of rice. He did not speak until he was 15 years old, nor did he work at any profession, amusing himself with the practice of the military arts. His parents died early and soon the estate left him was exhausted because of the demands of his gigantic appetite, so that he finally tried to commit suicide by hanging. He was, however, cut down by a man named Wong, who took him home and employed him as farmer and hunter, making him work very hard. While in this pitiful condition he chanced one day to see a military official being chased by a tiger and perceivng the official to be in danger he caught hold of the tiger and beat it to death.

The grateful official made him an officer in the army and he afterwards became of royal rank, and his fame exists to this day. "Now the swift motor-car and the clanging tram are just like tigers, and if you do not take care to watch the constable at the corners and obey his signals you will not live to grow old and acquire many sons, but will be killed and your sons too, so that your ancestral tablets will go untended. 'The Road is like a Tiger's Mouth; From its centre keep away.'"

A Look in Time Saves Nine.

"The honourable audience will agree that it is better to attend, give heed to the traffic regulations than to have one's substance depleted by funeral processions which afford but scant pleasure to the person riding in the coffin, and that it is more profitable to linger on the foot-path till the right of way is given than to while away a weary month in the hospital. Moreover has not a generous Council provided us with foot-paths, and how should we then act like the country fellow who wandereth in the middle of the road?

"Do not be puffed up with pride because you are being conveyed in carriages or richas or even barrows, for of a surety the duty of causing the same to conform to the traffic regulations is incumbent upon you. And when business calls you to the other side of the road, gaze sharply to the left and to the right and, seeing no motors approaching, traverse the space directly and speedily, not as one who strolleth in the moonlight with the Keeper of his Affections but more in the manner of him who hasteth home to a feast."

In some such fashion the scholar pointed out that most of the traffic accidents were avoidable and explaining the reasons for the rules of the road, also exhibiting the illustrated posters which the Traffic Department has had prepared to illustrate the dangers to which careless pedestrians expose themselves, the folly of jumping from moving trams, overloading richas, rushing through traffic to catch trams, and the like. The audience was asked not to shout for richas unless the way was clear, because the coolies in their anxiety to secure a fare took terrible chances, and the speaker closed with an appeal to his hearers to pass on this advice to their friends and relatives.

Practical Instruction.

The Traffic section of the Municipal Police Force adopted this means of instructing the Chinese public in the traffic regulations in June, 1923, and the letters received from factory owners and tea-house proprietors indicate warm appreciation of the service rendered. The actual good accomplished cannot be checked, but it is believed that this graphic instruction, given in the manner which most appeals to the Chinese hearer is lessening preventible accidents. To see the expression on the face of the story teller as he points his moral and adorns his tale or indulges in some witty quip is as good as going to a pantomime. And the audience itself! How it hangs on the speaker's words! How quick it is to see a point! How stirred by the suggestion of tragedy!

Those who feel with "Ulysses" who wrote in the Correspondence Column of July 24, that "nothing is done to train the natives to keep off the roadway," should follow the course of this tale-teller, as he plies his trade busily every day, taking the different police-stations a month at a time. And this is by no means the only attempt to preserve life and limb, for posters, giving warnings by pictures, simple explanations of rulings or aphoristic sayings are posted all about town, and especially where the juncture of streets gives opportunity for accidents. Every time a new regulation is made a new poster announces it and notifications affecting ricsha coolies are printed by the thousand for distribution. Mr. Matheson receives a consignment of these slips and the regulations are explained at all the Ricsha Mission meetings. Every accident is recorded on a chart and should any locality seem particularly dangerous, steps are taken to to safeguard it, so that however risky getting about Shanghai may appear at times, it is certain that the safety of the residents, native and foreign, is the outsanding concern of an alert Traffic Department.

CAFES AT JESSFIELD CLOSED

All My Pretty Chickens At One Fell Swoop: How Much for a Chapei Licence?

On Monday afternoon an Inspector of the Chinese police called at Bubbling Well police station and requested assistance in closing the cafes at Jessfield. Accompanied by two foreign officers, he visited these various establishments and formally closed them, the Welcome Café, Western Café, Jessfield Inn and Jessfield Restaurant coming under the official ban.

The proprietors were informed that they will be allowed to reopen their establishments as soon as licenees have been obtained from the Chapei authorities. Is it to be inferred that official anxiety in the matter was purely a question of revenue?

Lt.-Cdr. G. S. Hole, R.N., Hongkong's new harbour master, arrived in the Colony by the P. & O. S. Mantua on July 24. He was due to take up his duties immediately.

WEDDINGS

Westbrook-Ellyson

The Rose Gardens, Shanghai College, which have been developed by the President, Dr. White, looked as though they had been created for the wedding of Dr. Charles Hart Westbrook and Miss Louise Coby Ellyson. Service was solemnized by Rev E. M. Poteat and a reception was given immediately after the wedding to a few friends. Dr. and Mrs. Westbrook left on a honeymoon that same night. They went north intending to end up at Peitaiho. Dr. Westbrook first came to Shanghai College in 1912. His home is at Griffin, Georgia, and he is a Ph. D. of Harvard. He is at the present time Dean of Shanghai College. Miss Ellyson and her mother came to China about a year ago to visit Mrs. Wiley. Mrs. Wiley is a sister of Miss Ellyson. Mr. Wiley is professor of Sociology at the College also the popular athletic director; his best form is seen at baseball. Mrs. Ellyson and daughter are from Richmond, Virginia of an old Richmond family. The family were founders and owners of the "Richmond Dispatch." Mr. Ellyson was always prominent in mission circles. At the time of his death he was President of the Foreign Mission Board of the Southern Baptist Convention. The announcement of this wedding will be a surprise to all except the closest friends, as the party at which it was announced preceded the wedding by only a week. This party was given by Mrs. Gordon Poteat at the College. Dr. and Mrs. Wesbrook will be at home to their friends at Shanghai College after September 1.

Sullivan-Lipscomb

A very pretty wedding took place at St. John's Pro-Cathedral on Thursday when Miss Bess Lipscomb, daughter of Mrs. B. W. Lipscomb, of Nashville (Tennessee) was married to Mr. Philip Beach Sullivan, son of Mr. and Mrs. D. Peyton Sullivan, of Detroit (Michigan), the Rt. Rev. F. R. Graves performing the ceremony. The church was artistically decorated with white flowers and foliage, and looked delightfully cool and summerlike. Mrs. L. W. Fawcett presided at the organ.

The bride, who was given away by her brother, Mr. Sidney R. Anderson, wore a charming gown of Spanish lace, draped over ivory crêpe satin, and her long veil of ivory tulle was caught up with orange blossoms. Miss Frances Sullivan, sister of the bridegroom, acted as bridesmaid, wearing a brocaded georgette crêpe of a delicate shade of pink. The bridegroom was attended by Mr. Robert Pollard as best man and Messrs. Maurice Votaw and Donald Roberts acted as ushers.

Immediately after the ceremony an informal reception was held at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. William Porterfield, of St. John's University, where many friends gathered to congratulate the young couple. Mr. and Mrs. Sullivan left for their honeymoon trip to Hankow and Kuling last evening, and will be at home to their friends after September 1 at St. John's. Mrs. Sullivan has been connected with the Margaret Williamson Hospital for Chinese Women, and Mr. Sullivan is the acting head of the department of Economics at St. John's University.

Residents along the Rubicon Road report that the local Chinese, alarmed at the long drought which is seriously affecting their crops, are taking drastic measures to bring the Rain God to a realization of his duties. The burning of incense and the usual beating of gongs having failed to produce results, the God of Rain has now been taken from his niche in the temples, given a fresh coat of red paint to simulate sunburn and carried in long procession through the fields so that he may see for himself how the beans are dying, and also realize how uncomfortable the burning sun makes his injured votaries. To propitiate the gods, who do not believe in killing animals, especially pigs, the edict has gone forth that no meat is to be killed or eaten and the farmers are now living on fish, obtained in great part by scooping the water out of the drying ponds. One procession is reported to have taken an hour in passing a given point—of course there were gaps in the line, but only one procession—and there were 30 great blue and white dragons carried by the participants.

A PICTURE OF COMMUNISM AS PRACTISED IN RUSSIA TO-DAY

"Lover of Russia" Describes Conditions as They Are and Why She Does Not Advise Russian Repatriation: Promises with Conditions Explained Later

The earnest tone of one letter published in our correspondence columns to-day, over the signature "A Lover of Russia," led a representative of the "North-China Daily News" to visit its writer to ascertain the circumstances which led to her writing with so much feeling. The lady in question was only too glad to tell of her experiences in Russia and to explain the reason for the stand taken in her letter in the hope that it might correct what she believes to be some current misapprehensions.

Born in Russia, of Danish parents, she spent her youth near Moscow and in the Caucasus district, receiving the usual Gymnasium training and completing the Eighth Class, which implies the Latin training necessary for a girl to enter the Russian Universities. Next she was sent by her parents to a Convent school in England in order to gain a knowledge of that tongue, which she now speaks fluently, and after a year in England she studied for some two years in Denmark. Returning to Russia she taught for some time in Riga, then married a Russian. After the Revolution she came with many other refugees to Tomsk, in Siberia, where she taught for some time in the large Polytechnic School there, but when the Soviet took charge of education and she had to apply to them for permission to teach, she refused to continue and with her husband and others started an agricultural colony 35 versts from Tomsk, where they soon had 220 acres of land under cultivation. In May, 1918, the counter-attack upon the Bolsheviks occurred. Her husband volunteered and was killed in one of the first battles, others were mobilized, and soon only a few women were left in the colony, which had to be abandoned.

Returning to Tomsk after teaching for a time near Irkutsk, she worked with the American Red Cross until the advance of the Red Army caused that work to be given up and she was evacuated with other Red Cross workers to Vladivostok, early in 1920, where she remained working with the Danish Mission till it closed and then giving private lessons until she came to Shanghai in February, 1924.

"Personally Conducted Soviet Tours."

With regard to the situation in Siberia and Russia, the writer is frankly pessimistic. "As for such books as "Through Bolshevik Russia" by Mrs. Philip Snowden, or Arthur Ransome's book, they have seen only what the Bolsheviks want them to see," she declares. "They are true in part, but there is much, much, that they do not know. The Reds can make good promises. In 1918 it was 'Peace and Bread,' but did we get it? Lenin looked upon Russia as a laboratory for his communistic experiments, and its people as rabbits for vivisection. When he failed he said, 'We could not help it, as naively as a child who has made a mistake. But that did not give life to the dead or food to the hungry.

"When I first came to Vladivostok in 1920 it was not so bad. It was not Soviet rule but the Far Eastern Republic and then the Whites took it again until October 28, 1922. Vladivostok was not really Red until after that time, but in all the territory around they were saying 'Wait till the Reds are really in Vladivostok. Then you shall see.' But they were moderate at first. Perhaps they were afraid of the Japanese, perhaps because there were so many foreigners there. They sent word in advance; 'Do not leave. We shall not do anything to our adversaries. We are all Russians and we want all Russians to remain.'

"Communistic Peonage."

"But soon long lists were made up. The Reds said they would send the refugees home, but it was not out of consideration for them, but to prevent a strong White unit in Vladivostok. They arbitrarily sent men back to the place where they were born, although their families might not have lived there for 30 years. Some of them were stopped at the coal mines and forced to work there. Others were given those who had been forced by the Whites to help load the Volunteer ships when they sailed for Shanghai were charged with treason.

"About living conditions in Vladivostok? Food can be had but as soon as the Reds came it began to disappear, and prices rose at once. They discourage private trade and have one big Soviet shop for a large district so that poor people have to wait in line hours for their bread. What they call luxuries, coffee, tea, sugar, cocoa, are very heavily taxed. They expect us to drink water and eat bread, but even bread was expensive and cost 18 cents a pound before I left. Meat was dear, but it could be obtained in abundance because farmers had no grain to feed their stock and had to sell them.

Economic Problems.

"Then too, salaries were very low. A typist would get gold Roubles 30 a month, and the rouble is about equal to a Mexican dollar or a little over a yen. From this she must give taxes to the Trade Union, to the Invalids' Association, to many different things, until she will have only 22 roubles left. One typist got only eight roubles but received supplies. An engineer or specialist received only 42 roubles. They call this democratic, but all those in Government offices received better wages. One typist in the Soviet Foreign Bureau got 90 roubles. They do not want any private firms, and no one can conduct foreign trade without permission from the Bureau of Foreign Trade. Foreigners, it is true, can live well, because they can get their money from their home firms; but how long will it last? I think all outside firms will be forced out soon.

"When travellers write about the good schools in Siberia, I wonder if it is not because the old régime schools are being continued, not because the Reds have improved conditions. At any rate in Vladivostok, the Commercial High School was in the charge of a very capable man. He loved his school and fought to keep it in good condition. Last summer he arranged an excursion of his pupils to Moscow to see the Exhibition, and while he was there he did good work for the school, seeing the officials and getting their permission to continue the school as he wished. So when he returned and the communists said to him 'You must do so and so' he could say, 'No, I have permission from Moscow to do my way.'"

The Woosung and Shanghai Tenants' United Associations have published the text of a strangely worded oath taken by members following the election of a committee to arrange a demonstration. The oath may be translated thus:—As house rents in Woosung and Shanghai are increasing every day, the tenants find it hard to live. As they are really unequal to bearing the burden, associations have been formed to represent them in making appeals to local authorities for some relief. We hereby swear that we shall indomitably follow our course, and never desist even if we should meet a hundred obstacles, until we have gained our object. We swear by our honour as men. May we become the enemy of all if we act otherwise.

A Chinese found suffering from a bullet wound during a police raid on 1118 Manila Road recently, was charged at the Mixed Court on Saturday with being a member of an armed gang of robbers. Application was made that he be handed over to the French police. Det.-Sub.-Insp. Quayle told the Court that when the premises were searched a revolver and 294 rounds of ammunition were found concealed under a bed. He understood that the accused was implicated with six men arrested by the French Police as armed robbers. It was believed there had been shooting over the division of the spoils, and another man who was also shot at the same time had since died in hospital. An order was made for the accused to be handed over to the French Police.

SNAKES IN THE C.M.S. KIANGFU

Miraculous Monsters Which Devoured Three of the Crew by Chinese Belief

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

A foreign officer and two sailors killed and eaten by a large snake on a river steamer is a story which is being told by the wharf coolies and sailors of the China Merchants Steam Navigation Company.

"Tall" snake stories have been told by both foreign and Chinese regarding the snakes of Shanghai and Ningpo, but certainly the chief prize of the Annanias club belongs to the party who started the following snake story. The wharf coolies believe it, so it must be true.

According to the story, it seems that two snakes, a male and female, have made the chain locker of the s.s. Kiangfu their home for the past few years and the master of the steamer has always ordered the boatswain to detail two sailors to feed the snakes with the choicest and daintiest parts of the foreign and Chinese mess. These snakes according to the story were able to change themselves from very large to so small that they were invisible to human eye, they were in fact "Joss" snakes.

The First Real Meal.

About six months ago the female either died or at any rate disappeared and the male has been getting more cross and angry to those that fed him and when fed he would sometimes assume a large shape and hiss at the sailors and his breath would cause them to become sick for hours. On the last trip from Hankow the snake became so angry-looking that the sailors have been afraid to go near him and the two delegated to feed him failed to do so. After the vessel had left Hankow the two sailors turned in. In the morning as the vessel was about to reach Kiukiang the sailors were missing and the boatswain notified one of the officers who, after the steamer had left Kiukiang, made an investigation. All that was found was blood all over the clothes and matting of the bunk where the two sailors slept. The officer consulted with the Captain and it was decided to kill the snake as there was no doubt but that he had killed and eaten the two, even to the bones. The officer took his gun and went into the chain locker where he found the snake very much enlarged and heavy with sleep. He fired two shots from the gun into the body, the snake awakened and then made himself so small that he could not be seen. It was thought that he might have escaped to another part of the vessel and a close watch was kept, but he could not be found.

That Was the End of Him.

That night the officer went to his room just after midnight, he had a watch on deck until twelve. In the morning the quartermaster went to call him at 5.30 and saw his head resting on the pillow, but there was no body. The bed clothes were not disturbed and there were no signs of disturbance and no blood. This scared the crew as they knew that the snake was angry and might kill all the crew, so they made "joss" to the "God of the Reptiles" during the rest of the passage. When the vessel arrived in Shanghai they placed the flag at half mast and when the vessel was tied up the whole crew left and would not return any more, neither could the company obtain another crew, so to get rid of the evil spirit of the snake they sold the steamer but only on condition that she should be destroyed and never again be permitted to sail. They knew that, if she was permitted again to sail, all on board would have been destroyed.

The wharf coolies declare that they have seen the snake several times since, always at night and winding himself around the chain with his head out of the hawsepipe apparently looking for more victims. He is still there, they say, and will be until the whole vessel is destroyed and the chain burnt as, if the chain is ever sold to another vessel, the snake will follow with it.

Wharf coolies and sailors who live in Wuchow Road, Hongkew every night beat cymbals and burn "joss sticks" to keep out the spirit of the snake from their houses.

Belong Ploper Talk.

The writer's "boy" told the story as it was told him by one of the sailors and when the writer pointed out the improbability of such a thing the boy said:—

"This b'long ploper talk Master, what for China Merchants sell Kiangfu? What for no can run no more? Plenty Chinese have tell me have got snake on ship, you come long me I take you to plenty Chinaman tell you belong true."

The old Kiangfu is the oldest steamer on the river and came here from the State of Maine, U. S. A., in a sailing vessel over 50 years ago. She has always been considered the "joss" of the China Merchants fleet and the company thought so much of her that when it was decided that her days of usefulness were over as a steamer they would not permit her to be sold other than to be broken up. The flying eagle that was a prominent figure on her mast has been presented to the U. S. Consul-General Mr. E. S. Cunningham.

There may have been snakes aboard at one time or another, but they were of the kind that are only seen in dreams.

CHARGES OF ARMS SMUGGLING

Three Foreigners Arrested in Sampan Coming From an Italian Steamer

ANOTHER large haul of arms was made during the latter part of last week, when a Customs searching party visited the M. M. S. Angkor, finding a plentiful supply of contraband munitions of war in nearly every portion of the vessel—53 pistols and much ammunition in the carpenter's quarters, automatics and clips, some filled with shells in cabins, and in sections devoted to the crew. At the bottom of the ventilators, five bags of guns and supplies were unearthed, members of the party being let down with ropes from the deck and in turn hoisting the weapons to the remainder above. No less than 150 guns and 20,000 rounds were confiscated. We have been informed that the carpenter, who has nearly 30 years of service with the company, was taken to the French gunboat in port and an inquiry instituted.

Three foreigners, alleged to have participated in arms running, were arrested on Monday evening by a Customs party under the command of Boat Officer Fleming near the Chaoufoong Road Jetty—an Italian, a Rumanian and an Afghan. The patrol, cruising along the western bank of the Huangpu, noticed a sampan leave the Italian str. Rosandra, and as it was manœuvred in a peculiar manner, the order was given to overtake it. Fleming commanded it to stop. Coming alongside he noticed that one man, it was found later to be Adriana Cabou, (Italian) was throwing something overboard. To stop this procedure the officer leaped aboard and found that Cabou, his clothes all undone, was frantically attempting to rid himself of two Mauser automatic pistols and 265 rounds of ammunition. The guns had been strapped to the waist beneath the trousers and the shells were in packets, all of which were then seized, while scattered over the bottom of the sampan the party found 50 cartridges.

Cabou was taken to the Italian Consulate on Tuesday and remanded in custody until August 1, and, although a search warrant was issued and his home thoroughly gone over, nothing could be found, police officers believing they arrived too late.

Jules Cottarau, of supposed Rumanian citizenship, but who claimed French protection, was denied this privilege at the French Consulate-General and handed to the City authorities, where he is being held in custody until a date for hearing is set. Accused showed the River Police a permit, which he alleged had been granted him by the French authorities, allowing him to carry one weapon and 40 cartridges.

The Afghan said that he had gone ashore to purchase cigarettes, which statement was borne out by his superiors on the vessel, where he is employed as a watchman.

It will be recalled that Cabou was arrested on May 22, in company with four Frenchmen on charges of smuggling arms, but no case could be made. Cottarau, it is alleged, was connected with the alleged piracy, as reported in these columns, at Chefoo.

On Tuesday morning Superintendent Woodfield appeared at the Japanese Consular Court and gave evidence against a fireman employed on the str. Nagasaki Maru, who it is alleged had attempted to smuggle four pistols ashore —remanded to the higher court.

The Customs searching parties, and the River Police under Superintendent Woodfield, are to be highly commended for their diligence, and for the success that their endeavours have gained them.

THE BUBBLING WELL MAN HUNT

Ricsha Coolie Who Helped to Bring Down Armed Rubber Rewarded with $100

Some few weeks ago a Chinese lady who materially assisted the police in arresting people concerned in a brutal crime received the thanks of the Municipal Police and a scroll of honour, to mark appreciation of services such as are too seldom rendered by Chinese in police matters. Another such presentation has taken place, and it is to be hoped that the two examples will encourage other Chinese to give what help they can in the detection of crime and the arrest of criminals.

In the exciting chase of armed robbers which occurred on the afternoon of Sunday, June 15, beginning near the Burlington Hotel, and ending in the French Concession, a ricsha coolie was directly instrumental in arresting the only uninjured robber of the three who were caught, the others being brought down by revolver fire. This coolie, Chang Ts-ching, was called to police headquarters on Monday and, in the presence of members of the C. I. D. and a number of Chinese detectives, was presented with the sum of $100, together with the thanks of the police for the brave and successful manner in which he tackled the runaway robber.

STRIKES AND HIGH PRICES

The Inkmakers' Dispute Ended: Demonstration Against High Rents in Shanghai

After a tough struggle lasting over 50 days, the Chinese inkmakers of the Wuyuan District in Anhui serving in Shanghai resumed work on Friday. That the men are apparently well satisfied may be judged by the grateful thanks expressed in their letter addressed to the Committee of the Anhui Guild both for free accommodation during their strike and for their kind intervention, although the Chinese Press has made no mention of the terms of settlement.

An increase of wages having been granted to the Chinese shoemakers who had been on strike for three weeks or so, work was resumed on Friday morning.

The Union of Tenants' Associations is planning a great demonstration against the abnormal increase of rents in the Settlement during the last two or three years. A meeting of delegates from all such associations was to be held at the Ningpo Association's Hall on Sunday afternoon to discuss methods of holding this demonstration.

Lengthy correspondence has been exchanged between the Shanghai Chinese General Chamber of Commerce and the Sino-Japanese Industrial Association through the Shanghai Japanese Merchants' Guild, on the subject of Japan's expulsion of Chinese workmen and hawkers. The Chinese complain that while Japanese hawkers of medicine and toilet articles are freely admitted into China without any restriction whatever, Chinese of even a better class are finding obstacles in landing in Japan.

CHINESE PRESS AND ROBBER SCOURGE

Deprecate the "Cat" But Want Punishment of Death for Arms Smugglers!

The Chinese press continues to devote ample space to discussion of ways and means of wiping out the armed robber. The "Siuwanpao" considers that of all the suggestions made, that of the "Echo de Chine" advocating the death penalty for armed robbery and trafficking in arms is the most sound.

A good deal of space is taken up with the matter of forming Chinese patrols, consisting of merchants who would act in the capacity of Special Constables. One report states that a request has been addressed to the Acting Commissioner of Police asking permission for 100 Chinese to patrol North Szechuen Road and South Chêkiang Road.

It is noted that in cases which have hitherto come before the Japanese Consular Court, the maximum penalty has been only 29 days' imprisonment, owing to the offence being treated as a civil one. Now, says the Chinese press, it has been decided by the Japanese that these cases are to come under the criminal code, in which case an offender will be liable to pay a fine of $1,000 or go to prison for two years.

A Cantonese named Tsang Lau, charged at the Mixed Court with being in unlawful possession of two Mauser pistol holsters and 90 rounds of ammunition, has been sent to prison for 12 months.

On Monday afternoon a party of foreign and Japanese police officers raided a Japanese drug store in Baikal Road and, in their search over the premises, discovered 20 automatic pistols and 2,000 rounds of ammunition. The proprietor of the store, and his assistant, have been placed under arrest.

THE "San Francisco Chronicle" of a recent date reproduced in its photogravure section a picture of Mrs. Arnold Ellsworth True, wife of Lieut.-Com. True, U. S. N. The title beneath proclaims the original to have "walked away with the prize as the most beautiful girl in the Far East." Mrs. True is well known in Shanghai and was in the port three months during the spring, before, during and after the visit of the American Naval Flotilla.

CIGARETTE-SELLING IN INTERIOR

Foreign Agents Accused of Illegal Acts to Be Arrested and Punished

Mr. Hsu Yuan, Commissioner of Foreign Affairs, has received a despatch from the Civil Governor, No. 7160, to the following effect:—

"The Finance Commissioner has submitted to me a memorial from the Director of the Shanghai-Paoshan Cigarette Tax Office, as follows:—

"'Since the imposition of this tax, there have frequently been agents of a certain company selling unstamped cigarettes in the interior, obstructing inspection and prejudicing the tax receipts. In spite of using peaceful persuasive means to get them to withdraw, they soon returned. They are still coming and going at will, and persuasive means can have very little effect. This Office has no power to take strong measures, for fear of creating diplomatic complications, as already reported before.

"'Lately, the said company has sent agents to the interior, selling cigarettes at Nantao and Chapei in front of cigarette shops, as if they were bent upon causing confusion to tax collection. This Office again tried to persuade them to withdraw from Chinese territory, in order to avoid unpleasant incidents. As they refused to obey, this Office ordered the detention of their cigarettes and expulsion of the agents; but the latter firmly maintained that their goods should not part company from them, and that they were quite ready to follow their goods and submit to arrest and fine. As these men are not amenable to reason, this nuisance cannot be radically dealt with unless severe penalties are inflicted (upon them).

"'In future, may this Office detain the cigarettes and fine the culprits, when such cases occur; and if they do not submit, may this Office send them to the Constabulary Court for punishment; and also summon the Police at any time to prevent these men from interfering with its duties? If approved, kindly instruct the Commissioner of Foreign Affairs of Kiangsu and the Constabulary Bureau of Woosung and Shanghai to take note and act accordingly.

"'I find that it has been repeatedly ordered that foreign merchants must not employ agents to sell cigarettes in the interior, as on record; and that, having rescripted this memorial accordingly, I beg to submit it for your instruction.'

"Having received the above and having ordered the Finance Commissioner to instruct Director Chang Ching-tsen that in cases of such agents selling cigarettes in the interior, and refusing to desist when ordered, he may in future send them to the Constabulary for punishment and to be fined; the said Commissioner of Foreign Affairs is hereby ordered to obey this rescript and negotiate according to treaty for the suppression of such cases."

THE BRITISH LEGION ALBUM

Wonderful Memorial of the War Contributed to By World's Most Illustrious

The British Legion Album recently published, and now on sale at Messrs. Kelly & Walsh's, comes to us with singular appropriateness in view of the approaching tenth anniversy of the outbreak of the great war. It is a beautifully produced volume containing autographs of many of the most eminent men and women of our country and of our valiant allies. "This volume," says Earl Haig, "represents something much more than an assemblage of famous signatures. It stands for the personal tribute of the greatest in place and genius of many nations to the greatness of soul of those learned and unlearned millions who knew and dared enough to strike a blow for right and justice upon earth."

The album contains fascimile engravings of many signatures and quotations of war writings, by the authors themselves. Statesmen, musicians artists, and illustrious names in every walk of life are to be found. Most worthy of note is the Heroes Page containing the names of Lieut. Commander Norman D. Holbrook, V.C., R.N., Private R. E. Cruickshank, V.C., and others distinguished in war service.

There are the fine words of the Liverpool University war menorial written by Lascelles Abercrombie.

"Those who desired to live, went out to death:
Dark under ground their golden youth is lying
We live and there is brightness in our breath
They would not know—the splendour of their dying."

"Courage is the thing" writes J. M. Barrie under which are the words of Rudyard Kipling:—

"Send us the men who do their work
For which they draw no wage:"

Rider Haggard writes from "Ayesha."

"Of the bread of bitterness we shall not always eat, of the water of tears we shall not always drink. Beyond the night the royal suns ride on; ever the rainbow shines around the rain."

The album contains several coloured plates by leading artists of the day and also a number of etchings and cartoons on various subjects. There are many fragments of music by well known singers and composers of the day. M. Paderewski is among them, giving a few bars of his Military March for the Polish Army in France.

The foreword records the purpose of this book, namely, to aid the British Legion which exists for the help of ex-service men and to stand as a worthy token of respect and gratitude towards our fallen comrades, "those gallant lads who fell on the threshold of life."

This book is not only a most interesting collection of the signatures, writings and thoughts of so many of the world's most illustrious names, names which have a world-wide familarity, but is also a worthy memorial to the deeds of those dark days through which we passed but a few years ago.

MOVEMENT TO ABOLISH CIGARETTE TAX

Chinese Merchants Petitioning Peking: A Burden that Is Ruining Them

The Chinese press says that in view of the adverse effect of the cigarette tax on their business, the Shanghai Cigarette Merchants' Association has decided to circulate a letter, requesting cigarette merchants and agents in all parts of the country to co-operate in devising a way to relieve themselves of this burdensome levy.

The letter states, in effect, that since the imposition of the cigarette tax, troublesome formalities have to be observed and, as a result, the consumption of cigarettes has decreased by about 30 per cent. Repeated petitions for the abolition of this tax have failed to move the authorities. "Therefore we send you a leaflet upon which please ask all the merchants and dealers at your place to affix their chops and which please return at your earliest convenience to the Shanghai Association, so that a direct petition may be submitted to the Central Government for the cancellation of this special tax."

Extortions of Tax Bureau.

Apropos the above subject, a complaint has been made by the Shanghai-Paoshan Cigarette Business Association of the harsh treatment their members have received at the hands of tax collectors. They have consented to pay 43 per cent. of the value of revenue stamps in deference to advices from mediators and in consideration of the fact that an educational fund is being built up, in spite of their difficult position caused by the proximity of their business to the foreign in the settlements. The least offence on the part of their members is magnified and severely dealt with, while the Tax Office pretend not see to foreign agents selling cigarettes everywhere in the interior, even in front of the Tax Office itself. They ask how can they avoid being ultimately ruined if they continue to do business under these conditions? After describing how extravagant and wasteful have been the expenses of the Tax Office, and how burdensome has the tax proved to the cigarette merchants, the Association points out that during nearly six months since the tax was introduced, the Government Treasury has benefited only to the extent of several thousand dollars, while the merchants have suffered painful hardships.

The Association would, therefore, suggest that members of local gentry should support them in demanding the withdrawal of the Tax Office from this district and offering a lump sum on behalf of the merchants in lieu thereof, thus sweeping away many abuses and saving a great deal of what usually goes into the middleman's pocket.

This letter was at first submitted to the Union of District Assemblies of Kiangsu, but as the Union refused to accept it on the ground that the question concerned the Educational Association, it was sent to the Chinese Press for publication.

NUISANCES IN THE BUND GARDENS

Rowdies and Unfortunates: State of Affairs That Calls for Stricter Supervision

Is it possible to clean up the Bund Gardens? The question has been asked in many quarters this summer, and it must be confessed that the solution is not an easy one to find. That there is a solution, however, is undoubted. Given to the public originally as an open space for public recreation, somewhere for the children to romp in and tired grown-ups to enjoy the keen fresh air which is always moving there, the gardens have degenerated into a parade for loose women and a cheap and airy doss house for beachcombers. The ordinary citizen thinks seriously before taking his wife or daughters there for a stroll after 9 or 10 o'clock at night. He has misgivings as to what they will see, and the insults to which it is not impossible they may be subjected. Several complaints have been made to us during the past six weeks by people who have been dragged into unseemly brawls through the misbehaviour of others in the gardens. In one of the most flagrant cases a lady was forcibly kissed by a half drunken foreigner, who paid for the insult with a blackened eye. In another case drunken marines were the offenders, breaking up a peaceful and harmless party of Russian ladies and gentlemen, of whose respectability there is absolutely no doubt, by insulting the women and assaulting the men. In this case, the police interfered and inadequate fines were meted out the next day in the Consular Court. The Chinese and Sikh police are always loath to interfere in such cases, and seem quite out of their element when having to deal only with foreigners.

Beachcombers on the Seats.

Another irritation to which users of the park are subjected lies in the abuse of seats. When nearly every seat is packed with people, many having to stand up, men of the beachcomber type are to be found stretched out fast asleep on the remaining seats, painful to the eye and the feelings alike. Nothing is ever said to them by the police or by park attendants, if there are any. We are asked in a rather hopeless fashion what can the police do. To this, the obvious reply is that if the authorities elsewhere can deal with the problem, it should not be impossible to do so here. The old excuse of peculiar conditions is surely becoming threadbare. Unfortunately far too much lenience is extended to drunkenness in this town. Here, men are allowed to rant and roar through the streets at night, shouting out doubtful songs, holding heated arguments with unfortunate ricsha coolies, and generally making themselves a nuisance. In any other country in the world, Great Britain particularly, people like this would very soon find themselves provided with a cheap night's lodging, to be brought to Court the next day on the familiar charge of "drunk and disorderly."

No one for a moment underestimates the work that the police do, work generally of a far more dangerous character than is done by police at Home. But after all, the Public Gardens are meant for decent folk, not for soliciting and rowdyism and stricter supervision in this respect would be welcome.

Various labour organizations in Shanghai have sent telegrams to Canton expressing appreciation of the action of the Shameen strikers and urging them to maintain a firm attitude in their "protest against the introduction of severe restrictive measures."

THE CONGESTED STATE OF THE HUANGPU

Some Answer to Recent Complaints: Not So Bad as It Is Painted: A Comparison with Other Harbours: Tribulations Which No Port Can Avoid

(Contributed.)

There have been quite a number of criticisms in our correspondence columns recently on the regulation of traffic in the Huangpu. A good deal of this, our readers will be comforted to know, is quite unjustified. The Huangpu is regulated as well as it is humanly possible to regulate it considering all the circumstances. One gentleman defied the world to show him that laodahs in the river ever received any examination in their duties, or that they were ever made to produce proof of their ability to operate launches. We take it on ourselves, therefore, to inform him that every laodah on launches and steamers owned by Chinese and properly registered is examined by the Harbour Office, and before they are allowed to take up the duties of laodah they have to prove themselves moderately intelligent and to show they have a knowledge of the river. Not only is this done, but records of each man's past and present career are kept on file, with a clear photograph of himself. If ever he changes his job, then he notifies the authorities. Over the laodahs of foreign-owned launches it is true the authorities have no control. The question of extraterritoriality comes in here and accounts for this rather remarkable state of affairs, but the local authorities are helpless. Doubtless, however, control over these men will come in due course as China slowly and tortuously draws her way up to the level of other nations.

Another correspondent, a stranger to the town, appears to have been most unhappy during trips up and down the river late at night. His complaints are many. He first of all states that junks loomed up on the party suddenly and showing no lights. It is to be feared he exaggerated in this latter respect. Surely this could only have happened in the case of one junk per trip, at most, for nearly every craft in this river carries lights, junks no less than others. It is very difficult indeed for the layman to realize the difficulties which beset the authorities when it comes to dealing with native craft. The Chinese Government for a long time refused to adopt the Rules for the Prevention of Collisions at Sea, and when they did do so, they confined the observation of those rules to foreign style ships, still leaving native craft to go their own sweet way. This same correspondent remarked that the launch on which their party travelled narrowly missed hitting an unlighted buoy. The answer to that is that this was an example of the inefficiency of the laodah, not of the inefficiency of the authorities. A man whose sole duties consist of navigating a launch in our crowded waters is expected to know where those buoys are. It is one of the things he is paid for. The buoys are fixtures, and one strongly doubts whether there is any port in the world where they are lighted. The correspondent makes further complaints regarding the crowding of launches against the jetties at night, necessitating passengers on other launches stepping over them. This is a particularly unfair thing to blame the authorities for. In every port in the world, more especially river ports, there is congestion at the jetties. In London one has nearly always to step over barges to get to land; in Hongkong you have launches, and, what one does not get in Shanghai, junks. In every harbour there is bound to be a certain amount of dead traffic and this dead traffic is bound to cause inconvenience. As to the complaints regarding the unhappy ladies who walked into the feet of sleeping Chinese, Que voulez vous? Must our authorities, then, legislate against Chinese feet? Even if they did, we doubt what would be the success of their efforts. Until this model Settlement of ours is allowed to grow so that all the water traffic is not congested on one particular stretch of the water front, this sort of thing cannot be helped. As it is, present regulations are excellent as far as they go.

DEATH OF MR. CECIL HOLLIDAY

An Old Resident's Worthy Record of 47 Years Spent in the East

It was with feelings of very deep regret that all his friends in Shanghai, and there are very many, heard on Thursday afternoon of the death of Mr. Cecil Holliday, Governing-Director of the firm of Cecil Holliday & Co., Ld., which occurred, somewhat unexpectedly, at St. Marie's Hospital about 2.45 p.m. Mr. Holliday, although well in appearance, had been an invalid for some time, and three months ago was compelled to relinquish business engagements and to go into hospital.

Few old residents of Shanghai have played, in an unassuming way, a more prominent part in the administration of affairs of the International Settlement than the late Mr. Cecil Holliday, and none was more interested in its welfare.

Mr. Holliday was born at Kersemoor, Manchester, 67 years ago, being the youngest son of the late Mr. John Holliday, and after education in England, arrived in Shanghai in 1877 to join the firm of Holliday, Wise & Co., whose business had been first established in the Far East, at Canton, in 1835, and then extended to Hongkong and Shanghai. On his arrival here, Mr. Holliday combined keen attention to business with active participation in sport, and was particularly prominent in riding, running, rowing and boxing. Always a keen member of the Shanghai Volunteer Corps, he earned his rank to every grade, and was eventually appointed commandant of the corps, a position to which he was twice re-appointed. In municipal affairs he always took a keen interest, and though generally critical of the Council's methods of administration, was elected Chairman of the Council in 1906. He was at one time chairman of the Shanghai Club, and latterly of the Shanghai Mutual Telephone Co. Mr. Holliday was a man of sterling integrity, respected by all, a man of the kindest heart, beloved by many friends.

He leaves a son in India, Lieut.-Col. Grant Holliday, to mourn his loss, as well as his brother-in-law, Mr. R. C. Phillippo, who is resident in Shanghai.

SOLDIERS' BONUS

Instructions to American Ex-Service Men How to Get Benefit of New Law

For the purpose of speedy and wide dissemination of application blanks to assist American veterans of the World War to obtain their adjusted compensation under the Act of Congress, passed on May 19, 1924, the American Red Cross has been requested by the U. S. War Department to aid in the distribution of the bonus forms.

The China General Committee, American Red Cross, is in receipt of instructions from National Headquarters, American Red Cross to ascertain the number of American men who saw service in the World War, overseas of home service. It is requested that all ex-service men will send in their name and address to the China Central Committee, American Red Cross, 23 Yuen Ming Yuen Road, Room 211, Shanghai. An approximate estimate has been sent to Washington as to the number of ex-service men in China, and applications blanks are expected within a short time. Upon receipt of the bonus forms they will be mailed out accordingly with detailed instructions to the various persons who have submitted their names.

The War Department are emphasizing the importance of observing the foregoing instructions with respect to getting in touch with the nearest chapter of the American Red Cross, as they do not desire any applicants to write to the Department in Washington as this will only create confusion and delay.

CORRESPONDENCE

SIMON PETER

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR—In this morning's issue of your paper a correspondent who signs himself "Paul" takes Mr. Rowland to task for his sermon on "Simon Peter". I heard Mr. Rowland deliver that sermon and afterwards, read it in your columns. The only part of it with which I disagree is the assertion (which is the only thing in it "Paul" finds to commend) that "it is surprising, indeed, how much may be said in support of the primacy of Peter". How anyone familiar with the New Testament could make a statement of that kind passes my comprehension.

The first and only occasion on which Peter seems to have assumed a primacy is recorded in the first chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, Peter then suggested that as Judas had fallen away from the Apostleship it was necessary that some one should be appointed to take his place. The other assented. Lots were cast "and the lot fell upon Matthias" whose name appears here for the first and last time. Subsequent events showed that the man who was to take the place, vacant by the defection of Judas, was already chosen by a higher tribunal. He proved to be "not a whit behind the very chiefest Apostles"; a very different person from the nonentity that Peter's precipitate action dragged into prominence. Thus, on the only occasion mentioned in the New Testament on which Peter presided at a council and made an ex cathedrâ pronouncement he was far from being infallible.

The next important gathering of the early church was that held at Jerusalem to consider the status of Gentile converts to the faith. The proceedings are recorded in the 15th chapter of the book of the Acts. On that occasion Peter made an opening statement and was followed by Paul and Barnabas when "all the multitude kept silence and gave audience." The decision of the council was pronounced by James who began by saying "Wherefore, my sentence is;—" It is plain that at this—the most important Council of the Church held in New Testament times—the Primate was not Peter but James.

In this connexion, too, there is the notable incident recorded in the second chapter of the epistle to the Galatians where Paul says, "When Peter came to Antioch I withstood him to the face beause he was to be blamed." I maintain that, in the face of these passages from the New Testament, the only authority on the subject, it requires considerable hardihood to claim that Peter was recognized as the leader of the Apostles in the days of the early church.

Commenting on Mr. Rowland's reference to the well known passage "Thou are Peter and on this rock I will build my church, "Paul" asks "why it should not be taken literally"? i.e. as though it referred to Peter, the man, and not to the truth he had just enunciated "'Thou art the Christ, the son of the living God," which Protestant commentators usually hold to be the sense of the passage. I would answer because, first, it was not meant to be taken literally and, second, it was not understood literally by Peter himself. For he says in the second chapter of his first Epistle, "It is contained in scripture. Behold, I lay in Sion a chief corner stone elect, precious. To whom coming as unto a living stone, ye also as living stones are built up a spiritual house." These words agree absolutely with the teaching of another Apostle. Paul, writing to the Ephesians says, "Ye are built on the foundation of the Apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone". And to the Corinthians "For other foundation can no man lay than that which is laid which is Jesus Christ."

Shanghai, July 24, 1924.

SIR:—One might expect that a man who writes to the public press under the name "Paul", and for the purpose of elucidating serious, sacred issues would instinctively avoid discourteous innuendoes and vulgar metaphors. But this idea seems not to be verified in the instance of your correspondent of yesterday.

One might also expect that when "Paul" declares his point of view to be clearly indicated in Scripture, he would furnish at least one indubitable citation. Here again your correspondent fails to fulfil expectations.

The Rev. Mr. Rowland's sermon published in your Monday's issue needs no defence against such an antagonist. The present letter is simply written to ask "Paul" to substantiate his statements in regard to Scripture.

1. "That for a priest a life of celibacy is a more ideal one than one in matrimony is clearly indicated in Scripture."

To avoid useless altercation let me emphasize that "Paul" does not say "may be inferred or implied from Scripture" but is clearly indicated; moreover, clearly indicated for the priesthood. I ask for a clear citation from Scripture confirming "Paul's" statement in regard to the priesthood and celibacy.

2. In regard to "Papal Infallibility,"—after stating specifically the teaching of the Catholic Church upon the subject. "Paul" declares this to be "neither more nor less than the literal fulfilment of Christ's promise to his Church." Let "Paul" give us his reference, that placing it side by side with the Papal claim to infallibility (even as explained and limited by "Paul") the general reader may be able to estimate its legitimacy,

"PRIMACY OF PETER"

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Your correspondents "John" and "Barnabas" ask for quotations from Scripture in support of the undermentioned, to them objectionable points:—

(1) "It is surprising indeed how much may be said in support of the Primacy of Peter."

(2) That for a Priest a life in celibacy is a more ideal one that one in matrimony is clearly indicated in Scripture.

(3 The Papal claim to Infallibility (even as explained and limited by "Paul").

It is impossible here, to give more than a few of the most important texts, especially so because some of them must, for the sake of clarity, be given in full.

(1)—(a) Math. XVI 18-19 "Thou art Peter, and upon this Rock I will build My Church. And the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And I will give to thee the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven. And whatsoever Thou shallt bind upon earth it shall be bound in Heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth, it shall also be loosed in Heaven."

Note: "Peter" means "Rock" and "The gates of hell"—error; the meaning of the "keys" and of the power to "bind" and to "loose" is too obvious to need explanation here.

(b) John XXI 15 "Simon son of John, lovest Thou me more than these? (With "these" Christ refers to the other Apostles and disciples then present) He saith to Him: Yea, Lord, Thou knowest that I love Thee. He saith to him "Feed my lambs" and verse 16 "Feed my lambs" and verse 17 "Feed My sheep."

(c) Luke XXII 31-32 "And the Lord said: Simon, Simon, behold Satan hath desired to have you, that he may sift you as wheat. But I have prayed for Thee that Thy faith fail not: and Thou, being once converted, confirm Thy brethren." Note: Christ's prayers were, of course always heard.

These are probably the three most important texts giving the Supremacy to Peter and they do not seem to be wanting in lucidity. Furthermore, all through the Gospels and the Acts Peter is generally the Spokesman for the Apostles or is named apart from them or his name is mentioned first. It is only by twisting desperately and turning certain texts out of their contexts and reasonable meaning that anything may be made to fit into a denial of Christ's above mentioned words. The extraordinary things is that some who consider themselves as Christians should be so anxious to find contradictions where none are; for God the Eternal Truth does not contradict Himself. The gates of hell do no more prevail against Him than they prevail against His Church.

(2)—(a) Math. XIX 10 . . 12 "His disciples say unto Him: If the case of a man with his wife be so, it is not expedient to marry. Who said to them: all men take not this word but they to whom it is given. For there are eunuchs . . . who have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of Heaven. He that can take let him take it."

I Corinthians all VII; particularly 1 and 7, 8 v. and 32,33 v.

(b) "It is good for a man not to touch a woman." . . .

"I would that all men were even as myself. . . ."

"But I say to the unmarried and to the widows: It is good for them so to continue even as I."

(c) But I would have you to be without solicitude. He that is without a wife is solicitous for the things that belong to the Lord: how he may please God. But he that is with a wife is solicitous for the things of the world : how he may please his wife. And he is divided."

This seems to be a clear indication that for the Priesthood the state of celibacy is a more ideal one than matrimony.

(3) See all quotations and remarks under paragraph (1). and further:

(a) Luke X 16 "He that heareth you heareth me; and he who despiseth you despiseth Me; and he that despiseth me despiseth Him that sent Me."

(b) Mark XVI 15 16 "And He said to them: Go ye into the whole world and preach the Gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be condemned"

(c) Matt. XXVIII 20 "Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you. And behold I am with you all days even to the end of the world".

All these texts pre-suppose infallibility; that is to say, that the Church which Christ built on Peter and perpetuated through Peter's successors must be guarded by Him against teaching erroneous doctrine otherwise it could not be His Church and He could not have commanded every creature (all men) under the penalty of damnation to believe its teachings. For nineteen hundreds years the storms and waves have ceaselessly beaten against the house built on the Rock (Peter) but in vain and in vain will the storms and waves continue their beating against this house until the end of the world. Many houses have during these centuries been built and will in future be built on other less enduring foundations. They have been or will be swept by the storms and waves. Matt. VII 24 27

PAUL.

Shanghai, July 28, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

Sir,—Your correspondent "Paul" has courteously responded to my request for definite citations from Scripture to support his assertions, (1), "that for a priest a life of celibacy is a more ideal one than one in matrimony is clearly indicated in Scripture," (2), that Papal Infallibility "is neither more nor less than the literal fulfilment of Christ's promise to the church."

In regard to the passages cited under (1), it seems necessary to point out that Our Lord's statement in Matthew XIX 10-12 has no special reference to the priesthood, and that St. Paul's words "I would that all men were even as myself" were addressed to the rank and file of Christians in Corinth, ("all men" certainly precludes their application or limitation to the priesthood.) If celibacy is to be advocated or enjoined upon the authority of these passages it must be for Christians in general, not for the priesthood only.

(2). The simple significance of Christ's promises cited in support of Papal Infallibility is so far removed from the conceptions expressed in that doctrine of the Roman Church that I venture no one not wearing deeply coloured ecclesiastical spectacles could possibly find any confirmation or suggestion of such doctrine therein.

BARNABAS.

Shanghai, July 30, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

Sir,—While not wishing to prolong a theological discussion in your columns I would like to crave space for one reply to "Paul's" scriptural proofs of the Primacy of Peter amongst the Apostles.

"Paul" chooses as his fundamental text Matthew XVI. 18-19 where Christ says to Peter, "I will give to thee the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven" and the power to bind and loose on earth and in heaven. Thus claiming for Peter alone the power of opening and shutting the door of the Kingdom. In reply to this I would say that exactly the same power is given to the disciples collectively in Matthew XVIII, 18. Where Christ says, "Verily I say unto you, whatsoever things ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, etc. "Quite evidently Peter received no power that was not equally bestowed on the others.

The claim that Peter was the "rock" on which the Church is built is definitely refuted by scripture in the plainest terms, "For other foundation can no man lay than is laid which is Jesus Christ." 1 Cor. III,II. Only by doing distinct violence to these plain words can Rome claim primacy for Peter. The protestant Church proclaims this truth in the triumphant hymn "The Church's one foundation is Jesus Christ her Lord."

Again, look for a moment at "Paul's" standard passage on which he relies to prove his thesis. Matthew XVI. In verses 18-19, quoted by "Paul," Peter is highly commended because he was the first of the Apostles to grasp the truth which is the rock foundation of our faith. "Thou art the Christ the Son of the living God." On that truth "Paul's" church, as well as mine, is founded. But read the 23rd verse, "But he (Jesus) turned and said unto Peter. Get thee behind me Satan; thou art an offence unto me; for thou savourest not the things that be of God but those that be of men." Was any other Apostle ever snubbed like this? Was this language that would be adddressed to one who had just been endowed with the primacy over his brethren? It certainly does not look like it.

"Paul's" second proof text tells even more against his argument than the first one. He takes it from John XXI, 15 where Jesus after his resurrection says to Peter, "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me more than these?" "Paul" means us to infer that the answer to that question was "Yes Lord, certainly I do," and as a reward for this "love more than these" Peter was entrusted with the feeding of the sheep. As a matter of fact the exact opposite is the sense of the passage. The last time Peter had spoken with his Master he had heard Him say that all his disciples would that night forsake Him. Peter, with his usual impetuosity, declared that though all should forsake him yet would not he. Jesus predicted that before the cock crowed Peter would deny him thrice. Peter asserted that he was willing to go to prison and to judgment but would in no wise deny his Master. Nevertheless he did it and now was come his bad half hour. The great physician probed the wound, "Simon son of Jonas" not even vouchsafing to him, what we might call, his Christian name, Peter? "lovest thou me more than these?" Three times the question was asked recalling the three denials and "Peter was grieved because he asked him the third time," Lovest thou me? "Overcome with shame and remorse he cast himself on his Master's mercy, "Lord thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love thee,' and so there came the gracious threefold command, 'Feed my sheep.'" It was a token that the penitent Peter was not rejected but to take it as a proof that he was elected to a primacy above his brethren is to misunderstand it utterly.

MIRACULOUS OMEN OF EMPIRE

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—In reference to your article of the "Miraculous Omen of Empire" I would state that I had intended to write and give you almost identical particulars, as we were one of the very, very few foreigners who saw this vegetable (pumpkin) the head of which had grown into the shape of a dragon's head just as one sees it depicted on various Chinese vases, etc.

We could not mistake it, but the length of the vegetable we would state was probably under five feet, but of this we are not quite certain as owing to the crowds it was very difficult to ascertain the length. However, the likeness was almost perfect as far as the head was concerned and for the first two days the farmer allowed the public to view free, and without exaggeration, as people had to pass our house to go and see it, we consider the continual stream of people from 5 a.m. to 7 p.m. must have easily reached not less than 20,000 for the day.

My wife and I think that the wear and tear on the farmer's property was so much and the cost of keeping about ten men to guard the vegetable patch from being trampled upon was telling upon the farmer's nerves and they decided on the third day to charge two coppers.

Still the crowd came and the price went up to five coppers until a Chinese policeman, presumably jealous, cut the head and took it away. We were sorry because we wanted to have another look at it to see what difference a day's growth would have made to it.

To say the least it was a marvellous likeness and after seeing it we understood the great interest which the Chinese, rich and poor, took in it.

Enclosing my card,

I am, etc.,

SMUGGLED ARMS

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—With reference to your article in yesterday's issue re the seizure of arms and ammunitions on board our vessel Angkor, I beg to point out that unhappily for the Shanghai community, the smuggling of such articles is not a monopoly of our vessels though the publicity given by you each time a seizure occurs on one of them could lead the public to believe that it is so.

It is, however, well known to all people and administrations who have had to inquire in those matters that the greatest part of this smuggling is imported (too often with success) by vessels of a few other nationalities.

The fact that most of the seized arms are of Spanish, American or German manufacture implies that the bulk of the smuggling does not come from France.

In my opinion it would lead to a better result for the public welfare if, instead of drawing the attention upon the seizures made lately quasi regularly on our steamers, you directed your activity against those that could be made, not so easily probably, on other ships frequenting this harbour. The very fact that the Customs searches obtain a result on our steamers certainly proves that all assistance is given to this administration by our staff and that the smugglers knowing that our officers are on the lookout cannot dispose of their cargo as on some other ships. One may consider that the attempts of smuggling arms by our vessels are nearly always checked and will be the more so, we hope, until we succeed in suppressing it totally. However, a great deal of this traffic on other lines than ours escapes the vigilance of the Customs and this for the good reason that they are delivered overside in the river before the ships are berthed.

Of course it is in no way my intention to try and defend the members of our crew dealing with that illicit business, I only wish to point out that I consider it as unfair towards my Company to present her to your readers as the main if not the only line by which smuggled arms are imported into China, while in fact I am convinced that if the same assistance was given by all owners to the authorities as our officers and ourselves do, practically no such smuggling could pass through.

GEN. GLEBOFF'S MEN.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—In to-day's "North-China Daily News" I read an article with the title: "General Gleboff's men."

In this article is stated that my men received of local Chinese officials as a charity Mex. $1,000.

Several times through your respectable paper I stated that my men don't want any charity or contribution from Chinese or any other benevolent society and in this case I did not receive any charity from the Chinese officials.

My group received from Mr. Chen $1,000 as a loan on account of those moneys which my troops will receive after the liquidation of the property which belongs to us. As a proof of this is enclosed herewith the copy of the receipt which was given by my representative Col. Ivanoff to Mr. Chen where you can clearly see that that was not a charity help, but only a loan against our property and I hope that Mr. Chen would not refuse to show you the original of the receipt.

And also I beg to state that is absolutely a lie that 60 of my men went to Mr. Chen and asked his permission to collect some contribution between the local charity associations and residents.

It was truth that the group had the idea of sending 60 delegates to the local foreign community with the intention of showing the foreigners to what exent they have been deceived and how they been threatened.

It is also not right that my men applied to Mr. Chen with the request to weaken the regime and increase the number of passes. My men demanded from Mr Chen connexion by land and agreed with him when he gave 24 passes, but with the terms that in case, it was wanted, the number of passes must be increased.

In closing my letter I beg to state that when Chinese officials try to give the impression to the foreign community that my men and ships are under some arrest, it is not truth. In reality my men and ships are absolutely free and never classified them as prisoners.

Translations of the receipt given by Col. Ivanoff representing the Gen. Gleboff's group to Mr. Chen.

Receipt.

This receipt is given to the Assistant Comissioner for Foreign Affairs Mr. Chen that I received 1,000.00 mex. dollars to supply provisions for the Far Eastern cossack group until the final decision with the reference to the ships which are the property of the troops with Chinese official.

Colonel Ivanoff.

REFUGEE RELIEF ADVISORY COMMITTEE.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—A letter in your Friday issue has done us a service in at least one respect, it has reminded us that we owe thanks to many for help in our attempt to do something to relieve the position of the refugees in Shanghai.

Among those we have reason to be especially grateful to are:—Mr. Elleder and his staff for rendering us every assistance in the repatriation of the many unfortunates who want to go back to their homes; to Mr. and Madame Grosse and those associated with them for innumerable services given us irrespective of the creed or politics of the people for whom their help was invoked; to the Chinese Bureau of Russian Affairs for help in issuing visas; to the Japanese Consulate in giving group visas, the South Manchuria Railway for reducing their rates for our groups of refugees, and to the Chinese Eastern Railway for the same kindness.

To the Shanghai Race Club and its members we are greatly indebted for most generously supporting our work with funds, and to you, Sir, and your fellow journalists in Shanghai, we are under deep obligation for making known refugee needs whenever publicity has been required.

There is also one other direction in which we particularly wish our thanks to go. That is to Mr. and Mrs. Rangel, of Scott Road, not only for the splendid service they have rendered in placing premises at our disposal entirely free in which to feed some 700 of the destitute daily for many months, but also for their own personal ungrudging help at all times in the work of running the Soup Kitchen.

This sympathetic co-operation of all the above, and of other friends too numerous to name, has been of the utmost value to us and to the people we have tried to succour, the more so as it has been given in the same strictly non-political and non-partisan spirit as that in which we and our colleagues have always administered refugee relief.

Chairman,
Reparation Sub-Committee.

NEW VIEWS FOR OLD

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—Shanghailander must either have a very vague idea of conditions in U.S.S.R. or he himself must belong to the "benefactors" of this unfortunate country.

He believes the Soviet Delegation now in London to be the representatives of the Russian people. First of all he ought not to use the word "Russia" as it does not officially exist. He knows, I believe, very well that what was once Russia is now a country called U.S.S.R. terrorized by the communist party counting about 600,000 members of whom many are communists only by name. There are not many real Russians among them, at least among those who occupy positions of trust. Of course many of them have Russian names, but what is a name to a communist? He can change it as often as he likes.

It is well known that these 600,000 communists act according to instructions of quite a small number of their members and so it happens that a people of more than hundred millions are ruled by a little group of chiefly strangers. How it has happened I am not going to discuss, but it is a fact that in Russia there is no liberty at all and consequently we cannot speak of representatives of its people.

I am glad to hear the Delegation has visited Buckingham Palace. I can imagine the feelings of his Majesty receiving the murderers of his cousin.

I am also very glad to hear that somebody has arrived safely in London viâ Russia or U.S.S.R. I suppose he did not show too much interest in the affairs of this country. I have even heard of cases where human beings were not attacked by wild beasts if they paid no attention to them and the beasts were not too hungry. What happens to foreigners who feel inclined to peep a little behind the scene I will rather not tell here.

Most of all delighted me the news that the life in U.S.S.R. is "normal and usual." For people of Shanghailander's kind it must be not only normal and usual, but very pleasant. The Bolsheviks know how to pay for appreciation. And still. . . ; in spite of all the privileges of being a communist it sometimes must be rather trying always to be spied upon by one's own colleagues.

One advice I can give to Shanghailanders and that is to go to U.S.S.R. and become an angel of the "Soviet Paradise" as it is called by the real Russians.

Thanking you for the space in your paper,

I am, etc.,
A Lover of Russia.
Shanghai, July 25, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir.—As one who has had a little experience in this world and particularly in the matter of substituting "New Views for Old" may I draw your correspondent "Shanghailander's" attention to the enclosed cutting taken from the "Sunday Chronicle," a Manchester, England, publication, issue dated June 8, 1924.

Personally I do not see the relationship between a British gentleman travelling across Russia and the Russian refugee problem in Shanghai.

Surely if the statement in the cutting regarding Mr. MacDonald's intimation is authentic, and there should be no reason for doubt, it is quite plain that the Russian refugees themselves know how to deal with the situation with such guidance as is being freely given by local gentlemen of experience and proven good faith.

Anglo-Russian Farce.

There is no doubt that the tedious farce of the Anglo-Russian Conference is nearing its end at length.

Mr. MacDonald looked to it to effect a general settlement of all outstanding questions between the two countries.

"Money, or No Settlement."

The Soviet delegates came with one single object—to get a loan of £60,000,000.

The City has turned them down. The Government cannot help them to a shilling.

"Money!—or no settlement." That is the Bolshevik position in four words, and it is not to be money.

Bad Faith Expected.

Did Mr. MacDonald, when blackmailed with the threat of failure for his darling project of a Russian settlement, feel very much surprise?

I doubt it, for I am one of those who can remember how, at a certain Berlin conference famous in the European Socialist movement, he "walked into" the Bolshevik delegates there in pretty trenchant style.

Even the brazen Radek looked uncomfortable when Mr. MacDonald intimated that no one expected anything but bad faith from the Bolsheviks in any conference.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—A most contentious letter of which during a considerable period the Shanghai public has had a plethora. Whether the U.S.S.R. means the "Usual Silly Swine of Russia" (this since it is nowadays only applied to new Russia) or "Useless Soviets Spoil Russia" or a hopeless cry "Unless Someone Succours Russia," it is beyond me to fathom.

Before the Great War, knowing nothing of the country, I had an idea that Russia was a great power in the world.

During the Great War I gained the impression that Russia was a "puppet."

Since the war I have thought that perhaps Russia is merely a giant lunatic.

But I remember the French Revolution and live in hopes that Russia will (when the orgie of "sansculottism" is passed) evolve a Republic as respectable and as respected as our Gallic neighbours!

These things take time and like convulsions of nature those of nations cause terrible sufferings to that portion of humanity which is within the range of their activities.

This convulsion has been very severe and has even caused considerable agitation, I have heard, to the Legations in Peking, whose permanent motto "Give us Peace in our time, we beseech thee, Oh Lord," has apparently not found a favourable answer.

Still, having regard to the general history of mankind, need "A Lover of Russia" be so absolutely pessimistic? Is it not possible that the Soviet, commencing its career with a "bloody Lenin" and his associates may develop into an ordered Republic as France did after a spell of the "Commune" when "bloody" Robespierre and his companions had—"shot their bolt."

One can sympathize with these oppressed people, but courage and a firm "upper lip" will gain more sympathy than the whining cringing attitude of the professional seeker for charity.

The majority, I fully believe, are playing the game, but their honourable efforts are in my opinion being seriously damaged by certain loafers who wander about and solicit alms (not work) on the Bund and Nanking Road and even more frequently in the Hongkew district.

Now if these are the people who are to replace the U.S.S.R. Heaven help Russia! But if they represent "A friend of Russia's" confrères, Heaven help him, because few decent humans will.

I do not believe this to be the case, but surely the decent Russians in Shanghai can do something, knowing their own people, to put these "potential thugs" under such control that they will be powerless to frighten women and children in the streets or in public places in Shanghai.

"A Lover of Russia" may say that this is a job for the Municipal Police, but besides the fact that the police force was not organized to deal with a sudden influx of persons of this sort, the methods adopted are not such as they could very well cope with without a very much enlarged force.

Finally, "A Lover of Russia," it is very much a matter of Russians in Shanghai controlling their own nationals which will produce the continued sympathy with your nation which I think Shanghai has not been backward in displaying. Whatever may be the criticisms on Shanghai there is not the slightest question but that she is (and always has been) a charitable city, but her charity is dispensed with caution, freely to the deserving, but with right of reservation in case of doubt.

Russia's internal troubles do not enter into this matter for Shanghai charity like the rain from heaven falls alike on the (politically) just or unjust.

Shanghai, July 28, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—We have with great interest read "Shanghailander's" and "a Lover of Russia's" letters, and we deem it our duty to explain to your readers what "Shanghailander" calls "normal and usual" life in Russia.

We first wish to state that we speak from actual experience — we have lived and worked in various parts of Russia as well before as also during the Soviet régime and have only recently recently returned from there.

It is quite correct when "Lover of Russia" says that there is no "Russia," but only a country called "U.S.S.R." (United Soviet Socialistic Republics) and we may add that the name of "Russia" and "Russian" is distasteful to all Communists.

The life in "U.S.S.R." to-day is void of anything that has an inkling of liberty. As "a lover of Russia" has stated U.S.S.R. is at present ruled by a small body of Non-Russian Communists and there is no elected representation of the people. There are no newspapers nor any other printed periodicals except the Communist press, which is read by very few people outside the Communist party. In order to ensure that there should not appear non-political or even purely commercial editions, the Soviet Government has given out a law prohibiting advertising in any printed matters except the communistic press.

Private liberty is restricted in such a manner that the population of the "U.S.S.R." is practically enslaved. There is such a lot of restrictions and prohibitions that nobody knows what is allowed and what is tabu. Imagine that one cannot even take one's own brother into one's employ in any capacity whatsoever. If anybody needs an employee in whatsoever capacity, be it accountant, private secretary, cashier, skilled or unskilled workmen, domestic servants etc., etc., he must apply to the office for registration of unemployed and take whoever they send along. The only thing that can be done, if one dares to, is to report that the person sent is absolutely unfit for the work, and then they may or may not send another.—But think of it. —Nobody can get employment, even from his own family, but through the communist officials, and if you do not want to starve, you have got to do the communist biddings.

Another instance of the restriction of personal liberty is the housing question. Also here you are not allowed to take what quarters you like, but have to apply to a Housing Committee to get a permit to rent the quarters you desire, and generally they do not permit you to get what you like. Furthermore if you have quarters, you are liable to get orders to evacuate the premises you occupy with a few days notice, or, in other instances, you will get an order to give up some of your rooms to somebody else. The writer of this got an order to clear out of the house he occupied in 24 hours, the only reason being that he had spent a considerable sum of money to get it fixed up and then a certain communist decided it suited his fancy.

We have always wondered when people write about good schools in U.S.S.R. Perhaps in a few places the old Tsarist teachers are in office, but where the Communist teachers are in power, and that is in the overwhelming part of the schools, the unhappy rising generation is only taught communistic idiosyncrasies, blasphemy and unchastity.

We do not want to go further into the privations of the poor peoples of U.S.S.R., they are so numerous and countless, that the readers would get tired of hearing about them, but we would only add a few lines about the economical position from a business point of view.

The New Economical Politic, "N.E.P." is a complete fiasco. It was a concession to private enterprise, as the Communists found out that they could not run the country themselves. But instead of giving a straight and honest opportunity for private enterprises, the Communists permitted them to exist but put so many obstacles in their way, that the only ones who benefited from them were the Communist speculators themselves, who made huge fortunes by selling goods from one communist institution to another. But the proper merchant could not exist on account of all the restrictions put in his way, one of them being the question of employees mentioned above, another the unwarranted high taxes, which often exceeded the profit derived. Only the small merchants, a one man business, could exist on account of the hopeless inability of the Communist-Enterprises.

Any attempt to start a business on a large scale or any kind of industry will, under the present condition, inevitably meet with complete failure, for the following reasons. Firstly the trade would be strictly confined to internal trade, as all foreign trade is monoplized by the Government. Furthermore all the manufactured goods are produced by the government, and sold to their own institutions on preferred conditions. Secondly the Government institutions would also have the advantage in transportation facilities. To this add all kinds of petty restrictions, limited banking facilities, restrictions for employees, a worthless staff, and taxes which would eat up all profit there still might have been.

Still worse is the condition for any eventual industrial enterprises, which solely depends upon the workmen. The rules for keeping workmen in U.S.S.R. are of such a nature as to render it practically impossible for any would-be manufacturer to run his plants. In addition to this he would be pestered by the factory inspection by ridiculous demands. Those demands are made only in order to get bribes, but giving bribes in U.S.S.R. is at present a very unhealthy pursuit, especially for foreigners, as there is capital punishment for that. One of the writers of this letter managed a factory in U.S.S.R., until it had to be closed, and during this time a demand was made to enlarge the windows in the factory building. Shortly after this was done a new demand was made to make the windows small again, as the delicate health of the workmen might be endangered by draught. The workmen themselves will continuously make ridiculous demands upon the manufacturer, will strike at the slightest provocations, as they know that they have the trade-unions, which are a second Government, behind them.

The poor enslaved people of U.S.S.R. are taxed beyong imagination, so that the Communists may live in comfort and luxury and have money for foreign propaganda. Worst taxed are the poor peasants, from whom most of the harvest is taken by the government, and this is the only and real reason for the continuous famine in U.S.S.R.

This is the "normal and usual" life in U.S.S.R. which Shanghailander evidently pictures to himself as a paradise and may he go there and be blessed.

We are, etc.,
Two Neutral Friends of Russia
Shanghai, July 29, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—I have read with the greatest interest the interview with "A Lover of Russia" to which you commend my attention this morning.

I have also read with still greater interest your editorial comment on the same subject entitled—"Under the Red Robe"—and am astounded at the appalling state of affairs depicted by the interviewed and the interviewer at the recent sane and temperate tête-à-tête, the results of which you publish. It is terrible, too terrible for words.

By the early post, however, I have received a letter from a dear friend of mine who lives in Scotland and is indeed "A Lover of Scotland" much as your correspondent is a Lover of Russia, I surmise.

This dear and valued friend and his family has been settled in Scotland for some hundreds of years and true to his upbringing, family associations, and sympathies is a staunch adherent of the royal line of Kings and Queens who ruled in Scotland in the good old days. He wears the Royal Stuart tartan, and by profession is a schoolmaster.

I cannot give the whole of his letter to me, it is too harrowing to the feelings and there are some things too sacred to be published in cold print. Dealing with the political situation and the changes that have taken place in his beloved land, these are his exact words:—

"UNDER THE CORDUROY BREECHES."

The Workmen's Government under which we are compelled to live in these awful days taxes us terribly. Out of every 240 pence that we earn the brutal Tax Collector takes 55½ pence. That is almost a quarter of our meagre earnings. If we refuse to pay, or if we cannot pay we are thrown into prison and lie there in durance vile until we do pay.

You know, dear Shanghailander, how we Scottish—especially we of the true breed of Scots like myself and my family—hate parting with our money, and I have often told you during the long evenings we spent together at my ancestral home during your last trip from the Far East how my ancestors were able to avoid paying any taxes at all in the good old days when Mary, our beloved and sainted Mary—Mary Queen of Scots—to give her her full and proud title, used to hold sway and reign in Holyrood Palace. You remember how even I, a strong man, could scarce command my emotion when speaking of our beloved martyred Queen, basely and brutally done to death by the Southrons over the Tweed.

Speaking of our martyred and sainted Ruler recalls to my mind the latest grotesque antics of the minority of workmen who have seized power in the land to-day and hold us in their own grip, backed up by policemen's batons and soldiers bayonets, if need be.

At the Supreme Council of the Soviets held in Edinburgh some months ago they elected a workman as the Chief Commissar for our ancient Kingdom.

He was of the peasant class, a coal miner by occupation, and lived in a little cottage a few miles from the city bordering on the domain of one of our proudest noblemen. In fact, I believe though am not quite certain, the nobleman is graciously pleased to permit this common person to pay him the weekly rent for the cottage that he allows him to inhabit.

The man's name is Brown,—James Brown—to give him his full name. (In passing I would remind you how I have always objected to the peasants and workmen being allowed to use the name of even Kings to distinguish one of their brats from t'other; it is shameful, indeed, that the workman, James Brown should strut it at Holyrood Palace where our own King James—but hoots, hoots I go too quickly!

When the day came for Brown, now the supreme Commissar for Scotland, to take possession of Holyrood Palace he drove up in a carriage with outriders strongly guarded by hundreds of policemen and troops with fixed bayonets. The workmen know only too well how we hate their tyranny but overawe us by the display of brutal force on all such occasions as this.

Brown, dressed in a uniform of scarlet and gold which on his common body looks too utterly grotesque for words—but which on our bodies sets US off to such advantage,—Brown got out of the carriage the very door handle of which was held by a Marquiss, one of our proudest nobility, who had been shamefully forced by the Supreme Soviet to act as lackey to the ridiculous Brown. The man's wife, a homely body, (in their own home he calls her "Mother," so you can imagine the sort of creatures they are, dear Shanghailander!) this homely body got out of the carriage and was attended by a Marchioness and a couple of Countesses who had been forced, like the brave young Marquiss already mentioned, to wait upon this peasant of the female species. We could all of us see the emotion which the aristocrats were labouring under throughout this trying ordeal, but their lips were tight and they held their heads proudly under the public gaze.

I could see they were suffering keenly and took a secret opportunity of telling the Marchioness how my heart bled for her under this supreme indignity, and how I felt sure my own great-great-great grandmother would have admired and revered her for such a display of splendid womanly courage.

Her Lordship was very rude to me, however, and said in effect—(though these are not her exact words—they were stronger than I care to repeat.)—"What on earth are you talking about, Sir, how dare you speak to me of Mrs. Brown in such a manner? How dare you have the impudence to speak to me, her Lady in Waiting, in such a manner! Mrs. Brown, if you desire to know, is a dear old thing and she is coming to my evening party the day after to-morrow if she isn't too tired after all her public duties have been got through. I have a great respect for Mrs. Brown and would have you know, Sir, that I will not allow even a school master, "Lover of Scotland" though he be, to speak in such terms of the wife of the Lord High Commissioner for Scotland."

I was flabbergasted at her Ladyship's wild words and put it down to the strain she must have laboured under and the indignities put upon her by the Soviets and their creatures. That must have been the explanation, and this is confirmed by a paragraph in the paper announcing that her Ladyship has gone away for a rest cure after the festivities were finished—so it is obvious the strain of the times we are groaning under has affected her reason—and that accounts for her rudeness to me, so I don't take her wild words seriously.)

I have said enough to enable you to gain a tolerably correct idea of the conditions here in "bonny Scotland" as you and I used to call it in the old days.

One more word about the wages paid under this Workmen's régime.

A typist gets about £5 a month, and this is about equal to Mex. $43 in your money. From this she must pay her dues to the Typists Association and the National Health Insurance, and several other things she is interested in until she will have only about $34 left. One typist got only 25 shillings a month, but everything was found for her—her board and lodging and washing—she was a beginner and lived in.

An engineer or specialist receives only £10 a month—say about $85.

They call this democratic, but all those in Government offices receive better wages. One typist in the Labour Bureau for Foreign Affairs got £15 a month, say $130.

So you will see things here are fast becoming much the same as they are in Russia where I am told in the newspaper that:—

"In Vladivostok salaries are very low. A typist would get Gold Roubles 30 a month, and the rouble is about equal to a Mexican Dollar or a little over a yen. From this she must give taxes to the Trade Union, to the Invalids Association, to many different things, until she will have only 22 roubles left. One typist got only eight roubles but received supplies. An engineer, or specialist received only 42 roubles. They call this democratic, but all those in Government offices received better wages. One typist in the Soviet Foreign Bureau got 90 roubles."

I am sure you will be sorry to hear the awful state of affairs now prevailing in dear bonny Scotland, my old friend.

Such is life "Under the Corduroy Breeches."

I see little prospect of material advantage in having any dealings with the sad dogs of Westminster and certainly no credit. There is no gold to be seen in the country, all the money is a depreciated silver and bronze currency and millions of paper notes issued by the Government.

We read that their Majesties, the King and Queen, were forced to receive the Delegates of the Soviet—U.S.S.R. not Russia—at Buckingham Palace the other day. I can imagine the feelings of his Majesty receiving the murderers of his cousin. Their Majesties always wear the Royal Stuart tartan when they come to Braemar for the shooting every year, and I always reflect how painful it must be as they proceed along Whitehall for the State Opening of Parliament to pass the spot where the infamous Oliver Cromwell caused the head of Good King Charles to be cut off in public some years ago. King Charles was their revered and royal ancestor, as you know. And then, as they pass the House of Commons and Westminster Hall they are compelled to gaze upon the statute of that murderous Oliver Cromwell standing by itself, a commanding and sinister reminder, in the lawn of the very Parliament House itself! Poor, poor King George and brave, brave Queen Mary!"

That, Mr. Editor, is some of the letter of my dear Scottish friend which I have received this very morning and, believe me, I have not quoted it like the baby in "Alice in Wonderland":—

"He only does it to annoy
Because he knows it teases—"

but because it is one account of the state of affairs in Scotland today written by a respectable person. Whether it conveys a true impression of life and habits in Scotland I don't know! Perhaps one of your Scots readers will interpret it for us—I trust so. It sounds perfectly appalling and for my part I feel so distressed that I shall not have any more time to write letters to you about Russian Refugees as it seems likely, very likely indeed, that we shall soon have a tremendous influx of Scottish refugees pouring into Shanghai to escape the tyranny of the Labour Government in Great Britain—and you know only too well how Scotland always has groaned under the tyranny of the Southron, don't you?

In the meanwhile, I hope you will not commission your excellent fellow "Sapajou" to cartoon me as an Octopus devouring sweet girl typists in consequence of what I have written. I have already been depicted as a Gorilla drowning juvenile Russian cadets with blobs of ink—and if you show me up—as I so richly deserve, I daresay,—as that Octopus devouring the sweet girl typists of bonny Scotland I fear every Scottish member of the Moral Welfare League will at once get on my track and beat me to death with a stale haggis tied up in a dish-cloth, one of the national weapons when the Scots are very much enraged!

But, please, please do not omit to pen one of your illuminating 'Notes and Comments,' or even write a leader on the unpatriotic and vile insinuations of your literary bugbear,

P.S. Pray excuse the length of this letter but the earnest tone of my schoolmaster friend's letter, and I am sure you will agree he writes with much feeling, gives us "A Picture of Labourism as practised in Scotland to-day," not at all dissimilar to that of your lady correspondent, 'Lover of Russia,' whose views you published under the title, "A Picture of Communism as practised in Russia to-day," which gained your sympathy and caused you to send post haste to interview her.

I beg, however, that you will refrain from despatching one of your smart lads to interview me. The President of St Andrews Society is a more suitable person.—"S"

"SAVIOURS" OF RUSSIA.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me space in your columns to set forth still another Russian point of view concerning certain military refugees, to enable the foreign public to judge the matter from both aspects?

A sensational article appeared in your paper of July 23 under the headlines:—

"STILL THEY COME: RUSSIAN REFUGEE POPULATION INCREASING:" "SOVIET PROMISE OF 'SUDDEN DEATH' FOR ADM. GLEBOFF'S MEN." "BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT."

I suggest that the present situation regarding General (not "Admiral") Gleboff's party at Woosung would never have reached its present impasse if the Chinese authorities had, in the first instance, taken the necessary measures against usurpers of Russian State property, which 'patriotic saviours' of Russia, such as Messrs. Stark, Lebedeff, Gleboff & Co., have responsibility for bringing about, and for keeping in being.

What has been, and still is, one of the main causes for a portion of the Russian Refugee problem?

Surely the answer is not difficult for fair-minded observers?

Why, the trade or occupation of being a Refugee!

Is not the condition of these professional refugees directly traceable to the desire of a few "patriots" to stick to their self-imposed task of "saving Russia" just as long as they can? It is the only job they can think of. Having dismally failed in their own country and on Russian soil either to stem or stop the tremendous changes of social and political thought which have taken place amongst the millions and millions of Russians; having retreated ingloriously against the tide of changed ideas defended by Russian bayonets in preference to dying gloriously for what they tell you, non-Russians is such a "sacred and glorious Cause"—these men of narrow outlook lead their deluded followers to foreign shores and, from that vantage point of personal safety, breathe out vain vapourings against their country and their countryman—and, in sorry groups scattered along the China coast make a nuisance of themselves by staging this ever sorrier farce of "saving Russia!"

And, apart from the principals in this serio-comic affair—for what reasons do your readers think that several hundreds of refugees sailed in Admiral Stark's abducted ships for Manila, while two other groups remained with Generals Lebedeff and Gleboff?

Was it really in order to preserve "the remnants of the Imperial Army," and were they indeed the few remaining petals of the fast fading flower of Russian chivalry and military renown?

Were weighty political reasons involved in such strategy for the rank and file?

Nonsense. The plain un-romantic fact simply is they went as a flock of sheep, as a group of people who had been retreating for five or six years before the Russian Regular troops, as people accustomed to the habit of retreat, as men who had become demoralized through their habit of doing nothing except retreat and draw their daily rations.

What military, political, or any other significance would Admiral Stark possess apart from his band of demoralized men? Nothing.

And the same thing equally applies to Generals Gleboff and Lebedeff.

And, yet another thought for practical people's consideration:—What military significance, may I ask, can six, seven, or eight hundred ever retreating and thoroughly demoralized man possibly possess in comparison with the Russian Regular Red Army?

The idea is ludicrous. It is the phantom, the dim ghost of a nightmare which these deluded people persist in cultivating rather than arise from their disordered couches and, after a good shower bath of cold water, brace themselves to the task of facing a New Day!

It is merely typical of a few individuals who refuse to face the stern facts of their own failure, of the great facts of change, and of time, and of circumstance—which is our "New Russa!"

As for the leaders, these leaders of lost legions who refuse to retire gracefully into private life as many another self-constituted "saviour of his country" has had the good sense to do—do these men indeed possess much care for the "supers" of their stage army—their dupes? If so, why do they not urge them to begin to think of learning how to work, how to become useful Russians in Russia, on the soil of their Motherland, instead of restraining them by methods of terror and making of them useless vagrants in foreign countries?

I will not weary your readers further, but for the sake of common sense and the facts of the case I will tell your readers that General Gleboff's men have nothing to fear from the Soviet government provided they are willing to work and to earn their livings in Russia as other men are doing. These headlines of "SUDDEN DEATH" which create much prejudice against our institutions and ourselves are entirely un-necessary and entirely misleading. We of New Russia are bent on work, and do work, and we are determined that Russians in Russia shall learn to work and be made of usefulness and service in building up the future. We would have our critics know, however, that even Russians cannot put their house in order in a year—the affairs of a vast country take time to get into running order after all we have gone through these past 10 years—if no further back that 1914.

I hope you will excuse the length of this letter, there is much more to be said, but I prefer to leave the matter with the few suggestions I have put forward. Thanking you for publication.

I am, etc.,
B. PERLIN.

ENDOCRINE GLANDS

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Recent prognostications to the effect that the experiments conducted by the Endocrine Laboratories, New York, will result in prolonging life indefinitely would appear to be somewhat belated as the secret was known in China long ago.

The following advertisement appeared in your issue of the 24th instant:—

Educated Cantonese youth aged 32, with nine years' experience in book-keeping, accounting, banking, shipping, import and export business, seeks immediate employment. A.1. references. Moderate salary. Willing to furnish a security. Address Box 311.

CHINESE NAMES MISTAKEN.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—I notice in the article on the floods in the north, which appears in this morning's issue, that mention is made of the "Haikwanssu" dyke at Tientsin. This name has nothing to do with "Haikwan," or Maritime Customs; the characters are 海光 Hai-kuang, meaning, "Light of the Sea," which is the name of a famous temple on the site of what was once known as the West Arsenal. It was there that the Treaty of 1858 was signed.

Here in Shanghai foreigners make a similar mistake. We speak of Yangtszepoo, for instanee, and imagine that the name has some connexion with the "Long" River; while, as a matter of fact, the characters are 楊樹浦, Yang-shu-p'u, meaning simply "Bank of Poplars;" the bank being that particular district on the Huangpu known by that name.

There are many such mistakes; but they are excusable in foreigners. After all, what odds!

I am, etc.,

Shanghai, July 25, 1924.

P.S.—The Chinese never speak of the Yangtze as the "Great" River—It is always 長江, Ch'ang-chiang.

THE OLYMPIC GAMES DISPUTE

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—I notice in your to-day's issue a Reuter's telegram from London beginning "The opinions of British athletes voiced in British newspapers strongly oppose the movement that Britain should withdraw from future Olympiads because of the demonstrations of Latin temperament in minor events...." alluding to certain incidents that happened in the Colombes Stadium.

Why should the ill behaviour of a crowd near Paris be labelled "demonstration of Latin temperament?" What have the Latins got to do with it? If it were absolutely necessary to classify the incident by nationality it might have been called "Outburst of Gallic intolerance".

Personally I do not see any necessity for nationalizing the incident as if it were characteristic of a certain race or the result of a certain culture.

I do not see why the French shou'd be supposed to have a Latin temperament. Are they not original enough to have developed a temperament of their own?

The rowdyism of crowds attending football games in England is well known. The frequent brutal behaviour of crowds at baseball games and boxing matches are equally well known in the States. The beating up of negroes by crowds of whites in the U. S. A. in retaliation of the knockout inflicted by Jack Johnson to the white champion has been duly chronicled. To what "temperament" is all this attributable?

The Olympic games were instituted to promote friendliness amongst nations and the Colombes incident should certainly be deplored, although it should be remembered that it was occasioned by a relatively small group of irresponsibles under the stress of intense excitement. The broadcasting of an implied insult to a people who were not concerned in the incident by such a responsible and authoritative agency as Reuters is to say the least in very bad taste and is equally to be deplored.

FAMINE SURTAXES

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—According to this morning's telegrams, the Chinese are planning a new surtax to be used in famine relief. What became of the last surtax, and the one before that? Why should China be taxed for a relief fund that never relieves anyone. Dear Sir, I ask you? Let us try to find out.

REPATRIATION LOTTERY

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—We have had three at least, maybe more, lotteries to repatriate the Russians in Shanghai. What has become of the money? The lotteries are operated in Frenchtown and are a good thing—for the agents. But how many Russians have the lottery sent back to their native "borsch," or heath if such they have in Russia? It is a fine pretext for a lottery, but why cast the lots when every train brings more of the Russians into Shanghai. Why not run a lottery every week and apply the funds at Nanking or further up the line? That might lessen the influx even if it did not speed up the outgo.

THE JESSFIELD ZOO

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—The question as to whether wild animals should or should not be kept in captivity is one that vexes the soul of many animal lovers. On the one hand you have the cruelty—more or less pronounced according to the species of animal in question—of robbing the poor creature of its freedom and keeping it couped up in a cage that can never really approach its natural environment, while on the other you have the fact that few city children would ever see a wild animal, or learn anything of what wild life means if we did not have our "Zoos." I am not writing for the purpose of opening this question. What I do want to say is that if we must have "Zoos," then let us see to it that the occupants get as square a deal as possible.

Now take the case of the small collection of animals at Jessfield Park, which constitutes Shanghai's "Zoo." With all due respect for those responsible for this collection of animals, and giving them full credit for the cleanliness of the cages, as compared with those of many "Zoos" one has seen, I should like to point out that none of the animals have adequate space allotted to them for their comfort.

The most flagrant case is that of the rabbits, where there are at least five times more animals in the enclosure they occupy than is consistent with their well-being. The result is that the whole colony is a mangy-looking skinny bunch of ragamuffins. Rabbits like lots of green grass to feed on and run on. These poor creatures have nothing but a bare brown bank to burrow in.

I never saw a more unhappy looking creature than the eagle that used to be on exhibition in the "Zoo." When one considers what an eagle's life is, the keeping in captivity of that poor bird in the small cage given it, where it could hardly stretch its wings to their full extent, let alone fly, was little short of a crime.

The only really happy inmates of the Shanghai Zoo appear to be some of the monkeys, and one wonders whether this is not because they were mostly born in captivity and never knew the freedom of the jungle.

Take the space allowed to the raccoon-dog. An animal that ranges daily, or nightly, for many miles in search of his food, the raccoon-dog needs lots of space. Our specimen is forced to run aimlessly round and round his cage, where he has worn a path with his three sound legs and one gamey one.

With the whole of Jessfield Park at the disposal of the authorities, it is ridiculous to confine these animals to the small cages now in use.

By all means let us have wild animals safely caged for the amusement and instruction of the children; but let us see to it that those animals are made as happy and comfortable as possible—which is most emphatically not the case now.

The cages might be judiciously scattered throughout the Park, and the ugly bars and masonry hidden as much as possible by trees and shrubs; and no animal that could not be adequately caged according to his life habits and natural environment should be kept.

I trust those in charge of the "Zoo" will not mind my writing this letter. I do not doubt for a single moment that they are doing all in their power and knowledge to make things as comfortable as possible for the animals; but Shanghai is governed by a hard-headed group of city fathers who do not always smile upon suggestions that mean an increase of expenditure. They, in their turn, are often frowned upon by irate ratepayers—and so poor old raccoon-dog, with his aristoratic title, Nyctereutes procyonides, is forced to trot and trot and trot round his little paddock, looking longingly out into the open spaces from which he is barred.

Let us be humane. Either give the animals their liberty—or provide adequate quarters for them.

I am, etc.,
Arthur de C. Sowerby.

PROHIBITION IN WORKING

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—Your correspondent, Mr. G. P. Bostick, asks us to read some extracts from the American press bearing on prohibition. May I in turn ask him to cast his eye over the article headed "Cross-Country Crime" which appeared in the "Ladies Home Journal" of June 1924? The following brief extracts will show that there is not yet much to boast of in the condition of post-prohibition America.

> "Why are murder, theft, arson and all the other crimes five or 10 times as frequent in the United States as in any other country in the world—and that in proportion to the population?
> "The Americans and the Canadians have the same traditions and much the same institutions. Why should we be 30 times as murderous?
> "In New York City, with about six million people, there are 12 times as many murders as in London, with a not much larger population; far more murders in New York City annually than in all the British isles. It is not the foreign-born population that does the evil, but the pure-blooded, honest, old one hundred per cent. American stock.
> "It is stated that last year in the United States the thefts totaled $3,000,000,000. A congressman announced that 'the nation's Capital is 2,000 per cent. more murderous than London and 300 per cent. more drunken than Paris; and while Washington has increased in population 32 per cent. in the last 10 years, murder has increased 271 per cent., manslaughter 250 per cent., murderous assault 307 per cent., illegal liquor possession 700 per cent., liquor transportation 4,504 per cent. And this in the city built especially to house our legislative, executive and judicial machinery!'
> "From high to low the shame prevails. The worst of it is the war over causes, reponsibilities and cures. One judge blames the Federal officers. Another blames the local police. Another blames the judges; another, the juries that do not convict, though the gaols are so full that the prisoners can hardly be housed."

I would especially draw Mr. Bostick's attention to the last paragraph in view of the claim of one of his extracts that the criminal population shows a decrease of six per cent.

I might add too that the death-rate in "wet" England is lower than that in "dry" America. This proves nothing, except perhaps that the English climate is the better, but meanwhile we apparently have not much need to worry ourselves over the blessings of prohibition.

I am, etc.,
Xox.

WHEN TO VACCINATE

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—A while ago I read—I believe it was in your paper—that vaccination done abroad, in Europe or America for example, has but little efficacy in China, and that to ensure real protection against smallpox the vaccination should take place immediately on arrival in this country.

As father of a small family due to arrive in Shanghai a few months hence, I am particularly concerned in this question, the more so as my wife has written asking me whether she should have the children vaccinated before their sailing date or wait until they get here

It seems to me that the question is one likely to be of personal interest to many others besides myself, hence my idea of broadcasting it (with your kind permission, Sir) through the medium of the "North-China Daily News."

Perhaps one, or more, of your medical readers will be so kind as to supply the desired information.

Thanking you in anticipation for the space,

"CALLING THE POLICE"

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—Permit me to thank you for your very interesting but nevertheless true to the letter article in this morning's paper commenting on the apparent true disregard by the French Police Stations and officials of any requests for assistance or service.

You refer to a robbery which took place on Pere Robert, which happens to be in the neighbourhood of my residence, you then make reference to the dilatoriness of the police answering a call from a lady living quite close to a French Police Station, etc.

You will, therefore, not be surprised to hear of a similar complaint from my quarter some five weeks ago between the hour of 6 p.m. and 7 p.m. when my garage was broken in to and the servants' quarters were thoroughly rifled practically taking all the clothes, trunks, etc., together with money belonging to the servants residing in that room.

We attempted to acquaint the Police Station of this occurrence, asking them to send a detective at once, the only response we could get was "No English spoken." It was necessary for me to communicate with a friend of mine in the International Settlement who could speak French and it was necessary for him to call the French Police and even after all this difficulty it was a question of an hour before a representative of the police arrived and when he did arrive it was found that the detective was Chinese. We communicated the word to him, through one of our servants, that we wished to talk to a foreign constable and it was only the next morning, about 11 o'clock, that the case was investigated. Since that time we have heard nothing.

In addition to this we have had on one or two other occasions to call upon the police and in each and every instance we have not only met with the difficulty of not being understood at the Station but rather an indifference for the reasons that we have called upon them.

At the same time perhaps you will be interested in learning some of the "efficiencies" of the French Police. A very respectable Russian who occupies a responsible position upon returning from his work the other night heard the band playing in the French Park. He ventured in, wheeling his bicycle beside him, and was in the midst of enjoying one of the band selections when he was accosted by a French foreign constable who was not content to tell him that he was not allowed inside the Park gates with a bicycle, neither was he willing to accept his explanation that this was unknown to him and that he would see that it did not happen again. Consequently he was hurried off to the Police Station, detained three hours, and fined $5.

The old adage occurs to me "Strain at a gnat and swallow a camel."

In closing, please accept the writer's appreciation which will, no doubt, be appreciated by other foreign residents of the French Concession for your candid expressions upon a matter which is of grave importance to all foreign residents in the French Concession.

I am, etc.,
Ratepayer.

ANTHROPOLOGY AND THE CHINESE

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—Nearing its conclusion is a course of lectures of unusual interest which has formed part of the curriculum of a "Summer School" held throughout July both for foreigners and Chinese at St. John's University at Jessfield. The lecturer on anthropology has been Professor Shirokogoroff, Ph.D., and his class has been composed of one Chinese, four or five Americans, a German and a Briton—a deplorably small audience (albeit keen as possible)for so distinguished a scientist as the Anthropologist to the Museum of Anthropology and Ethnography of the Russian Academy of Sciences at Petrograd.

In explanation of the small attendance (as apart from the inconvenient hour of 3 p.m.) there had apparently been some anticipation that the Professor's command, or rather pronunciation of English might hardly be equal to the occasion. These fears, however, were groundless and after the first lecture which familiarized everyone with certain slight variations in the pronunciation of technical terms, no one had any difficulty in this respect in following the lectures and demonstrations. Indeed, as far as that goes, there were among the four nationalities present four distinct variations in pronouncing many of the terms employed in the lectures. In so cosmopolitan a group it was inevitable and will be until Latin and Greek are standardized.

But to return to my subject. Inquiries crop up from time to time in connexion with this or that feature or characteristic of the race in whose midst we are living, shewing that there are a number of people who would like, if the way were smoothed out, to add to their knowledge under these peculiarly favourable conditions for observation at first hand. It is possible, I undersand, that Professor Shirokogoroff's work may keep him in Shanghai during the forthcoming autumn and winter and it seems therefore a thousand pities if advantage cannot be taken of this admirable opportunity.

The object of my letter is to ascertain whether, if Professor Shirokogoroff were willing to undertake a course of instruction or a series of lectures—say one or two a week at 5.30 at some central place, there would be an adequate attendance of people really interested. The R. A. S. has recently published the results of Professor Shirokogoroff's researches on "Anthropology of Northern Chinese" ($3) and this would certainly form an invaluable background to such a course of lectures as is suggested, although to the relatively uninitiated it may be said to contain some pretty stiff fences to negotiate before rambling along the fairway.

There is so very little opportunity for this sort of thing in Shanghai, that I make no apology for calling attention to the present possibilities through the courtesy of your columns.

I am, etc.,
V. Keen.

MOTOR-BUSES v. TRAMS

To the Editor of the
"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—The advent of the motor-buses will no doubt be hailed with delight by those who have for years reluctantly tolerated the tram cars and the Tramway Company's disregard for the convenience and comfort of its patrons and its camouflaged attempts to please and at the same time to humiliate the Council and the Shanghai public.

To say that the trams and their working system are scandalous is only expressing it mildly. The newly installed gates are a pure sham and the number of by-laws that are being deliberately ignored by the Company and its employees amount almost to a crime.

Now that the motor-buses will soon be at the disposal and choice of the public, let us support them to the extent that sooner or later the Tramway Company will be compelled to "sit up and take notice" There is nothing like competition to stimulate profiteers who sit still and enjoy huge profits at the expense of the suffering public.

I appeal to the people in Shanghai to support the motor-buses as a protest to the disgraceful conditions, etc., of the trams as operated by the Shanghai Tramway Company.

Joe Aga.

P. S. I am not a shareholder of the Motor Bus Company, nor am I connected with the organization in any respect.

THE SILVER MARKET

Profit-Taking Caused by Increased Stocks in Shanghai

Reporting from London on June 25, on the silver market, Messrs. Samuel Montagu & Co. state:—

Prices have been disposed to sag, owing chiefly to the reluctance of buyers rather than pressure to sell. There has, in fact, been a slight decline each day since the 18th instant, the fall amounting to 1/16d. The news of the considerable increase in the Shanghai stock caused some profit-taking on the part of local bull operators and this accentuated the easiness which was apparent. Indian bazaar rates are well below parity and business in that quarter is not active just now, although the monsoon appears to be pursuing a favourable course. America has been usually a seller. Continental inquiry is still fitful.

"The Times" Vienna correspondent states that "the Austrian new schilling, of the nominal value of 10,000 kroner and a silver value of 8,000 kroner, or, roughly 6 1/2d., which is being issued to the public over the counters of the Austrian National Bank since Monday last, is, according to the 'Neue Freie Presse,' being stored away, or passed on at a premium of as much as 75 per cent., with the same avidity as that with which the silver kroner was hoarded by the masses during the war." The above news reveals that the putting of new coins composed of precious metal into circulation is a delicate operation after a period of currency reconstruction. Any novel coinage evokes a special demand in normal conditions; how much more so when paper and other almost valueless material for currency is being superseded by metal possessing intrinsic worth. As the time chosen for such new emissions as the above is when the authorities are desirous of creating confidence in a new currency system, obviously the issue of the coins must continue until a reasonable quantity remains in circulation at their nominal value. Hence it is not unreasonable to deduce that those Continental countries which have embarked upon a policy of minting silver coins must continue to do so even though many are at first hoarded, or lose the advantage of the preliminary step they have taken.

The "Wall Street Journal," under date of the 4th instant, stated that when the German Government inaugurated its recent coinage policy, to mint 600,000,000 marks in silver coins, Reichsbank silver stocks were sufficient to meet the needs of the first emission of 300,000,000, but that the metal for the second 300,000,000 will have to be purchased in the open market.

The silver quotations to-day for cash and two months' delivery are respectively 1/16d. and 5/16d. below those fixed a week ago.

THE GOLD MARKET

Reporting from London on June 25, Messrs. Samuel Montagu & Co. state:—

The Bank of England gold reserve against its note issue on the 18th instant, amounted to £126,406,390, as compared with £126,383,985 on the previous Wednesday. A fair proportion of the moderate amount of gold on offer this week has been taken for India.

The discount rate of the Imperial Bank of India was reduced on the 19th instant from 7 to 6 per cent.

The National City Bank of New York Bulletin thus refers to the gold embarrassment of the United States:—

"The movement of gold is proof in itself in our relations with the rest of the world that the balance of current payments is running to the United States. The record of merchandise trade shows an excess of exports over imports of $692,860,593 in the ten months from July 1, 1923, to April 1, 1924. Great Britain has made payments on her debt in the last twelve months aggregating $161,000,000. The other factors doubtless yield a balance against us, but not large enough to keep gold from coming. That this unbalanced situation, with gold flowing from where it is needed to where it is not needed, will continue indefinitely nobody believes, but it can be stopped only by a change in relative price levels, which will turn the merchandise balance against us or by greatly increased purchases of foreign securities in the United States."

It will be noted that the Bulletin is of the opinion that international loans by the United States would be, as we have pointed out in former letters, the readiest solution of the impasse. As regards the other alternative, we fear that, even if the level of prices in the United States rose, the existence of so strong a tariff wall might check that freedom of imports which otherwise would tend to reverse the balance of trade and stop the influx of gold.

We append figures relating to Indian trade (private account) for May (in lakhs of rupees):—

	Exports	Imports

SHANGHAI MARKET REPORT

Cotton Slack, but a Revival in Yarn: A Busy Week in Piece Goods

Aug. 2.

Cotton has not produced any excitement locally during the past week, but yarn was a little more interesting. The produce market once more has fallen absolutely flat. The only section reporting really good news was piece goods, there being distinct revival both in the indent houses and the auction rooms, the interior demand being particularly noticeable.

Piece Goods.

Tientsin, of course, still is exercising a considerable measure of caution, in view of the threatening inundation, but there has been a greatly improved demand from all other districts, especially from Szechuan and the lower Yangtze ports, whilst Tsingtao has shown a liking for speculation. The result has been overlooked, either as regards private sales or auction business, that the speculative element has been largely responsible for the improved values, the general rise of the past four weeks to a great extent being the result of the steady strengthening of cotton, an increase of 530 points on the New York quotations being reflected in a proportionate rise in local quotations. In the last few days there has again been a big drop in New York, so it is quite to be expected that we shall see a reaction next week. On the other hand, all the markets except those affected by the floods are buying freely and stocks remain small.

Cotton. Yarn, etc.

China Cotton.—Very little business has been done during the week, beyond some speculation in futures based on the American quotations. There were no official quotations on the Chinese Cotton Goods Exchange yesterday, but Shensi is put nominally at Tls. 47 to Tls. 48. Up to the present the conditions for the growing crop have been almost ideal, but just now rain is badly needed in many districts.

Yarn.—There was a welcome revival of interest during the week and quite fair quantities were sold, notably to Szechuan. There were no official quotations on the Chinese Cotton Goods Exchange yesterday.

American Cotton.—There is still considerable variation in reports as to the crops. One reliable private estimate puts the condition at 69 per cent. of normal and the total crop at 12,250,000 bales, the same firm's previous estimate having been 68 per cent. and 11,200,000 bales. Another firm drops the estimate to 63.3 per cent. Heavy rains are reported from Texas. There is a growing tendency for demands for spot cotton. In the early part of the week New York quotations continued to rise, but in the last few days there has been a sudden and heavy fall, only partly offset by a slight rise induced by unfavourable crop reports, though the latest figures still are higher than last week's. The market closed firm on Thursday at the following quotations:—October, 28.87; December, 28.17; January, 27.97; March, 28.30; May, 28.40; spot, 32.40. Highest October, 28.93; lowest, 27.57. On the same day the Liverpool market was easier, at the following quotations:—Fully middling, spot, 18.59; October, 16.18; January, 15.78.

Egyptian Cotton.—Sakellarides, November, 43.52.

Sampin.—The closing prices on the Osaka Exchange yesterday afternoon were:—August, Y. 321.60; September, Y. 317; October, Y. 313.80; November, Y. 311.10; December, Y. 309; January, Y. 307; February, Y. 306.80.

Messrs. A. B. Rosenfeld & Son, in their weekly report, issued yesterday, state:

China Cotton.—Fluctuations during the past week have again been nervous and erratic, but the tendency on the whole has been upward and the net result of the week has been a moderate advance. As to the future outlook, the course of the market will be dependent on weather conditions, especially during the critical months of August and September, and it would be useless to express any decided opinion. The trade's attention from now on to picking time will be centred not only on weather conditions but also on possible damage from insects, bollweevil, etc. While the technical position of the market may offer opportunities for occasional scalping operations, the progress of the crops in the American, Indian and China cotton belts will continue to be the chief basis for important prices.

EXTRACTS OF CORRESPONDENCE.

Tungchow, July 27.—The weather has continued clear and warm and the crop is generally clean. What is needed within the next few days is good heavy showers in order to improve general conditions.

Shanghai and districts, July 28.—In these sections the wheather has been too hot and dry, and complaints are general of too much sunshire; it is of utmost importance that we have rain without further delay.

Chêkiang Province, July 27.—The weather throughout this province at present is entirely too hot and dry for the condition of the plant. What is essentially needed in the near future is good heavy showers in order to put new life in the plants.

Yangtze Valley, July 26.—Weather fine. Crop reports are favourable; the last rainfall was very benefical to the crop.

Honan, Hupeh and Hunan Provinces, July 25.—It is reported that about 400 li of cotton fields has been flooded. Crop accounts less favourable.

Shantung and Chihli Provinces, July 26.—On account of the continued heavy rains and rapid rise of the river around Paotingfu and Chêkiachwang districts the new crop has already been damaged about 10 per cent. Dry, hot weather is badly needed, otherwise the outlook will be serious.

Yarn.—As was to be expected, we are pleased to chronicle the firm position of the yarn market during the past week. Prices advanced from two to three taels during the interval and at the close, the tendency was firm. In all some 9,000 to 10,000 bales of various counts and chops of local products have been booked for export to Szechuan, Canton, Swatow, Newchwang, Wuhu, Fukien, Ningpo, Tientsin, Hankow, Kiangse and northern ports, and over 4,000 bales direct booking with the mills has been recorded, this being the first real demand in our market for some time past. In summing up the situation, therefore, we are still of the opinion that we look for better markets in the future.

Messrs. J. Spunt & Co., in their weekly report, issued yesterday, state:—

China Cotton.—While the quantities of spot cotton absorbed by spinners during the past week may be considered negligible, prices, however, ruled higher and continue to be firm at the close, being buoyed up in trend by the advancing tendency in the values of the local staple for distant deliveries and the absence for the time being of any opportunity to draw on foreign supplies at more reasonable or even at the same rates as those ruling on the domestic growth. Weather conditions from later reports to hand, while not altogether as would be desired, may on the whole be considered as having been so far favourable and if similar conditions were to prevail, without any untoward circumtances intervening, a fair average yield of good quality cotton may be expected during the coming season. As to the future trend of prices, which is at all times dependent on many factors, it would be ridiculous to attempt any prognostication at this time, having regard to the hazard and vicissitudes the plant is exposed to during the month of August, which is its most critical period of existence, and we would therefore advise greater vigilance from day to day in deciding for supplies for future deliveries. Tone of the market, firm.

Produce.

All the produce markets during the past week have been lifeless. The only inquiries reported have been for groundnuts, but, by reason of the lack of supplies, business has been impossible.

COMPANY MEETINGS

THE SHANGHAI DOCK & ENGINEERING CO.

Annual Meeting

The annual general meeting of the Shanghai Dock & Engineering Co., Ld., was held at the company's offices, 150 Broadway, on Monday. Mr. John Prentice the Chairman, presided, and was supported by Messrs. P. L. Knight, A Brooke Smith and H. M. Tibbey (directors); there were 6,443 shares represented.

The Chairman said:—

The report and accounts having been in your hands for some days with your permission we will take them as read. The serious depression in shipping, shipbuilding, etc., continued during the whole year and up to the present there are still no strong signs of improvement. Considering the conditions ruling, the result of the year's working may be considered satisfactory. The net profit for the year including the amount brought forward from last years accounts, after paying all charges and allowing for all known liabilities to Tls. 647,456.84. This amount your directors recommend to be dealt with as following, viz:—

	Taels.
Pay a Dividend of Tls. 9.00 per share (12 per cent) absorbing	496,800.00
Add to Depreciation account (Bringing it up to Tls. 750,000.-)	52,000.00
And carry to new account	98,656.84
Taels.	647,456.84

We trust these recommendations will meet with your approval. We did not think it necessary to add anything to the special reserve fund which now stands at Tls 1,250,-000. Maintenance has in all departments as usual, been charged to working account. The alterations to the Cosmopolitan Dock were still suspended during the year but as the conditions which caused the suspension are improving, the work will be resumed shortly. Before moving the adoption of the reports and accounts, I will be pleased to answer any questions to the best of my ability.

The Chairman proposed, and Mr. A. Brooke Smith seconded:—

"That the directors' report and statement of accounts made up to April 30, 1924, as printed and circulated, be adopted and passed, and that the directors be authorized to pay a dividend for the year of Tls. 9 per share to shareholders on the register at date." Carried unanimously.

The following resolutions were also carried:—

"That Mr. John Prentice and Mr. H. W. Lester be re-elected directors of the company.—Proposed by Mr. Brodie A. Clarke; seconded by Mr. W. Wakeford Cox.

"That Messrs. Lowe, Bingham & Matthews be elected auditors of the company for the current year. —Proposed by H. V. Wilkinson; second by Mr. I. Mason.

The meeting concluded with a vote of thanks to the Chairman, proposed by Mr. Brodie A. Clarke and seconded by Mr. W. Wakeford Cox.

THE Japan Seamen's Union has long been agitating for a law requiring the installation of wireless on all ocean-going vessels. The Matsuyama Maru disaster will strengthen this plea for the additional security that radio can give to seafaring men.

WEST END ESTATES, LD.

Capital to be Increased to Tls. 1,000,000

An extraordinary meeting of the shareholders in the West End Estates, Ld., was held at the company's head office, 38 Kiangse Road, on Wednesday, for the purpose of confirming the resolution passed at the extraordinary general meeting on June 28, 1924, as a special resolution.

Mr. H. M. Cumine (chairman) presided, supported by Mr. P. L. Bojesen and Mr. C. K. Graves (directors). The attendance represented 9,759 shares.

The notice convening the meeting having been read, the Chairman said:

Gentlemen.—The purpose of this meeting is well known to you, as I explained it to you when we last met. We are here to-day merely to conform to the requirements of the Companies' Ordinances, which make it necessary for us to submit to you the resolution already passed by you at the last extraordinary meeting for confirmation as a special resolution. I shall therefore not take up your time more than necessary. I will now propose the resolution for confirmation as a special resolution:—

That the capital of the company be increased to Tls. 1,000,-000 by the creation of 90,000 shares of Tls. 10 each, ranking in dividend and in all respects pari passu with the existing shares of the company.

Mr. P. L. Bojesen seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously. This was all the business of the meeting.

THE Hangchow Telegraph Office has decided to establish a long-distance telephone service between Hangchow and Shaohsing.

THE Commission on Means of Communications at Mukden has decided to inaugurate a University of Communications for the Three Eastern Provinces. There will be six courses at the University—devoted to Aeronautics, Railways, Telegraphs, Electrictly Telephones and Wireless.

NEW York is to have next year the "largest building in the world devoted exclusively to amusement," to take the place of the historic Madison Square Garden, which will be pulled down in August, 1925, to make room for an office building. According to Mr. "Tex" Rickard, the sports promoter, who is behind the enterprise, the new structure will be situated on the site of the old tramway sheds in Eighth Avenue, between 49th and 50th Streets, a property which Mr. Rickard and his associates recently bought for $2,000,000 (£400,000). The new building will cost $3,000,000 (£600,000). Work upon it will be begun immediately, in the hope of having it completed by October, 1925. There will be an arena 400ft. long and 200ft. wide, with a seating capacity of 25,000, or nearly twice that of the Madison Square Garden, which was 14,000. The equipment will include a very large swimming pool, which in winter will be used for hockey contests. It is expected that the building will also be used for circuses, boxing carnivals, the horse show, six-day bicycle races, industrial exhibitions, and political conventions.

SOUTHERN RHODESIA

SOUTHERN Rhodesia which was inaugurated as the youngest self governing Colony of the British Empire on October 1, 1923, and which had previously for 33 years been ably administered by the British South Africa Company possesses one of the finest climates in the world with long hours of sunshine, breezy temperate days and cool nights. For those who wish to take up farming or ranching in order to make the most they can of their capital, energy and technical knowledge, or for those who wish to retire from strenuous business or professional life and make a home, Rhodesia offers many advantages unequalled elsewhere. The business, social, sporting, educational and medical facilities bear favourable comparison with those of other countries. Native labour is plentiful and when properly managed is cheap and efficient. Taxation is light. Good land in healthy surroundings and amidst fine scenery is plentiful and not expensive.

Full information is obtainable on application to The Secretary, Southern Rhodesia Settlers' Board (attached to the Government of Southern Rhodesia), P. O. Box 372, Salisbury S., Rhodesia.

The giving of advice to prospective settlers will be facilitated if applicants will advise the Board in detail of their circumstances and the amount of capital they would be prepared to invest in a suitable venture.

Decisive Victories for Race Club and Parsee Teams: H. B. Ollerdessen's Century

Shanghai Cricket Club v. Shanghai Race Club.

This game, played on the Shanghai Cricket Club ground on Saturday afternoon, provided cricket of so one-sided a nature as to take away much of the interest that this annual match usually provides.

If the Cricket Club team was weak in batting—having only five men with any pretensions to run-getting, it was weaker still in bowling, and with the Race Club putting in the field a good all-round 11, it was not surprising that the S.C.C. was badly beaten.

Parsee C. C. v. Shanghai Recreation Club

Further indication of the comparative innocuousness of the attack of the Shanghai Recreation Club at present was furnished in this match on Saturday, when the Recs' bowling was at times made to appear very cheap indeed. The Parsees batted first and Divecha and J. H. Bhoora went for the bowling to great effect, Divecha compiling an attractive 96 and then being run out, and Bhoora getting a bright 62. With the score at 219 for seven, the Parsees declared.

The Recs, on going to the wicket, could do comparatively little against the bowling of the brothers Shroff and were all out for 106, which included 17 extras.

The Davis Cup Competition: France's Decisive Victory Against Britain

London, July 26.

At Eastbourne to-day in the semi-final of the European Zone of the Davis Cup competition, Cochet (France) beat Kingscote (Britain) 3-6, 6-4, 4-6, 6-3, 6-3. Lacoste (France) beat Gilbert (Britain) 6-4, 7-5, 6-3.

Borotra was unable to play and Cochet replaced him. Kingscote was shaky at the start, but quickly adapted himself to the difficult, soft court. Cochet in the second set found his stride. He played a much more severe game and was excellent overhead. Kingscote lost many aces in the net, driving with a downward-sweeping racquet. Cochet was very steady and magnificent volleying won him the final set. Kingscote was hitting wildly in this set.

Gilbert was better than the score indicates. The Frenchman had several lucky shots which hit the net-cord, though he cross-volleyed beautifully. Gilbert frequently found the net and Lacoste gradually asserted his superiority.

A team of Yale and Harvard students to-day defeated a northern lawn tennis team at Manchester by 8 matches to 7. The northerners won 4 matches out of 6 in the singles and the Americans captured 6 out of 9 in the doubles.—Reuter.

London, July 29.

At Eastbourne to-day, France earned the right to meet Czecho-Slovakia in the European zone final of the Davis Cup Competition, having defeated Britain by securing the first three matches.

In the doubles Borotra and Brugnon beat Woosnam and Godfree 6-4, 4-6, 6-3, 6-1.

Later.

Gilbert (Britain) beat Cochet (France) 5-7, 1-6, 9-7, 8-6, 6-2. Lacoste (France) beat Kingscote (Britain) 8-6, 3-6, 3-6, 6-2, 6-4.

France thus won by 4 matches to 1.

France won the first set of the doubles owing to Woosnam's baseline weakness. The Englishmen volleyed well, but the French tactics did not allow them to go up to the net. Woosnam and Godfree's enterprising play won them the second set, but after that the dexterous and volatile Borotra asserted himself and almost played the Englishmen himself. His magnificent net-play won all Brugnon's service games throughout the match.

Gilbert made a great uphill fight after Cochet was at match-point to love for a straight-set victory. Gilbert repreatedly passed the Frenchman, who took liberties in coming up to the net.

Kingscote's steadiness led to a terrific struggle, Lacoste's brilliance finally established his superiority.—Reuter.

Copenhagen, July 26.

In the Davis Cup lawn tennis competition, Czecho-Slovakia defeated Denmark by 3 matches to 2.—Reuter.

Fourth Test Match Abandoned: County Matches Unfinished Owing to Rain

Manchester, July 26.

The Fourth Test Match opened at Manchester to-day in dull weather before a small attendance. The South Africans won the toss and went in to bat on a soft wicket after overnight rain. Mr. J. W. H. T. Douglas was the English skipper, vice Mr. A. E. R. Gilligan.

Commaille and Ward opened the innings slowly. After 40 minutes, when the score was 29 for a wicket, there was a 20 minutes' interruption for rain. Commaille was L. B. W. to Tate's bowling when he had reached 8, and Susskind suffered a similar fate to Tyldesley's bowling. The score at the lunch interval was 61 for 2 wickets, Ward and Nourse being in partnership with 31 and 13 respectively.

After lunch the crowd increased to 5,000. There were frequent interruptions for rain during the day, which limited the day's play to three hours. There was no play after 4.15. The umpires inspected the pitch at 5.30, but decided that it was unfit for play. The crowd made a demonstration in front of the pavilion, shouting for a resumption, but there was no play and stumps were drawn at 6.15. Ward played a very sound and patient innings, without giving a chance. He was bowled by Tate just as he reached his half century. Taylor and Catterall were in partnership at the close with 18 and 6. The South Africans scored 116 for 4 wickets.

LAW REPORTS

HONGKEW SHOOTING: FIVE YEARS FOR LESTER

Judge's Abhorrence at the Appalling Use of Firearms in Shanghai and Frequency of Such Cases: Merciful Providence Saved Victim from Death

At H.M. Supreme Court on Tuesday, William Nathaniel Lester, indicted for wounding John Welsh with intent to do him grievous bodily harm in the Wayport Rooms on June 23, was found guilty and sentenced by Judge Sir Skinner Turner to five years' imprisonment. In his summing-up, his Lordship commented gravely upon the "appalling levity with which people use firearms out here" and the frequency with which such cases came before him. Lester was described as having been engaged for several years as a structural engineer and subsequently as being a broker. His story, said the Judge, was a typical and sad one of a man's downfall through drink.

Counsel in the case were: Mr. H. P. Wilkinson (Crown Advocate) and Mr. E. T. Maitland for the prosecution; Mr. M. Reader Harris for the defence.

Lester pleaded not guilty.

Mr. Wilkinson described the nature of the charge to the jury, and briefly outlined the affair. He explained that Lester went into the Wayport Rooms at about 4.15 p.m. on June 13, accused Welsh of stealing certain clothing, and then shot him from the hip, wounding him in the groin. Counsel went on to say that a possible line of defence would be that Lester was drunk at the time he fired the shot, did not know what he was doing, and could not therefore be proved to have had any intent. Evidence would be brought to show, however, that whilst he certainly had been drinking, he was not by any means drunk and he had control over his voice and actions.

Friends for Three Months.

Welsh, a short stockily built man with a small black moustache, was the first witness called for the prosecution. He stated that he had known Lester for three or four months and had always been friendly with him. He met the prisoner in the Wayport Rooms on the day in question, and held a brief conversation with him. Lester went out and returned shortly afterwards. Witness at that time was leaning up against a billiard table. "Welsh," said Lester to witness, "where are my clothes?" Witness asked what clothes he meant, and added that if he referred to a pongee silk suit he had given him a few days before he could have it back later, when it came back from the laundry. To this Lester made answer, "Well it is my gear" and he then put his hand to his hip pocket and pulled out a gun. Seeing this witness cried out to him, "What are you going to do man, you must be crazy, what is the matter with you?" All Lester said in reply to this was "You'll see," and with that he shot witness, hitting him in the groin. He fell to the ground between the table and a chair, and Lester came over to him and kicked him a number of times, passing the remark that next time he ought to shoot him through the head. Witness repeated that he must be crazy, and then Lester walked out.

Cross-examined by Mr. Harris, Welsh agreed that Lester used to buy him food, he being out of a job.

Drunk on Chinese Wine.

Asked whether Lester did not supply him with a tiffin on June 10, witness said this was true. He met Lester in the market and he asked witness to have a drink of Chinese wine. Witness said he would rather have a cup of coffee first, and did so. Then he had the wine, and as Lester pressed him he had a plate of steak. But when it came to paying the Chinese who sold them the steak, Lester had no money, which made things awkward. He tried to pay for the food with some jade, but the Chinese refused to accept and eventually allowed them to go on their way, promising to pay later. That afternoon witness saw Lester at his house. Lester then had three bottles of Chinese wine, and asked witness to go and fetch three more. Seeing the state the man was already in, with drink, he did not like doing so, but agreed to please him. Lester then tried to get him to stop at the house, and pulled out a lot of dirty linen for him to use as bedding. His talk was wild and he made several references to some female who had stolen his clothes, and whom he intended to shoot. He also said he intended to shoot some man. Then he drank the three new bottles of wine, turned over on his side and went to sleep, and witness seized the opportunity to get away.

The Judge—Was he drunk?—Yes sir.

Welsh's Sober Day.

Was this one of your sober days?—Yes sir. Why, I had been sober for the past two days.

Sigurd Schack, manager of the Wayport Rooms, said he saw Lester in the bar on day in question, and he ordered a gin and bitters. Witness asked him whether he had taken to drinking again, and he said he wanted one to strengthen his nerves. Welsh was in the bar, and Lester called out to him and asked him what he had done with his clothes. Welsh replied, "What clothes?" and Lester said, "You'll see" and then shot him. He would not describe Lester as drunk.

Dr. N. Hay Bolton described Welsh's injuries to the Court, and stated that they were not now serious, though they might have been at one time. No permanent disability would result.

Hughie Dennis Macauley, an American mercantile marine deck engineer, who also witnessed the shooting, gave similar evidence to that of the manager.

Nicholas Rusesky, manager of the Astor Bar, told the Court that Lester came to his bar at about 4.30 p.m. on the day of the shooting. He seemed highly nervous, and borrowed some paper from witness with which he made up a parcel of something. Witness asked him what was wrong, and he replied, "I've shot a fellow in the Wayport Rooms." Rusesky took no notice of this, since Lester had made foolish remarks of a similar nature before. He asked witness to look after the parcel for him, and witness agreed. Police came to the bar later on to make inquiries, and then witness opened the parcel and found it to contain a revolver with a live bullet in the magazine.

Chief-Det.-Insp. Cruickshank gave evidence of arresting Lester in the Continental Bar at about five oclock on the day of the shooting.

"REVOLVER WENT OFF ACCIDENTALLY"

Accused's Story

Lester was the only witness for the defence. He said he had been in Shanghai about three and a half years, working as a structural engineer in various cotton mills. He had helped in the erection of the Kiangwan Race Course, assisted in road surveying with the Red Cross during the floods in Shantung; he had also been in partnership with a broker, but they had been ruined on exchange. He had worked with Palmer & Turner, and as steward at the Astor Bar. He had greatly helped Welsh, buying him food and giving him clothing. Welsh slept in a Chinese doss house at 20 cents a night, and witness frequently paid for this. Welsh repeatedly asked him for clothes. He met Welsh on June 10 at about noon. Witness had been drinking and he took Welsh and stood him a tiffin in the Chinese market. He paid for this. After tiffin witness took him to his house to give him some clothes. He did buy a bottle of samshui to steady his nerves. Welsh bathed and changed into an outfit witness provided him with, and Welsh suggested he should stay with witness till the end of the month. He said sleeping on the floor was a luxury after a Chinese doss house. Witness gave him 60 cents and he went out and bought two small bottles of samshui—four ounces each.

Drugged Samshui.

Witness took a little of the wine and he became extraordinarily drowsy and heeled over on to the floor. This was about 4.15 p.m. and he did not awake till a quarter to eight. He could hardly hold his head up, being very heavy and overcome by a strange sensation. He was convinced the wine was drugged. Welsh had gone, taking with him a trunk containing all his summer clothes, shirts, collars, ties, etc., three suits, three pairs of shoes, two suit cases, two portmanteaux, all his engineering books, papers, references, diplomas, discharges, and everything else of value.

He saw Welsh on June 12 in the Wayport Rooms and asked what had become of his clothes. He offered to do nothing in the matter if he would return the clothes. Welsh said to him: "I don't know where your clothes are, but it serves you right, it serves you right." Witness went away because he felt he would not be able to control his temper. He reported the matter to the police and asked for a warrant for Welsh's arrest. He was refused, because he could not prove anything.

Only Trying to Frighten Welsh.

On the 13th of the month he had some drinks to steady his nerves. In the afternoon he went to the Wayport Rooms and saw Welsh standing up against the billiard table. Witness put his hand to his gun and said "Now Welsh, you dirty vermin, where is my gear?" He replied "I ain't got it, Bill." Witness was pointing the gun at Welsh's head then, but he shifted it down towards the heart. He was only trying to frighten him into saying where his clothes were. He called Welsh a "dirty cur" and Welsh again said he had not got his clothes. Witness then turned round intending to leave the bar, and the gun exploded in his hand. Welsh dropped shortly afterwards, but witness believed he was shamming and went over and prodded him with his foot. He began to realize then that perhaps the man was injured, and so he left and went to the Astor Bar, where he handed over the revolver wrapped up in paper to the manager. He was in a state of absolute nervous collapse after that and when he was arrested he did not know what he was saying. When he went to gaol he believed himself to be on the verge of delirium tremens.

Thought Safety Catch Down.

Accused had positively had no intention of shooting Welsh; he simply wanted to frighten the man, and in fact believed the safety catch was down. Witness had been told that Welsh had been overheard to say, in the Chinese doss house, "that Lester was easy. All you had to do was to go to his house and lift anything he had." At the same time he was alleged to have produced a lot of Lester's property in proof thereof.

The Crown Advocate, in his closing speech, said there could be no doubt in the minds of the jury now that Lester was the man who fired the shot. His defence was that the revolver went off accidentally. He asked them could they possibly believe this when they considered all the evidence. They knew the man had pointed the revolver at Welsh, that he had threatened him, and that after Welsh dropped he went over and kicked him, saying that he ought to have shot him in the head. If he only intended to frighten his victim, why should he load the weapon? Surely it would have been more sensible and more safe to have the weapon unloaded.

On the Verge of Delirium Tremens.

Mr. Reader Harris, for the prisoner, denied that in this case there was intent. The case was a peculiar one, for they had to consider the prisoner's state of mind. He was very nearly suffering from delirium tremens; he believed and with reason, that Welsh had robbed him, and altogether he was highly nervous. He believed Welsh was shortly leaving the port, and he went to get the revolver intending purely to frighten Welsh. The explosion was an accident. There was no intent to wound whatsoever.

Judge's Summing-up.

Summing up his Lordship said this was but another case it was his lot to try as the result of the appalling use of fire-arms in this town. As far as he could work it out he had, about once every year, a case involving the unjustifiable use of firearms with more or less tragic results. The last case of the sort he had had to try started with the death of two people shot in a shop in North Szechuen Road, and it resulted in the subsequent conviction and execution of the man who did the shooting. It was only by the mercy of God that the man in the dock that day was charged with the offence of wounding with intent, instead of the graver crime, murder. Had the bullet gone two or three inches higher up death would almost certainly have resulted.

As the story had been told that day there was only one question for the jury to decide. Did he intend it or did he not? There was not the slightest doubt that his was the hand that fired the shot. His defence was that he took the revolver merely with the intention of frightening his man. As to that they had all the evidence, and the story of the amazing behaviour of the prisoner when the man was on the ground. Without waiting to see—and this was Lester's own story—whether Welsh was injured or not, he prodded him with his foot, as he described it himself, or kicked him as described by the prosecution, and said he ought to shoot him through the head.

The Judge, after reviewing the evidence, commented that there was another tragic side to the whole story. Whatever was the result, the reason prisoner was in the dock that day was drink. His own story, not the evidence against him, was that he was drinking so heavily that nothing pulled him together but more drink, and then more drink. He could not give it up. Even after he committed the wounding, his actions were to proceed to the Astor Bar to drink there, to the Continental bar and to other bars, always drinking, drinking. It was a typical and a sad story; that a man who had held the positions Lester said he had held should have sunk till he stood in that dock today all as a result of drink. Again he reminded the jury to ask themselves the question, was the action intentional or unintentional?

After a 20 minutes retirement the jury brought in a unanimous verdict of guilty.

Brothers Killed in the War.

Asked what he had to say that sentence of the Court should not be passed upon him, prisoner pleaded with the Judge to be lenient. He said he had a number of brothers killed in the war and his parents were getting old. He asked that the result of this trial should not be allowed to reach their ears.

The Judge, passing sentence, said the jury had brought in a verdict of guilty, in his opinion, perfectly rightly. Prisoner had pleaded for leniency on behalf of his parents. Well, he should have thought of his family before he had done the shooting. They (the Court) knew the cause of his downfall, it was the cause of the downfall of so many who stood in the criminal's dock.

"It is appalling to me," the Judge repeated, "with what levity people use firearms out here. . . The least sentence I can pass upon you, William Lester, the very least, I say, is that you be imprisoned and kept to hard labour for a term of five years."

FERMUS AND OTHERS OF TIENTSIN

Involved Dispute With $28,000 As Prize: Russian Claims Against Frenchman

Application for judgment in a case involving some $28,000 was made in H. M. Supreme Court on Monday, before his Honour Judge Sir Skinner Turner, by Mr. Tycho Wing, plaintiff being Mr. R. Fermus, a Tientsin lawyer. The proceedings marked a further stage in lengthy litigation in which various Russian groups are concerned, the matter having a political background. There were two rival claimants intervening, one being Mr. Malyguin (represented by Mr. M. Reader Harris and Mr. Fishman), and the other Colonel Ushakoff (for whom Mr. P. W. Goldring appeared).

Mr. Wing, in asking for judgment, said that if it were not given now, leaving the intervenors to prosecute whatever claim they might have against plaintiff, the case might go on indefinitely. Mr. Malyguin had kept the pot boiling for three or four months, and now Colonel Ushakoff came in and he would do the same for another three or four months, when various other Russians might appear in turn. The case should be terminated so far as that court was concerned. Plaintiff was a member of the French bar practising in Tientsin, and the intervenors might have no fear of being able to recover anything to which they might be found to be entitled.

Mr. Reader Harris asked that the proceedings be stayed, saying that his client had gone to Tientsin to institute proceedings against Mr. Fermus in the French Mixed Court.

Mr. Goldring's position was that his client's claim would have to be made against the party successful in the action at Tientsin, and if judgment were given now it would knock him out altogether.

A Complicated Case.

His Lordship, in giving judgment, said that this was a motion in a series of three or four actions which were brought originally in the provincial court at Tientsin by one Fermus, a French citizen, against the Siberian Agricultural Corporation, Ld., a British limited liability company. The actions were brought on promissory notes drawn by the Siberian Agricultural Corporation for various sums of money and dated May to October, 1923, in favour of S. N. Shendrikoff. There were eight notes due at various dates in this year. The notes were endorsed over by Shendrikoff to Fermus, who was a French avocat practising at Tientsin, and it was known now that the endorsement was not for value received but was for the purpose of collecting all the money due on the notes. One action between the parties had already been tried by the learned Assistant Judge of that court in Tientsin, who gave judgment for plaintiff. After this a series of actions was commenced, a claim for the money was made by one J. A. Malyguin, who asked to intervene in the case on the ground that he was the right person to have the moneys, the subject of these notes, and an inter-pleader was entered.

Siberian Corporation Out.

On February 28, the defendant company swore two affidavits, one endeavouring to obtain leave to defend and the other calling upon Malyguin to maintain or relinquish his claim which was the subject matter of the action, and in this second affidavit the defendant company expressly stated that the claim was no other in subject matter than for charges and costs. On March 6, this matter came before the judge at the Tientsin court and he ordered that all proceedings be stayed sine die, that the defendant (the Corporation) should pay the money into court within one week, less costs, pending settlement of the dispute, in regard to the subject matter of this action between Fermus and Malyguin, by the competent court, and further ordering that the parties be at liberty to apply generally. The result of that order was that the Siberian Agricultural Corporation (the drawer of the notes) was out of the picture altogether; they paid the money into court, received their taxed costs up to date, and did not appear any further in the matter at all. They had therefore left on the records the plaintiff, the endorsee of the notes, and the claimant to the proceeds of them, Malyguin, who intervened in Tientsin as long ago as February last. In the beginning of April plaintiff in the Tientsin court pressed his claim on the ground that Malyguin had done nothing to put forward his claim, and he therefore sought judgment. He did not get it at that time, his Lordship's recollection being that he had taken part or was just about to take part in certain proceedings in the Mixed Court. It seemed to his Lordship that the only question he had now to decide was whether or not the intervenor, Malyguin, had taken steps sufficient to keep alive such claim as he might have to the proceeds of these notes before Fermus got what he was apparently entitled to get—a judgment upon them.

Ushakoff and Malyguin.

On May 23, the records showed, a claim was filed by an American lawyer practising in Tientsin, on behalf of Colonel Ushakoff, who claimed that neither Fermus nor Malyguin had any right to this money and that he was the only person entitled to it. In order to protect Col. Ushakoff's position, he (his Lordship) directed that notice of these proceedings should be served upon him, and thus he was represented that morning. With regard to Col. Ushakoff's claim, it seemed that he was entirely out of the picture so far as that court was concerned. He put in his claim as long ago as May 23, in the form of a letter to the court, but he had taken no further steps of any sort to support his claim, or do anything in the matter at all, and in these circumstances his Lordship did not see why he should regard the claim now.

The position of Malyguin was different. He came in originally in February, and on March 6 an order was made that the dispute be settled in the competent court. Complaint had been made that Tientsin did not direct how the dispute was to be settled: that it should have stated the case must be heard in the French court or some other court, and should also have stated who has to be the plaintiff and who the defendant. The order was made by the provincial court after consultation with his Lordship, and left the parties to take proceedings as they thought fit in the competent court. It was impossible for a British court to advise what was the competent court in a case of this sort. The parties took no real steps to prosecute their claim, whichever court it had to go to. In April, Mr. Fermus endeavoured to get his judgment in Tientsin, and now the case had been brought to this court.

His Lordship, continuing, referred to proceedings in the Mixed Court in which threatened intervention by Malyguin was dismissed on the ground that his status as intervenor had not been proved, went on to say that the next step was that Fermus and Malyguin both took out summonses, the one seeking an order as to how to bring his case, where to bring it, and directions of that sort, while Fermus asked for judgment.

Litigation Must Stop.

There must be an end to litigation, his Lordship concluded. It was clear from the case of Ibragimoff v. Shendrikoff, tried in that court, that there was a certain amount of politics mixed up with the matter, but with this he was not concerned. All he had to see was that as far as possible justice was done between the parties. It seemed that the only course he could take was to try the case as if the parties knew what they were about when they signed the promissory notes. Their dealings were with Shendrikoff, and the court was not concerned as to whether Shendrikoff acted on his own account or in a representative capacity. They dealt with him, and he had regularly and formally endorsed the notes over to Fermus for collection. Judgment must be given for Fermus for the amount of the promissory notes, with costs.

On the application of Mr. Reader Harris, his Lordship granted a stay of execution for 15 days.

MISADVENTURES IN THE COTTON MARKET

Supreme Court Judgment in Rosenfeld-David Case: A Partner's Liabilities

His Honour Judge Sir Skinner Turner on Thursday gave judgment in the case inwhich Messrs. A. & B. Rosenfeld, the Shanghai cotton brokers, claimed from Mr. Maurice David the sum of Tls. 21,146.40 under a deed of partnership. A breach of the agreement was alleged, and denied, and defendant further denied liability in certain of the firm's business affairs as from the date of his withdrawal. His Lordship gave judgment for plaintiffs (save in respect of a debt due to Messrs. Spunt & Co.), and ordered that an account be taken.

In giving judgment, his Lordship said: The two plaintiffs and the defendant entered into a partnership in writing in May, 1921: the defendant obtaining one quarter share, but the document does not state the shares of the plaintiffs.

In February 1924 difficulties existed and the partnership came to an end. It is the settlement of the matters between the partners that has led to this action.

The construction of the agreement is the first thing to be determined: it has been argued for the plaintiffs that under it the defendant could only leave before the expiration of the term fixed by consent of all the partners; for the defendant that he could leave at any time and be quit of the whole affair on certain terms.

It is clear that the partnership was for 10 years, renewable at the end of that time by mutual consent: that the defendant was to pay in Tls. 25,000 as his share of the capital, and Tls. 20,000 as a premium: and was also to assume "as long as the agreement remains in force' his quarter share of a certain debt due to Messrs. J. Spunt & Co. In return he was to get one-quarter share of the business. The accounts were to be made up as and from May 17, 1921, and thereafter they were made up to December 31 in each year. We also know that, recently at all events, the partnership has not been successful. It is necessary to remember the nature of a contract of partnership: it is essentially as a general rule one for the personal activities of the partners and as such it is at least doubtful how far a Court of Equity would make any order compelling a partner to attend to the work of the partnership. To that extent therefore I take it any partner can bring a partnership to an end without the consent of the other partners, subject always to such terms and penalties as the contract itself or the law may impose. And in that event I take it the relations of the partners inter se fall to be decided in the usual way. But here, the possibility of the ending of the partnership as far at all events as the defendant was concerned was clearly contemplated in the original agreement "should the party of the second part withdraw from the co-partnership within a period of 10 years," then certain consequences were to follow. And it is this clause that has given rise to the difficulties.

Partnership Liabilities.

As to the words, "Should the party withdraw within the period" I do not see why they should not be construed to mean exactly what they say, this leads to no absurdities or anything like that, and if such a construction seems to benefit one party or the other it is after all their contract and the words are being used in their ordinary sense. To my mind therefore there must be a withdrawal by the defendant, not an exclusion of him by his co-partners: an act of his own, for good cause or bad cause, with or without the consent of his copartners: but it must be his withdrawal and there can be no doubt that that happened in this case. There was a quarrel on February 12, 1924 (there had been other difficulties before, but it has not been really argued that any of them or all of them were enough in law to have enabled a Court to make a decree of dissolution of partnership): the defendant thereupon left the office, wrote his letter of the same date and never returned. It is clear that he thereby withdrew and so brought the partnership to an end, and the clause into play. So far as any "consent" to his withdrawal was given, it is clear that it was only given to a withdrawal on the terms of the original agreement. The clause means "should David leave the partnership before the expiry of the 10 years fixed for any cause whatever." I cannot help remarking that, if he were to leave by mutual consent, I do not doubt that the terms would be embodied in that consent. Now the terms of his withdrawal are then laid down:—

(1) return of his capital: Tls. 25,000
(2) non-return of his premium: Tls 20,000, or
(3) any other sums paid.

It is the last words that are hard to construe: but I have come to the conclusion that the whole clause refers to payments to be made to the defendant in the event of his withdrawal: it is in the nature of the penalty he is under for not remaining for the full term: it is the credit side of his account with his co-partners: the missing words therefore are "to him." He was to get back his original capital only but no part of his premium and no other sums were to be paid to him. Whether these words would cover his share of profits for the period between the last division and his withdrawal it is not necessary to decide (I am inclined to think they would): for it is known there are none. But they certainly do not entitle him to leave the partnership as and when he likes and demand his capital back and with that close his connexion with the firm altogether and escape from the ordinary liability of a partner to share in the losses. They do not relieve him from the necessity of an account and its consequences in the event of a loss: and I am glad the view of the parties at the time as shewn by the correspondence is the true view: each side thought an account was necessary, and it was not until the pleadings were delivered that it was suggested that no account need be taken because of the wording of this clause. There must be an account taken; and David must bear his share in the loss. As to what is known as the Spunt debt: one due from the firm to Messrs. Spunt & Co. in order to relieve Mr. A. B. Rosenfeld from the consequences of a restrictive covenant into which he had entered and payable out of profits only: it is expressly stated that the defendant's liability for this was only "as long as the agreement remains in force." Again I do not see why the words should not mean what they say: this agreement was not in force after February 18, 1924, owing to the withdrawal of the defendant, a position contemplated in the agreement, but not mentioned in the clause dealing with this dept. Again, I see no reason to extend the liability beyond what the words say and therefore there is no further liability in this matter, as between the partners, after February 18, 1924.

Sharing the Losses.

As to the premium: the defendant had the right to pay this (Tls. 20,000) in four instalments: he has paid two only: is he liable to bring the other two instalments into the account? they are payable in May 1924 and May 1925. To my mind the intention of the parties was for a payment of Tls 20,000: for convenience of all parties it was to be spread over four years, but it seems to me that the defendant cannot be heard to say that he is not to pay the unpaid part of this premium, merely because he has of his own motion, withdrawn from the partnership and so brought it to an end. It is part of the penalty that he is under for not remaining for the full 10 years. One other matter remains: there were on February 12 or 18, 1924 certain contracts in existence for what are known as "cotton futures." These showed some slight loss at the time of the withdrawal according to market prices, but the plaintiffs, who on the withdrawal were left in charge of the business did not close them till a later date when they showed a considerable loss: The plaintiffs urge that the defendant must take his share of this loss: the defendant on the other hand contends that these contracts being an asset must for the purposes of a dissolution account be valued as at the date of the dissolution. I fail to see that the plaintiffs action was in any way wrong in holding these contracts open, hoping no doubt for a turn in the market in their favour. It was never the contention of the defendant in the correspondence that the position now put forward on his behalf was the correct one, he then claimed his share in any profits and admitted his liability for any loss. I cannot see why he should be allowed to insist on the valuation of these contracts as at the date of his withdrawal on a date of his own choosing, and so escape the ordinary liabilities of a partner.

There must be an account on the lines above laid down and the plaintiffs are successful in their claims save in respect of the Spunt debt.

Mr. Tycho Wing (instructed by Messrs. Schuhl & Schoenfeld) appeared for plaintiffs and Mr. M. Reader Harris (instructed by Mr. Sidney Moss) represented defendant.

In H. M. Supreme Court on Monday, his Honour Judge Sir Skinner Turner confirmed the special resolution passed by shareholders in the Yangtsze Insurance Association, whereby the scope of the company's transactions is to include the work of trustees, executors, guardians, and other business of a fiduciary character. The application was made on behalf of the company by Mr. H. Lipson Ward who, in answer to his Lordship, said that the business would all be new business and would in no way affect the insurance side of the company's activities.—The application was not opposed.

THE POWERS OF THE SUPREME CURT

Can Proceedings be Taken in Shanghai Against a Company in England?

A legal point of considerable importance occurs in the case of Messrs. R. B. Moorhead & S. J. Halse v. the Union Gold Storage Co., Ld., and the Shanghai Ice and Cold Storage Co., Ld., which came before his Honour Judge Sir Skinner Turner in the Supreme Court on Thursday.

The action has been brought to recover damages for an alleged encroachment by defendants upon plaintiffs' property, and application is now made on behalf of the Union Cold Storage Co. that an order of the court dated April 23, whereby leave was given to serve the writ upon the manager of the Shanghai Ice & Cold Storage Co., might be discharged and proceedings against the Union Company be set aside on the ground that it is not and never has been within the jurisdiction of the court, nor has it ever carried on business within the jurisdiction.

In an affidavit by Mr. R. C. Aitkenhead, manager of the Shanghai Ice and Cold Storage Co., it was stated that the Union Cold Storage Co. is a British company incorporated in England, and that it is not registered at the British Consulate in Shanghai. The property which is the subject matter of the action (B. C. lot 5881, owned by the Union Company and occupied by the Shanghai Ice Co.) was registered here in the name of the Union Co., but this company has never been resident here. Mr. Aitkenhead further stated that neither his company nor any person in its employ had ever acted as agent in China for the Union Cold Storage Co.

Mr. M. Reader Harris appeared for plaintiffs and Mr. G. H. Wright and Mr. J. E. Badeley for defendants.

Mr. Wright said that this application was taken out by the Union Cold Storage Co., Ld., and raised a question of considerable interest and also of importance to the public, inasmuch as it put in issue the right of that court to take jurisdiction over a British company incorporated in England and which does not carry on business in China nor was it in any sense resident within the limits of the principal Order. The summons was taken out under Order 12, rule 30, of the Supreme Court rules in England, and counsel referred to rule 111 of the local rules which, he said, was substantially the same as order 9, rule 2, of the Home rules in regard to the conditions under which "substituted service" might be ordered. Substituted service could only be had, he submitted, in cases in which personal service could have been made when the writ was issued, and in this connexion he referred to the White Book of the current year (pp. 74-75). Counsel went on to say that the affidavit filed in support of the application for substituted service was defective, inasmuch as it did not refer to the matters laid down in the Home practice which must be included in such an affidavit before an order for substituted service could be made.

Leading Cases.

Mr. Wright next referred to the three leading cases which govern the question of substituted service, viz., Fry v. Moore, Wilding v. Bean and Jay v. Budd, and said that according to these cases it was impossible for a court to make an order for substituted service unless it was proved that the defendant was within the jurisdiction at the time of the issue of the writ, and left to avoid service. Counsel next referred to the case of Jones v. Debenham & Freebody, decided by that court in 1902, where the court recognized the principles applied to the question of substituted service as laid down in the three cases already mentioned. In this case the court only allowed substituted service because the defendant Debenham was within the jurisdiction at the time the writ was isued, and the judge (Sir Frederick Bourne) expressed the opinion that the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court was limited to persons resident within the limits of the principal Order. If this case was rightly decided, counsel continued, then the court could not take jurisdiction because the jurisdiction of the court under the present Order-in-Council was no wider than the jurisdiction under the order in Council of 1865.

Mr. Wright went on to refer to article 89 of the Order-in-Council of 1904 which provided that the civil jurisdiction of the court must be exercised in accordance with English law, and said that the jurisdiction of the court originated under a Treaty and was derived from orders in council made under the authority of the various Foreign Jurisdiction Acts; and while in some cases the jurisdiction of the court was co-extensive with that of the High Court in England, there was nothing in the Orders-in-Council to suggest that this court could exceed the powers of the High Court. It was obvious, counsel argued, that this court could not make rules giving itself power to do what would be ultra vires for the High Court to do if this were in England. The High Court in England in its inherent jurisdiction had jurisdiction over British subjects wherever they might be, but the jurisdiction of this court was limited to British subjects within the limits of the principal Order. The substituted service made in this case would be a nullity in England, and the rules of that court did not enable the judge to do what would be null in England. The real test was, could personal service have been legally made on the Union Cold Storage Co. at the time the writ was issued? It was clear from section 51 of the Order-in-Council of 1913 that it was not all British companies who were subject to the jurisdiction of the court but only companies which ought to be registered and were not. Companies which ought to be registered were those which carried on business in China. The Union Cold Storage Co. did not carry on business in China; and as to what constituted "carrying on business," Counsel referred to the case of Okura & Co. v. Fors Backa and Babcock v. Cumberland Gap. Co., and said if these cases were before the court in England they would clearly be governed by Order 11 rule 1 (a), and service out of the jurisdiction would have to be obtained. In this connexion, it must be remembered that an order for service out of the jurisdiction was more difficult to obtain than an order for substituted service. It was clear that that court had no jurisdiction to issue a writ for service out of the jurisdiction and, if it had not, it could not make such an order and give itself jurisdiction by getting round it by means of substituted service. The question of service out of the jurisdiction was a question of jurisdiction and not of practice, and that court certainly could not enlarge its jurisdiction by making rules of court.

New Class of Action.

As regarded section 5 sub-section 2 of the principal Order-in-Council, this had no application here to give the court jurisdiction over the Union Cold Storage Co., the jurisdiction to which it referred covering only such matters as probate administration, bankruptcy, trusts and, possibly, lunacy. It could not mean that an action could be brought in rem against any property or British subject not within the limits of the principal Order. This would be to introduce an entirely new class of action unknown to English law, actions in rem being limited to Admiralty. If this article were meant to cover such a case as the present one, it would certainly have stated very clearly that the court had jurisdiction over any British subject within the limits of the Order, or of his assets within the limits of the order. If an action in rem could be brought against land where the owner was not within the jurisdiction, it could be brought in respect of houses, or shares, or a banking account; in fact, it could be brought whenever the defendant had assets which could be seized here.

In conclusion, counsel submitted that the order for substituted service was bad, on the authority of the cases of Wilding v. Bean, and others, and the case of Jones v. Debenham & Freebody, and should be set aside. Further, the court had no jurisdiction to entertain this action as against the Union Cold Storage Co. merely because they possessed a piece of land within the jurisdiction.

The proceedings were adjourned until next morning, when argument for plaintiffs will be heard.

U. S. COMMISSIONER'S COURT

S. W. Thornton & Co., Ld. v Fred Ritter

Deferred payment for 20 cases of whisky was the subject-matter in the case of S. W. Thornton & Co., Ld., v. Fred Ritter, heard in the the U. S. Commissioner's Court on Tuesday afternoon, before Mr. Lurton, the plaintiff being represented by Mr. W. Y. Char and the defendant not being represented by counsel.

The plaintiff alleged that on May 18, 1923, the defendant ordered 20 cases of Iona whiskey at $26 a case and also two bottles of whiskey valued at $4.40 for which payment had never been made and judgment was therefore asked for $524.40 and costs.

The defendant claimed that the arrangement had been made, not with the plaintiff, but with Mr. Harry Flower, whose connexion with the plaintiff company was unknown to defendant.

The present manager of the plaintiff company, Mr. R. E. Geiler, stated that Mr. Flower represented the company in question and that the defendant had agreed to pay the indebtedness to this company in monthly payments, which had not been met. The defendant denied any arrangement with plaintiff, but upon the submission of a letter accompanying the bill of lading which specifically stated that payment was to be made to plaintiff, the Commissioner gave judgment in full for the plaintiff with costs, remarking that in any instance where a bargain was made with one party and payment was demanded by another, inquiry should have been made before the goods were accepted, since if the goods were not refused, payment could be claimed.

FOREIGNERS DUPED

Audacious Swindler Sent to Prison for a Year: Series of Clever Frauds

A most novel swindle came to light at the Mixed Court last Friday morning, when S. K. Wong, alias several Wongs, Sings and Kyungs, appeared before Mr. Martin and and Magistrate Zao.

Sub.-Insp. Powell had charge of the case.

It was Wong's habit, said the prosecution, to become acquainted with the employees of the various men against whom he operated and elicited from them details which could give him an insight into some of their most intimate affairs and then applying a touch of shrewdness, not usually possessed men of the type, wormed his way into the confidence of the victim and got money by false pretences.

Mr. A. G. Wallas, Chinese Maritime Customs, in answer to Mr. Maitland, Police Solicitor, said he was residing at the house of Mr. K. J. McEuen, Commissioner of Police (now home on leave). Accused came to see him there on June 15 at 5 p.m. with his subtle tale and extracted funds for a cable. Stating that he knew some of witness's friends whom he called by name, one of whom was in the Inspector-General's office, Peking, accused declared that a certain Woo family with whom his sister was staying would shortly come to Shanghai and Mr. Woo would then call upon witness. That he was staying at the Burlington Hotel was another assertion which lent dignity to his position. Finally after a long conversation in Chinese and English—accused said he knew Russian also—Wong showed Mr. Wallas a printed form of Chinese characters which he desired to send to his sister in Peking, but it was after banking hours and he had not enough funds. Could witness lend him $4. Departing with effusive thanks, Wong declared that he would return with Woo, but failed to do so.

The Confidence Trick.

Mr. A. L. Blechynden, victimized in the sum of $35, was the next witness. Wong also came to see him, said witness, at the New Engineering & Shipbuilding Co., stating that as advance agent for Mr. Woo in Peking, he was authorized to open negotiations for work to be done on a steamer. Informal conversations followed and Wong then asked to write a cable in Chinese containing important information and requesting a time for an appointment. Accused again seemed to lack funds for sending the wire and asked for a loan of $25 which witness granted. He came to witness's home after dinner and, stating that he had to send yet another message wanted $25 more, but witness, his suspicions aroused, gave him but $10. "He said that he would bring Woo, coming from Peking, to my office at 4 p.m. on Tuesday, three days later, but at the appointed time, punctually, the 'phone bell rang and Wang's voice came over the wire. 'Woo is very busy today, but will see you later,' said defendant." Witness never saw or heard of him again until several days ago when at Hongkew Station, he looked from behind the bars at him.

German Consul Victimized.

Diplomats, too, were not exempt from the machinations of the swindler. Dzau Wa-foo, employed at the German Consulate, had dealings with him. Again the cable and funds for it played a prominent part in the swindle. Giving his address as the Kalee Hotel, where he said he had a suite of rooms, Wong pleaded for funds to send 80 characters by wire. Witness offered to send the wire by messenger, but Wong would send it himself and accordingly left the premises, to return, stating that he could get no funds as the banks were closed. He needed $30, and as the Consul was engaged, he sent out a message to witness to assist Wong. An advance of $15, not being enough, five more were given. Later in the evening when Wong did not return Dr. Breckler told witness to inquire at the Kalee Hotel and at the cable office, but the search revealed nothing. The police were then notified.

Drs. Furstenburger, Podpakh Paukstadt, Rosemberg and Messrs. Edward Evans & Son, Ld., were also victims.

Accused was sent to prison for a year.

FRACAS ON THE ROOFS

Alleged Armed Robber Says He Went There to Sleep

As a sequel to the case of the alleged armed robber who fled over the housetops, he was charged on Monday morning in the Mixed Court with house breaking and attempted violence.

Inspector Mackenzie stated that information to the effect that an armed robber had been seen on the roof tops in an alleyway was received and when the police attempted to arrest prisoner the latter threw tiles at them. Finally he was shot down by Det.-Sergt. Malone. Since his arrest Chinese doctors had been reluctant to give any opinion as to the state of his mind.

The accused stated that he was a soldier in Nanking in the 1st Division under Commander Yui. He left the army to go to Canton as a soldier but the Cantonese who recruited him had not gone there yet. "Sometimes I get confused and fall down unconscious," he said.

The Magistrate—Why did you not come down when called?

Accused—I shouted to them that I would come down, but they did not hear me. I asked the inmates of the house to let me sleep on the drying stage, but they refused, I had no money except $1 which a friend gave one to buy my ticket home but the money was not enough. When I saw so many people trying to arrest me I became confused. I threw tiles at them because I was neither a robber or a thief.

The accused was sentenced to three months' imprisonment and to be expelled from the Settlement.

JUDGMENT was given against Capt. Carmichael at H. M. Supreme Court last Friday in the claim brought against him by the Inshallah Dairy & Stock Co. for $10.56, for eggs delivered. The case was adjourned from Thursday, when the Captain strongly denied receiving the eggs, for plaintiffs to prove delivery. After hearing the evidence of one of the firm's clerks last Friday, Judge Grain held that the claim had been proved as far as possible and gave judgment accordinaly.

FUTILE SENTENCES FOR SMUGGLERS

Japanese Court's 29 Days for Gun-runner: Sharp Comment by Chinese Press

There appears to have been some misunderstanding on the part of the Chinese press in announcing that in future the Japanese authorities intended to apply the Criminal Code in the punishment of arms smugglers, supplanting the civil law which admitted a maximum term of 29 days' imprisonment only.

K. Odagari and Y. Shimada appeared before the Court on Wednesday charged with having been concerned together in keeping 20 automatic pistols and 2,000 rounds of ammunition for the purpose of sale, at No. 3 Baikal Road, and the sentence passed upon them was 29 days' imprisonment.

The presiding Magistrate informed the prosecution that in passing sentence he was governed by the local regulations, under which 29 days was the maximum in view of the fact that the arms were not imported from Japan. The Japanese Criminal Code, he continued, provides for a fine up to Y.2,000 and a term of imprisonment not exceeding two years, but this provision was applicable only in cases where the prosecution conclusively proved that the arms and ammunition offered for sale were imported from Japan proper or from the Japanese Empire.

Commenting on this sentence, the "Eastern Times" says the Japanese Consul has apparently forgotten the declaration he recently made that smugglers of arms would be most severely dealt with in the Japanese court. Does he consider 29 days a severe punishment, asks the paper, concluding with the remarks: "Deeds and not words are wanted. We cannot help expressing our regret at the action of the Consul."

FINES were imposed for traffic offences at the U.S. Commissioner's Court on Saturday. A. B. Hennigson appeared on a summons granted on the complaint of V. J. Holland for passing his motor-car in Bubbling Well Road near the Carlton Café, and reckless driving. The complaining witness stated that he drove his car at a speed of 18 miles per hour past the island. As he approached it defendant's car shot by and crossing in front of witness's car went south of the island. This manœuvre forced witness to throw on his brakes and consequently pedestrians in the vicinity were endangered. Mr. Lurton fined the defendant G. $10. For parking his car in an unauthorized spot in Nanking Road, J. S. Potter was fined G. $2 and J. T. Dolan handed the clerk the same amount for a similar offence. A fourth defendant, W. D. Harris, was fined $3 on a summons charging him with failing to obey traffic signals at Nanking-Kiangse Road corner at 7.25 p.m. on July 16.

MUSTERING last Friday night for what was expected to be a big arms raid to be carried out in conjunction with the Settlement police, the River Police under Supt. Woodfield instead ran across a party of opium smugglers trying to land 20 lb. of the drug. Five were arrested and afterwards handed over to the City authorities for trial. The search party were patrolling the Hongkew wharves when they noticed a small boat make for the N.Y.K. Wharf, and one man land with two bags under his arms. Shouting to him to halt, the police pursued him. He turned towards the river, however, and after throwing in his opium, jumped in also. A motor-car on shore, waiting for the consignment, was signalled to and made off at once. In a few minutes the police launch overtook the man in the water and hauled him aboard. The occupants of the launch were surprised to find the man absolutely naked. After dragging for some time one package of opium was recovered from the Huangpu. The swimmer is said to be a son of a boatman of Hongkew Creek, while another belonging to the party of four who were subsequently arrested, is also believed to be a relative of this worthy. Failure to find the rest of the drug that was hastily committed to the Huangpu is attributed to the activities of this boatman, who engages in dragging operations on such occasions.

MUNICIPAL GAZETTE NEWS

Consular Body.

A letter from Mr. F. Thiel, Consul-General for Germany, informs the Council that during his temporary absence from Shanghai, Consul Schulze will be in charge of the Consulate-General.

Shanghai Custom House.

A letter from Mr. L. A. Lyall, Commissioner of Customs, notifies the Council that acting on instructions from the Inspector-General he has handed over charge of the Custom House to Mr. H. Kishimoto, Deputy Commissioner of Customs in charge temporarily.

General.

Public Ricshas—Restriction of Numbers.—Following the discussion which took place at the Conference on Friday last with representatives of the Ricsha Companies, and after careful consideration of the views then expressed, members unanimously recommend that limitation in the number of licences issued be again imposed. It is suggested that the limit be 10,000, with a view later, if necessary, of a further reduction to bring the number of licences issued to that allowed when limitation was formerly in force, viz: 8,000; reduction to be affected by withdrawal of all licences for vehicles which do not meet the Council's requirements.

The Acting Commissioner of Police states that the Police are already removing from the streets ricshas which do not conform to the standard laid down, and that their licences are being cancelled. It is also directed that the report of the Conference above referred to be circulated to members of Council for their information.

Houses of Public Entertainment —Closing Hour.—With reference to previous minutes, and as a result of the informal discussion with members of the French Council on Friday last, it is decided to recommend that the revised regulations submitted by the French Council extending the closing hour to 2 a.m., be adopted. A copy of the regulations will be circulated to members of Council, and when replying to the French Council it is considered that particular emphasis should be laid upon its proposal that such revised regulations be strictly enforced by the means suggested, viz., the issue of a warning in respect of the first breach of the regulations, and that, for the second offence, the licence be withdrawn.

Public Health Report for June.

Vital Statistics.

Both foreign and Chinese deathrates are below the average.

Communicable Diseases.

Smallpox.—No foreign cases occurred this month, and no Chinese deaths.

Influenza.—One foreign case, not fatal, and two fatal Chinese cases were reported.

Typhus Fever.—One case was notified among the foreign community. This was a female Russian subject, resident, who apparently contracted the disease in the French Settlement.

Relapsing Fever.—One foreign resident case was notified.

Enteric Fever.—One resident male Korean died of Typhoid Fever, and three other foreign cases were notified. One of these was a resident. Two of the notified cases had never been inoculated and no information was obtained in the third case.

Amoebic Dysentery.—Two foreign resident cases were notified, both of whom had been resident in Shanghai for many years, and may have contracted the infection at any time during that residence.

Bacillary Dysentery.—One foreign non-resident case was notified. This was a Dutch seaman.

Preventive Measures.

The occurrence during May and June of sporadic cases of Typhus and Relapsing Fevers among the foreign community coincides with a moderate prevalence of these, particularly of Relapsing Fever, among the poorer classes of Chinese. Both these diseases are conveyed by vermin, and their occurrence in houses free from vermin must be traced to importation of these probably from Chinese sources.

In anticipation of this possibility particular attention has been given to such possible sources as laundries, tailors' shops and the houses and lodging houses inhabited by ricsha coolies. A special cleansing and lime-washing squad was established some weeks ago to deal systematically with the insanitary hovels in the Eastern District where many of them live. Only several cases of Relapsing Fever have been found. Unfortunately it is impossible to deal effectively with the problem in this area as very many of them live in native villages on Chinese territory over which we have no jurisdiction. Besides this, a great deal of work has been done, and progress made, in bringing the laundries, tailors' shops and native lodging houses into line with sanitary requirements, particularly in the Western District. Vermin-proof cubicles have been installed, and the sleeping rooms have been separated from the sleeping quarters.

But the elimination of these, and of the great group of respiratory diseases, is primarily a sociological matter; and their prevalence is the inevitable consequence of the economic system, which allows a useful, hard-working member of society like the ricsha coolie to live under sub-human conditions, and on the verge of destitution, while the convicted criminal is well fed and cared for at the expense of the society he has injured.

Food, Dairies & Markets Division.

S. W. W. Water Supply.—The high standard of purification has been maintained throughout the month. Slight local contamination was detected in the Northern District, and was again traced to the entrance of subsoil during work on the mains. It was not of a dangerous character. The more serious contaminations reported earlier in the year were apparently also due to entrance of subsoil; and this indicates very considerable pollution of the soil in certain parts of the Settlement.

Ice Creams.—72 samples were examined, of which 38 were below standard, and 25 of these unfit for human consumption. The rather higher proportion of bad samples this month is due to the inclusion of a large number of small Chinese shops in the Northern District, and several "repeat" samples from offenders. Several samples from each of the more important foreign firms have now been examined, and with rare exceptions they have been of satisfactory quality. The following table shows the distribution of results this month:—

Satisfactory	Unsatisfactory	Total
Foreign 24 (68. %)	Foreign 11 (31 .%)	35
Chinese 10 (27 %)	Chinese 27 (73 .%)	37
Total 34 (47.2%)	Total 38 (52 .%)	72

Milk.—106 samples were taken for analysis, of which 3, (all found adulterated), were from unlicensed dairies. 5 of the 103 samples from licensed dairies were below standard. From two a large proportion of the fat had been abstracted, and the other three showed adulteration by adding water—in one sample to the amount of nearly 33 per cent. The dairies in the Western District have received special attention, and many improvements have been effected.

Fire Brigade Report for June.

The total number of calls received was 30, of which 26 were genuine fires—23 (including 1 chimney fire) occurring within the Settlement and 3 outside. The remaining 4 were false alarms.

The damage on assessed property within the Settlement was estimated at Tls. 6,700 (Chinese), whilst the property at risk was estimated at Tls. 381,850 (Foreign Tls. 316,000, Chinese Tls. 65,850).

Four lives were lost and six persons were injured.

ALLIED CONFERENCE IN LONDON BLOCKED OVER FINANCIAL ISSUE

The Security for a Loan to Germany: Bankers Uneasy as to Political Security If They Find the Money: Some Parties Anxious to have Germans Present

London, July 25.

The fundamental differences shown at the London Conference are emphasized by French comments transmitted by Reuter's Paris correspondent. These may be summed up in the remark of the "Journal" that the situation is stationary and is liable so to continue owing to the bankers departing from their province of finance and claiming to interfere in political questions.

The "Matin" and the "Ere Nouvelle" declare that M. Herriot cannot wait indefinitely in London till a formula is found, as French parliamentary and public opinion is uneasy and bewildered. They state that there are excellent French experts capable of carrying the discussions to a successful issue under the guidance of the Minister of Finance.

A correspondent of the Havas Agency says that the French delegation will take their stand on the suggested solution under which the Reparations Commission, strengthened by an American, will hold a preliminary conference with the committee of experts who framed the Dawes plan with a view to deciding eventual defaults by Germany.

The "Petit Parisien" declares that Mr. Ramsay MacDonald yesterday evening expressed a desire to invite Germany to send representatives to London.

Cautious but Confident.

Later.

The feeling in responsible quarters to-night as regards the Allied discussions may be described as one of cautious confidence. It is pointed out that every one concerned is determined to reach a settlement.

The Conference has already accomplished a great deal, having virtually finished all the technical work it was called upon to do.

Conversations regarding the attitude of the bankers proceeded throughout the day and will continue till the end of the week.

The statement in the Paris "Temps" to the effect that the British Foreign Office has unofficially instructed Lord D'Abernon to inform the German Government that it will certainly be invited to send plenipotentiaries to London, is refuted. It is declared here that such an invitation could only be made with the authority of the full Conference.

It is not anticipated that the back of the Conference will be broken before August 11.

Operation of Dawes Plan

The second committee of the Allied Conference has now drafted its report. The dates mentioned for the proposed operation of the Dawes plan are August 15 for the passage of German legislation to meet the Reparations Commission's demands in connexion with the Ruhr, and October 15, when it is hoped the Franco-Belgian economic evacuation of the Ruhr will be completed.

July 26.

Havas learns that the Allied Conference consulted the Anglo-French jurists on the subject of calling in German representatives. It was decided that it was necessary to summon them in order that they may give their opinion on certain measures connected with the application of the Dawes plan. The invitation will be officially transmitted to Berlin later when the labours of the Conference are advanced sufficiently to permit of the fixing of a date.

Later.

The jurists at the Allied Conference have completed their report regarding the terms of the invitation to Germany. The Conference will consider the report on Monday when it will decide the question of inviting Germany.

France for the Pact of Mutual Assistance

Paris, July 26.

According to the "Matin" a committee including the Chiefs of the General Staffs of the Army and the Navy have pronounced themselves in favour of the pact of mutual assistance, and France, therefore, will despatch a favourable answer to the League of Nations.

The newspapers announce that three prominent French bankers have been called to London to confer with their British and American colleagues.—Reuter.

France and Belgium Unwilling to Withdraw Troops from the Ruhr

Paris, July 27.

The "Petit Parisien" learns from London that Mr. MacDonald suggested that if M. Herriot and M. Théunis accepted the proposal to give up military occupation of the Ruhr immediately, the report of the first committee concerning defaults would be passed without difficulty. M. Herriot and M. Théunis refused the suggestion most energetically.

The Australian, Senator McIntosh, interviewed by "Le Matin," suggested that the French Government should call to Paris prominent politicians of the British Dominions in order to explain to them the vital necessities which compelled France to occupy the Ruhr.—Reuter.

German Representatives to Attend Conference: Reparations Commission Also

London, July 28.

A meeting of the British Empire Delegation to the Inter-Allied Conference was held to-day, following a conference of the heads of the Allied delegations in preparation for this afternoon's plenary session.

It is gathered that the position has not materially changed since Friday. There is no official cognizance that any solution of the question of the bankers' security has come within sight, while the position of railways in the occupied territory remains the same.

Later.

The plenary Conference sat for an hour and a half this afternoon. It is understood that it has been decided to refer the question of inviting the German representatives to the heads of the five Allied delegations.

There was a certain amount of disagreement over the report of the first committee on the question of German default. It has been decided to call a further meeting of the committee on Wednesday morning.

Later.

Reuter's Agency learns that the Germans will be invited to the Conference immediately an inter-Allied agreement has been reached, and that the Reparations Commission will be invited to participate in the deliberations in London.

Later.

A communiqué issued by the Conference confirms the earlier messages, and anticipates that the heads of the delegations will invite the German representatives on the 31st instant or August 1.

The communiqué emphasizes that the Conference does not intend to force anything on the German representatives. Documents will be prepared, and these will simply serve as a basis of discussion.

Sir Joseph Cook acted as the member for the British Empire delegation.

The Conference adopted an important report by M. Fromageot and Sir Cecil Hurst, the French and British jurists, on the procedure necessary for agreement with Germany, by which the Dawes plan may be put into operation without running counter to the Versailles Treaty, which at present does not provide for some of the proposed measures.

The communiqué states that the first committee is still at work. The report of the second committee as regards the fiscal and economic unity of Germany has been presented and accepted. The third committee expects to complete its report in a short time.—Reuter.

The Ruhr Evacuation.

London, July 29.

There is a new tone in the French press to-day in consequence of despatches from French correspondents in London stating that negotiations are about to begin with regard to the evacuation of the Ruhr and suggesting a likelihood of a satisfactory result if France is adequately compensated from an economic point of view.

The "Ere Nouvelle" says that by giving the world a striking proof of her loyalty by evacuating the Ruhr France will be entitled to ask the Allies to make a sacrifice as regards war-debts and guarantees of security.—Reuter.

France Desirous of Peace: But With Rights Assured

Paris, July 29

Parliament reassembled to-day. A telegram from M. Herriot was read to the Chamber and the Senate. The Premier defined the point reached at the London Conference and declared that, in spite of constant effort, several more days were necessary to bring the negotiations to a conclusion owing to numerous technical difficulties. He added that the French Government was firmly resolved to assure the rights of France and the re-establishment of the inter-Allied Entente and peace.

M. Herriot, in the course of a speech at a banquet given by the French colony in London, said that the Conference aimed at re-establishing peace, after the war which France did not desire. France wished for a peace favourable to the whole of mankind. The French Government had the right to state that a peace which would not grant her rights to France, would be an unjust peace. It was impossible to base order upon injustice.

The French Premier recalled the sufferings of his country and added: "We are now trying to conciliate what we owe to peace and what in due to France."

The Left newspapers, "L'Oeuvre" and "L'Ere Nouvelle," insist that, in exchange for the military evacuation of the Ruhr, France shall get compensation with regard to debts and security.—Reuter.

London, July 29.

Reuter's Agency learns that a new French formula was submitted to the Conference to-day, which proposes recourse to arbitration when the Reparations Commission fails to agree on the question of German defult, one of three arbitrators to be an American.

Dominions' Representation at Empire Conferences

In the House of Commons to-day, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Mr. J. H. Thomas, announced that he had convened a Dominions conference for October to explore the question of Dominions representation in foreign policy and Imperial affairs.

Later.

There was a full dress discussion in the House of Commons to-day on Dominions representation at conferences, raised by Mr. L. S. Amery (Conservative), who, seeking a solution, mentioned Mr. S. M. Bruce's suggestion to substitute an inter-Dominion secretariat for the present secretariat. Mr. Lloyd George supported Mr. Amery.

Mr. J. H. Thomas, Secretary of State for the Colonies, replying, quoted a telegram, sent to the Dominions on June 23, expressing the Government's concern with regard to the existing system of inter-Imperial consultation on matters of foreign policy and of general Imperial interest, such as the decisions of the late Imperial Conference, and expressing a desire to explore the whole situation, with a view to finding a solution. The telegram welcomed suggestions.

Mr. Thomas hoped that the conference would be held in October. All replies were not yet in, but evidence tended to show that it would be welcome.—Reuter.

Mixed Opinions in Paris Regarding Arbitration: Full Solution and a Rank Failure

Paris, July 30.

The new French formula, which proposes recourse to arbitration when the Reparations Commission fails to agree on the question of German default, has evoked varying comment. It is approved by the "Matin" and "L'Oeuvre," as likely to solve all the questions before the Conference, but is denounced by the "Journal," which declares that the Conference is drifting towards wreck, and by the "Echo de Paris," which predicts rejection of the formula by Anglo-Saxon finance.

Later.

The Reparations Commission, after lengthy deliberations, to-day decided to go to London.—Reuter.

Scheme for Evacuation.

London, July 30.

Havas Agency states that the French arbitration proposal in the event of Germany's default in the payment of reparations, as finally drafted, would operate in the case of either disagreement in the Reparations Commission on German default or the failure of German industrialists to carry out contracts for deliveries in kind. Appeals would be allowed from decisions of the Reparations Commission and the Transfer Committee regarding the stoppage of deliveries in kind.

Furthermore, the British, French and Italian military and engineering experts and diplomatists have drafted a scheme for the military evacuation of the Ruhr proportionately as Germany pays her debts.

In the House of Commons, to-day, replying to Mr. E. D. Morel (Labour), Mr. Philip Snowden, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, said that Germany had paid up to May 30 £458,000,000. This included reparations and the costs of the Armies of Occupation, excluding the Ruhr.—Reuter.

Germany Wants Her Guns.

Berlin, July 30.

The Government have informed the Secretariat of the League of Nations of their disagreement with the mutual guarantee pact as being ill-fitted to assure universal security and limitation of armaments. They point out that a totally disarmed Germany would be in an impossible position. The Government submit the alternative suggestion that, instead of piling up treaties and agreements subsidiary to the Covenant, the latter itself should be more thoroughly developed, that violent settlement of disputes should be prohibited, that an arbitration court for political disputes should be instituted and, especially, that disarmament should be compulsory for all State. They add that Germany would then be ready to enter the society of nations and co-operate in the preservation of peace.—Reuter.

NAVAL REVIEW AT SPITHEAD

First Display of Kind Since 1914: Fewer Big Ships But Many of New Type

London, July 26.

The delegates at the Allied Conference in London to-day went to the Spithead Naval review, the first Fleet concentration since the Armistice. There were 193 ships as compared with 205 at the King's review in 1914, but the difference in composition was remarkable. There were 10 battleships, one battle-cruiser and nine cruisers to-day as compared with 55 battleships, four battle-cruisers and 55 cruisers.

On the other hand there were 88 destroyers as compared with 56, and there were also several new classes of ships, including 37 mine-sweepers and two aircraft-carriers of which there were none in 1914 and also numerous submarine minelayers and seaplanes. This is the first post-war mobilization of the reserve fleet for ten days' service at sea. The Atlantic Fleet joined it for the review.

A picturesque part of the review was the acrobatics of naval aeroplanes of various types, three of which escorted the Royal Yacht when it left Portsmouth conveying the King and the Prince of Wales. The yacht was preceded and followed by Trinity and Admiralty yachts and guest ships with the Duke of Connaught, Admiralty officials, the Allied Conference delegates, Cabinet Ministers and Members of Parliament. She steamed through five miles of warships gaily dressed and with the crews cheering and the guns firing salutes. Thousands lined the shore.—Reuter.

OFFICIAL NARRATIVE OF JUTLAND

The Confusion Caused by Contradictory Reports

London, July 26.

The official "narrative" of the Battle of Jutland has been published. It is based on the despatches of the Admirals and the reports of individual ships and on personal narratives. It includes [illegible] appendix remarks by Admiral of the Fleet Viscount Jellicoe, in accordance with the latter's wish where the appendix differs from the Admiralty narrative. Their Lordships are satisfied that the narrative is more in accordance with the evidence. Viscount Jellicoe contends that the Admiralty text is unjust to Admiral Sir Hugh Evan-Thomas on two occasions and says that the narrative fails to convey a true idea of the confusion caused by contradictory reports, the effect of which was felt throughout the action.—Reuter.

HOUSING BILL THROUGH THE COMMONS

Will the Lords Throw It Out? Country Not Ready Yet for Socialism

London, July 25.

Amid Labour cheers the House of Commons to-day passed the third reading of the Government's Housing Bill. A Conservative motion of rejection was defeated by 226 votes to 131. The Bill then was read for the first time in the House of Lords.

Mr. John Wheatley, the Minister of Health, admitted that the Bill was not socialism. He was sorry that he was not in a position to introduce a Socialist measure as the country was not ready for Socialism (Loud Opposition cheers).—Reuter.

NAVAL DISARMAMENT AGREEMENT

Protest Regarding Alteration of Elevation of Guns on Capital Ships

London, July 30.

In the House of Commons to-day at question time, Commander C. Bellairs (Conservative) asked whether representations had been made to signatories of the Washington Convention that an alteration in the elevation of guns on capital ships or expenditure for the purpose of increasing the radius of action would, in the opinion of the British Government, be a breach of the Convention.

Mr. Arthur Ponsonby, Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, answered in the affirmative and added that the Powers concerned were the United States and Japan.—Reuter.

Washington, July 30.

The British representations against the modernization programme of the American navy might bring to a head the controversy which has been stirring naval circles since the Disarmament Conference. Officials in touch with the question are of the opinion that neither the French nor the Japanese Governments share the British point of view, though Italy might. If the matter therefore ever came before the signatory powers for a decision, Great Britain would probably be outvoted.—Reuter's American Service.

AUSTRALIA'S NAVAL DEFENCE

Equipment Bill Passed for Construction of Cruisers

Melbourne, July 30.

The House of Representatives to-day passed the Defence Equipment Bill providing for the construction of two 10,000-ton cruisers. A Labour amendment favouring construction of both, instead of one of the cruisers locally was defeated by 29 votes to 22, Mr. S. M. Bruce, the Prime Minister, explained that the Government desired to accept the offer to build the first cruiser in England.—Reuter.

THE IRISH BOUNDARY

Proposed Commission Illegal: Political Problem of First Magnitude

London, July 31.

On the eve of the recess the Government is suddenly confronted with a political problem of the first magnitude arising from the reported decision of the Privy Council that the Boundary Commissioner cannot legally be constituted without a representative of Ulster appointed by the North Ireland Government. The opinion is expressed in Parliamentary circles that fresh legislation must be introduced to deal with the question for a solution of which Mr. Cosgrave is pressing. As it is impossible to pass such a Bill before the recess unless unanimity is previously secured, the Cabinet has decided to call a round-table conference of the Party leaders and the British signatories to the Irish Treaty.—Reuter.

LABOUR'S REMEDY FOR UNEMPLOYMENT

A Slow Cure Involving Heavy Public Expenditure and Increased Production

London, July 30.

At the instance of the Liberals, the Government's unemployment policy was reviewed in the House of Commons to-day by the Chancellor of the Echequer, Mr. Philip Snowden, who at the outset drew ironical cheers and laughter by remarking that the Government had a positive remedy for unemployment, but the more positive the remedy the slower the cure.

The Chancellor foreshadowed proposals, which, though involving heavy public expenditure, he hoped would add to the productive capacity of the country notably construction of new roads and the development of electricity. He emphasized the importance of foreign trade and hoped that the Inter-Allied Conference would result in such an agreement as would give the people of Europe confidence to settle down to work and re-open Continental markets, but Britain was bound to face intensified competition in the world's trade in future and therefore she must do everything possible to cheapen and improve production.

Mr. Snowden stated that the Government was bringing pressure to bear on railway companies to recondition and re-equip their lines and to adopt electrification. The Government had decided to revive the Severn barrage scheme, which, if undertaken, would be the most difficult engineering feat in history.

The Government had accepted in principle Exchequer assistance for the sugar-beet industry for a period of 10 Years, which, he was assured, would enable six new factories to be started almost immediately. He believed that this was one of the biggest things that could be done for British agriculture, which it would revive.

Mr. Lloyd George and Dr. Macnamara twitted the Government on adopting schemes at which they has previously sneered. Sir Laming Worthington-Evans criticized the schemes on the ground that they would not find work for the men this winter. He moved reduction of the Minister's salary, but the motion was rejected by 254 votes to 204.—Reuter.

MANILA, July 26.—Chief Justice Manuel Araullo died here to-day.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE INSURRECTION IN BRAZIL

Mutineers' Position Stronger Than First Admitted

Buenos Aires, July 25.

The impression is daily gaining strength that the capture of Sao Paulo may be far off owing to the strength of the rebels' main defences, which are said to have been constructed under the direction of former Italian and German officers. They are described as very formidable and requiring very heavy artillery to shatter them. Fighting has resolved itself into trench warfare. The Federal troops' advances are small.

July 26.

The evacuation of Sao Paulo of non-combatants, which was ordered by the besieging Federal troops, is being delayed owing to paucity of transport facilities. Meanwhile, it is declared that the Federals are steadily advancing on positions around the city, but it transpires that the rebels still hold the town of Campinas, 50 miles to the north of Sao Paulo, the Federal encirclement of which has not yet been completed. Federal aeroplanes have bombarded rebel positions.

The newspaper "La Prensa" learns that the forts in the harbour of Rio de Janeiro, one of which participated in the mutiny of 1922, have been disarmed as a precautionary measure.—Reuter's American Service.

More Contradictory Reports: Martial Law Proclaimed in Five States

Rio de Janeiro, July 27.

Official communiqués state that with the exception of Sao Paulo the whole country is calm and supporting the Government. On the contrary, Reuter's correspondent in Buenos Aires transmits what are described as authentic reports, to the effect that the Government has proclaimed martial law in the States of Rio Grande, Matto Grosso, Santa Catharina, Sergipe and Basia, owing to unrest there.

The situation is such that the Federal Government fears to withdraw troops from these places in order to assist in the siege of Sao Paulo.—Reuter's American Service.

Report of Government Victory Now Confirmed: Sao Paulo Evacuated by Rebels

New York, July 28.

Washington, July 28.

The Brazilian Embassy announces that the revolutionaries have withdrawn from Sao Paulo, which is occupied by Federal troops.

The Admiral commanding the British naval forces reports that all Americans were safe when the Brazilian Government troops occupied Sao Paulo, though considerable damage was done to property by shell fire.

London, July 28.

In the House of Lords to-day Lord Parmoor, Lord President of the Council, stated that foreign representatives to Brazil had jointly addressed the President regarding the care of foreigners leaving Sao Paulo and the responsibility of the Brazilian Government for their lives and property. He said that H.M.S. Curlew was proceeding to Sao Paulo from Trinidad.—Reuter.

Rio de Janeiro, July 28.

A communique confirming the rebel evacuation of Sao Paulo says that the Federals have begun an energetic pursuit and have already occupied a majority of the points to which the rebels are retreating.—Reuter's American Service.

Rebels Thoroughly Demoralized Expelled from Sao Paulo and Seeking Shelter

Buenos Aires, July 29.

The Federal troops' final assault against Sao Paulo demoralized the rebels. The rebel leaders, including General Lopez, escaped, though many prisoners were taken.

The Federals opened operations with heavy artillery against the rebel strongholds, the Central Railway and Luz station, following up with whippet tanks and then infantry. The rebels fled on trains to the north-west and west with the Federals in close pursuit.—Reuter's American Service.

BUILDING LOCK-OUT

London, July 26.

The Pageant of Empire, in which 15,000 performers are portraying episodes of British history, opened at the Stadium at Wembley yesterday evening. Rain somewhat marred the first performance, but nevertheless the wonderful spectacle was carried out most enthusiastically and received an ovation from a crowd of 20,000 persons, including the Prime Minister and members of the Cabinet.

The Pageant will continue daily for six weeks.—Reuter.

UNSEASONABLE SNOW IN ENGLAND

Empire Pageant Postponed: Royal Inspection of Boy Scouts

London, July 28.

A drenching rain intermingled with an unseasonable snowfall was responsible for the cancellation of to-day's performance of the Empire Pageant. It also slightly interfered with the Royal inspection of 5000 boy scouts from all parts of the Empire who are attending the Jamboree.

In spite of the downpour the boys marched whistling to Buckingham Palace. The inspection was held in the ring which is in front of the quadrangle. Each detachment was grouped under its own flag which was dipped in salute to the King, who shook hands with the masters and delivered a homily to the boys on the soundness of Scout precepts.

The King made a point of stopping, greeting and talking to a party of Japanese boy scouts who attended as visitors.—Reuter.

THE RECENT OUTRAGE IN PERSIA

Collective Note by Diplomatic Body: Anti-British Agitator Deported

Allahabad, July 26.

According to a despatch from Teheran, the Persian reply to the collective note of the Diplomatic Corps is non-committal. It excuses the police for not opening fire on the ground that it would have further infuriated the mob.

Accusations made imputing the crime to British intrigue have led the Premier to issue a warning directed against such rumour-mongers. Hundreds of arrests have been made, including a priest Khaless-I-Zadeh, a notorious anti-British agitator, who is being deported.—Reuter.

U. S. Government's Demand for the Better Protection of American Residents

Washington, July 28.

The American Minister to Persia, Mr. Kornfeld, to-day delivered a Note to the Foreign Office in Teheran voicing concern for the safety of Americans in Persia and the need for better protection against further indignities.

Whilst officials will not discuss the communication sent by Mr. Kornfeld, it is admitted that the killing of the American Consul, Mr. Imbrie, and the unprovoked attack on his widow indicate the need for increased safeguards for Americans.

Mr. Kornfeld's Note indicates that the United States expects Persia to meet the expenses of sending an American man-of-war to bring home the body of Mr Imbrie, and also to furnish military guards at the American Legation as long as necessary.

The Note adds that the continuance of diplomatic and consular representation in Persia will be dependent upon what action the Persian Government will take to vindicate the principles of international law. The note emphasize the seriousness with which the United States Government view the present situation.—Reuter's American Service.

Persian Government's Willingness to Agree to U. S. Demands

Teheran, July 30.

It intimates that the Persian Government is completely willing to carry out the demands of the American note. It only regrets that Persia has no fleet, otherwise she would place a warship at the disposal of America for the conveyance home of Mr. Imbrie's remains.

The question of proper compensation for the widow is being considered.—Reuter.

POLITICAL FERMENT IN ITALY

Arbitrary Suppression of Newspapers by Prefects Causes Dissension

London, July 28.

Fresh ferment is brewing in Italy in consequence of the drastic enforcement of the regulation conferring on local prefects somewhat arbitrary powers to suppress newspapers. Many suppressions have been effected throughout the country on the charge of violating press decrees.

Hostile and even Fascist journals have been seized in Rome, Naples and other large centres. The police yesterday seized the whole Milan press except Signor Mussolini's personal organ, the "Popolo d'Italia," in connexion with the publication of references to the Matteotti case, but the Premier later revoked the prefects' decree.—Reuter.

EFFECTIVE RUBBER RESTRICTION

Native Growers the Chief Obstacle: A 10d. Price to Weed Them Out

London, July 25.

At the meeting of the Anglo-Dutch Plantations of Java to-day, Mr. Strutt, the Chairman, expressed the opinion that the main cause of the poor success of the restriction scheme was not so much the refusal of the Dutch grower to participate as the unrestricted native cultivation in the Dutch Indies, the competition of which was likely to become more formidable in view of the fact that Chinese were supplying the native producers with machinery.

He said that there was authoritative support for the view that at 10 pence a pound native production would be largely curtailed and that a certain body of opinion believed that a year or two of rubber at 10 pence a pound would be the best chance of salvation for the European grower. Mr. Strutt opposed the selling agency plan. He said that his hopes were fixed rather on new uses for rubber. He pointed out that in the United Kingdom the per capita consumption was only one-fifth of that of America and, therefore, there was still room for propaganda at home.—Reuter.

A CHARGE OF RUNNING GUNS TO RUSSIA

Fine of £100 Shown to Be Maximum Penalty

London, July 25.

Captain Cecil Attfield and his father were charged at the Mansion House to-day with attempted gun-running, between April 8 and July 2 last, from the Thames to Russia. Accused were remanded. Bail was refused.

Counsel for the Commissioners of Customs said that the charge was made under the Arms Export Prohibition Order of 1921. The articles concerned in this case were machine-gun parts and mountings. A further charge was probable.

Counsel for the defence refused bail and said that the penalty under the charge was only a £100 fine. Mr. Attfield, Sr., repudiated liability. He had been head master at a London school for 40 years. Captain Attfield voluntarily made a statement to Scotland Yard some time ago. He had heard nothing since and was amazed to see in the papers that a warrant for his arrest had been issued.—Reuter.

FLOODS IN SOUTHERN INDIA

Breakdown of Communications With Devastated Districts: Cochin Isolated

Madras, July 27.

Earlier reports in no way minimized the gravity of the devastating floods in Southern India, although particulars are still meagre owing to the breakdown of communications.

For example, the railway to Malabar has been cut off since the 17th instant. In the streets of Ernakulam water stands seven feet deep. Cochin is isolated, half the state being submerged. People are being rescued by boats from their homes in Calicut, where thousands of houses have collapsed.

The river Cauvery has risen over 24 ft. at Erode, and is also rising rapidly in the Mysore State, where it has overtopped the famous Krishnarajasagara dam.—Reuter.

U. S. SHIPPING BOARD ECONOMIES

Consolidation of Two North Atlantic Lines to French and Dutch Ports

Washington, July 2.

Consolidation of the Government operated cargo routes from North Atlantic to French ports north of Bordeaux, Antwerp and Rotterdam, as proposed by the Fleet Corporation, was approved to day by the Shipping Board.

The two operators in the trade, the Black Diamond Steamship Company and the Cosmopolitane Steaship Company, both of New York, will be reduced to one, with the elimination of the former, and the number of ships curtailed from 26 to 22.

The consolidation is a further step in the general plan of the Government to effect economies through mergers of such services within the Government's jurisdiction. The Shipping Board's policy of maintaining the existing tonnage in service has been one of the obstacles, it is said, to effecting the Fleet Corporation's consolidation plans. Seven operating companies recently were retained to handle the Government fleet out of Gulf ports.—Reuter's American Service.

FINGER PRINTS BY TELEGRAPH

Wonderful and Successful Evolution in Detection of Criminals

New York, July 3.

Police Commissioner Enright yesterday declared that the successful sending by wire of finger-prints from New York to Chicago last Tuesday afternoon constituted one of the greatest advances made in criminal detection in many years. He and officials of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company made known the details of the test whereby finger-prints of two men with records were conveyed by wire in a few minutes each.

Commissioner Enright and Third Deputy Commissioner Joseph A. Faurot, who was in charge of the New York end of the test in this city, elatedly pointed out that one of the greatest factors would be a saving of time which would help the police, in view of the reluctance of Magistrates to hold suspects more than 48 hours.—Reuter's American Service.

SATURDAY'S TELEGRAMS

PROGRESS OF ALLIED CONFERENCE

French Formula with Regard to Arbitration Adopted by First Committee

London, July 31.

Reuter's Agency learns that the First Committee of the Inter-Allied Conference has unanimously adopted the first part of the French formula as regards arbitration. The second part dealing with the plan for the military evacuation of the Ruhr proportionately as Germany pays her debts has not yet been considered. The British amendment was withdrawn. The British and French delegates congratulated each other.

One delegate told Reuter's representative that "the great difficulty of the Conference is now over."

If the report of the Third Committee on deliveries in kind and cash transfers is favourable, the Conference may be regarded as finished so far as the Allies are concerned and the invitation of the Germans may be regarded as imminent.

The views of the bankers, are of course, still awaited.

Later.

An official communiqué states that the Reparations Commission will henceforth officially sit in London to deal with all questions arising from the Dawes Report.

Another official communiqué announcing the agreement of the first Committee declares that the effectiveness of the agreement will depend on the successful conclusion of the work of the third committee, which is considering other parts of the French proposal. The communique adds that the prospects of the third committee reaching an agreement appear to be hopeful.

It should be noted that the third committee is not dealing with the question of the evacuation of the Ruhr, as mentioned earlier, which matter is outside the scope of the present conference, and will be discussed jointly with the German representatives.—Reuter.

WELCOME NEWS OF INDIA

Resolute Attitude of British Cabinet Towards Swaraj and the Agitator

London, July 31.

A clear statement of the Government's policy in India was made by Viscount Chelmsford, the First Lord of the Admiralty, in the House of Lords to-day. He read Mr. MacDonald's message to the "Hindu" in January last to the effect that no party in Great Britain will be cowed by threats, or force, or policies designed to bring the Government to a standstill, and if any Indian sections imagine otherwise, events will sadly disappoint them.

Lord Chelmsford said this was an embodiment of the present policy, and declared that full discretion would be left to the Government of India to enforce law. The British Government would support the Government of India in any action they felt it necessary to take to quell revolutionary movement.—Reuter.

THE AVIATION DISASTER IN N.-W. INDIA

Note:—A telegram from Simla, dated July 30, stated that two of the airmen, who were reported killed, had returned safely to the aerodrome.—Reuter.

THE IRISH BOUNDARY DISPUTE

Questions Involved That May Necessitate the Holding of a General Election

London, July 31.

In the House of Commons to-day, asked whether the Government had conferred this morning with the British signatories of the Irish Treaty on the subject of the boundary clause and whether a decision had been taken, the Prime Minister, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, replied that difficulty having arisen in connexion with the interpretation of Clause 12, he thought it advisable to seek the counsel of the leaders of the parties and the signatories of the Treaty. No decisions had been taken.

Asked whether the question would be adjourned till the autumn session and, if so, whether he was aware of the feeling throughout Ireland that the Government was not serious in pressing forward this case of the Irish Treaty, Mr. MacDonald replied that there was still a week before the House rose, and promised a statement to-morrow.

Reuter's Agency understands that the Government intends to adjourn next week-end until October and i is, therefore, impossible to pass a special Irish bill to meet the difficulty as suggested in some quarters.

Later.

A grave view is taken in political circles of Mr. MacDonald's announcement that no decision has been reached at to-day's conference on the Irish boundary question.

There is talk of the possibility of a general election in the event of the Conservatives in the House of Commons opposing and the House of Lords rejecting the Government bill to give effect to the treaty, following the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council that fresh legislation would be necessary to constitute the Boundary Commission.

Aug. 1.

Mr. J. H. Thomas announced in the House of Commons to-day, that Mr. Cosgrave, President of the Dail Eireann, and Sir James Craig, the Ulster Premier, had been invited to London. If they failed to agree as regards the appointment of the Boundary Commission the Government would introduce legislation forthwith to give effect to the undoubted intention of the Irish treaty and press for its passage regardless of the consequences to the Government.—Reuter.

NAVAL DISARMAMENT AGREEMENT

America's Modernization of Battleships and Elevation of Turret Guns

Washington, July 31

Secretary of the Navy Wilbur, referring to the statement made yesterday in the House of Commons by Mr. Arthur Ponsonby, Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to the effect that the alteration in the elevation of guns on capital ships or an expenditure for the purpose of increasing the radius of action would, in the opinion of the British Government, be a breach of the Washington Convention, to-day said that: "It is a good idea to have the question raised in order that it may be settled."

As far as is known the Government had not taken steps to reply to the British representations on the subject of modernization of old battleships, including the elevations of turret guns. In any case it is evident that no haste is necessary, as the Navy at present lacks both authority and appropriations to increase the elevations, and the proposal, therefore, cannot be again submitted to Congress until its regular session in December.—Reuter's American Service.

OUR SCOTTISH LETTERS

No Real Enthusiasn for Home Rule: Sensational New Story of R. L. Stevenson's Death

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Edinburgh, June 18.

I understand that some of the Scottish members who, following the debate on Mr. Buchanan's Scottish Home Rule Bill, have been pressing the Prime Minister to give facilities for its passage, now agree that it would be useless to try to work out any scheme of devolution without first reconsidering the financial relations between the two countries.

Within recent times there has been much criticism of the Goschen percentage, mainly on the ground that it is out of date, but in reality because the arrangement of financial business in the House usually means that when the large English estimate is taken first and approved the position of Scotland is more or less finally settled in advance of the debate on the purely Scottish Estimates. In other words, Scotland can only get eleven-eightieths of what the House of Commons has already approved in another connexion, and some Scottish members urge that for that reason the debate in their case becomes unreal, and even valueless.

Apart from this financial difficulty, it may be said that even advanced Scottish members have been driven to admit that it is well nigh impossible to work up any true enthusiasm for Scottish Home Rule. They themselves are mostly quite content to get as much as they can for Scotland at Westminster, and during the past few months they cannot reasonably complain of the success they have achieved.

The Lady of the Links

The outstanding feature of the Scottish Ladies' Championship at Turnberry, on the Ayrshire coast (writes one who was there) was the happy, unfailing sportsmanship of every competitor. They openly acknowledged appreciation of each other's play—not in an affected way, but in a manner which left no room for doubt as to its sincerity. The spirit of camaraderie was omnipresent. The competition was healthily keen, even if the golf frequently left much to be desired. Not long ago I had a round with a man whose proficiency in profanity greatly exceeded his ability at the game. Suddenly he remarked, "I wonder what lady golfers say to relieve their feelings at this infornal game?" I was unable to enlighten him but I took particular observation this week. Perhaps I was disappointed, but, anyway, I heard nothing stronger directed at the ball than: "Oh, you little pig!" Most players, however, had one or more distinguishing characteristics. Some bit their lips or shook their heads forlornly when a difficult shot presented itself, while others had a trick of running after the ball as soon as they struck it. At least two young ladies had a habit of curling one leg behind the other after putting, and then waving their putters in the air as if to add momentum to the ball.

I have come to the conclusion that girls are generous opponents in the game. Long putts were freely conceded, and there were no disputes as to who should play first. An interesting point in the psychology of the game strikes me as the result of impressions I gathered. The large majority of the players chatted animatedly between strokes, and walked through their games discussing a hundred and one different things as if golf were the easiest thing in the world. A few, though, stroke along as if the bitterest of foes. There was nothing of the "weaker sex" stuff about the competitors. They played their two rounds a day without turning a hair, and I half-expected to see some emulating the vogue of evening-dress golf after dinner established by certain sporty amateurs at St. Andrews a fortnight ago, but bridge and gossip in the hotel lounge until a moderately late hour filled in the evenings.

To one accustomed to professional golf tournaments and male championships, the Ladies' Championship comes as a delightful revelation. Here we have the Royal and Ancient assuming charming touches, with many picturesque incidents to atone for any disparity in skill, Think how essentially feminine it is to hear one player asking another to share a bar of chocolate! Not that the lady golfers are content to chew their way through the game. Far from it. They munch and smoke alternately, and one lady almost rivalled Dr. MacCormack, the Irish amateur champion, in selection of length of cigarette-holder. The current opinion was that she had been advised to keep away from cigarettes; but she could attribute her defeat, not to the incessant weed, but to a peculiar liking for bunkers and hankering after the rough.

A Japanese Motorship.

Messrs Lithgows (Limited), Port-Glasgow, launched the twin-screw motor cargo ship Atago Maru, which they have built for the Nippon Yusen Kaisha of Tokyo. The vessel, which is 440 feet in length, 57 feet in breadth, 38 feet 6 inches in depth, of about 7,500 tons gross and over 10,000 tons deadweight, will be propelled by single-acting, two-cycle Diesel engines of an aggregate of 4,000 b.h.p. at 100 r.p.m., and designed to give a speed of 12½ knots. The engines, which will be supplied by Messrs. Sulzer Brothers, of Winterthur, Switzerland, will be installed by Messrs David Rowan and Co., Glasgow. Electric auxiliaries are fitted throughout, including winch, windlass, steering gear, refrigerating plant, vapour heaters, and electric cooking appliances. The vessel, which was named by Mrs. Shimidzu, wife of the London manager of the owners' company, is being built under the superintendence of Messrs A. R. Brown, M'Farlane & Co., the Glasgow agents of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha.

Largest and Pastest Motor Liner.

From the yard of the Fairfield Shipbuilding & Engineering Co., Govan, a notable launch took place when the motor ship Aorangi was put into the water. Built to the order of the Union Steamship Co. of New Zealand, the vessel is the largest and will be the speediest motor ship afloat, and she is the pioneer craft of this type for use as a mail and passenger carrier. Her displacement is 23,000 tons, and she is 600 feet in length by 72 feet beam, and 46 feet 6 in. depth to the lowest weather deck, with four decks below and two decks above. She will be fitted with two masts and two funnels. Accommodation has been arranged for about 440 first-class, 300 second-class, and 230 third-class passengers, and her complement will consist of 330 officers and crew, despite the fact that practically all firemen and trimmers are dispensed with. Fitted as a first-class liner in most up-to-date fashion, the vessel will be the largest unit of the owning Company's extensive fleet. Trading between Australasia and Vancouver, she will be an important accession to the vessels on the All Red Route. The Aorangi's engines will consist of four sets of Fairfield-Sulzer six-cylinder motors, with an aggregate of 13,000 brake horse-power. The engines will act on four screws, and the vessel is designed for a service speed of 18 knots.

When Tea Came To Scotland.

When tea-drinking was first introduced into Scotland and took the place of ale and claret it was energetically denounced. Even as late as in 1793 the Scots minister Currie uttered a solemn and prophetic warning. "The introduction of these baneful articles of tea and whisky will soon produce the corruption of morals and debility of constitution which are so severely felt in every parish, and will soon materially impair the real strength and population of Scotland." Lord President Forbes, his brother "bumper" John, and other famous supporters of claret were vigoro in their denunciations. They were the "most plentiful drinkers in the North," and in the Culloden Papers Forbes utters his detestation of the "vile drug." Mackintosh of Borlum, another of the passing generation of robust topers, makes the following lament in 1729:—"When I came to my friend's house of a morning I used to be asked if I had my morning draught yet. I am now asked if I have had my tea." The new drink was a rival to the native products. Ale had been at one time brewed in every farmhouse, and sold to the peasantry. Two things had checked the national enthusiasm for ale, the introduction of the malt tax and the use of whisky. Tea was disliked as a rival to home-brewing, as an innovation, as an extravagance "to the hurt of private families, by loss of their time, increase of their expense, and negligence of a diet more suitable to their health and station." Doctors held the new habit responsible for headaches and gout; ministers considered it more demoralizing than intoxication; and yet the fascination of tea-smuggling attracted the most respectable of the people. This smuggling was soon dignified by the name of "fair-trading." In the more secret bays and lochs of Scotland from France and Spain luggers were met by respectable gentlemen, some of the Justices of the Peace, whose pride was in the baffling of the Exciseman. A large bonfire by night, or a sheet laid out to dry on a haystack by day, were the signals that the "cadger" was at work, and the secret having been passed round, the precious cargo was silently discharged.

R. L. S.

A sensational account of R. L. Stevenson's death in Samoa 30 years ago appears in the most casual way in a preface to "The Island Princess," a series of South Sea sketches by A. Safroni-Middleton, published this week by Jarrolds. Mr. Safroni-Middleton as a lad appears to have deserted a ship at Samoa in order to join ex-King Mataafa's "rebel army." For a while he dwelt in the hills with kindred spirits—derelict Etonians and sailors, and long-missing Yankees, for Mataafa's adventure attracted a strange variety of races and ranks. Stevenson, he now tells us, was with the rebels, and actually died as a war casualty.

"Where is the shame in recording to-day," says Mr. Safroni-Middleton, "that within three miles of where he now sleeps in his ocean-surrounded tomb on Vae's Peak, Robert Louis Stevenson and the present writer fought with Mataafa's old chiefs, fighting in the moonlit valley in an attempt to repel a redoubtable enemy? Truth is indeed stranger than fiction; and inexplicable the long-guarded silence over R. L. Stevenson's chivalrous part in ex-King Mataafa's cause. For more than rumours said that the direct cause of the homorrhage which brought about R. L. S.'s lamented at Vailima was the blow of a club on his chest, received during a surprise onslaught whilst attending a secret council with the rebels in the hills near Vaisigano River; a fact well known to the Samoan chiefs who so deeply lamented the departure of an intrepid comrade."

A remarkable rumour, certainly; personally I don't believe one word of it.

Far Scots Only.

Scotland is small and looks poor, writes Mr. Owen Jones, of Nebraska, after a tour, and the wonder is how such a country has managed to make such a splash in the world.

A fishy bit of news in a contemporary—"Return of haddocks exported last month from Abardeen." —The homing instinct of haddocks is wonderful. But it does not explain the mystery why, having got away from Aberdeen, they should desire to return to it.

Probably the unkindest thing over said about the Gaelic language camin all innocence from a young Helensburgh lady who was in the Highlands recently. "When I was in the village shop," she said, "a native came to the counter, said nothing at all, but cleared his throat, and the shopkeeper handed him a pound of tea."

German Fleet In Scapa Flow: Romance Under the Water

June 25.

Many years ago Mr. Jules Verne delighted readers of romantic adventure by a new kind of story. It was a revelation of a world, the world beneath the sea. The strangeness and romance of Captain Nemo as in many other instances of a prophetic kind of fiction, have been more than realized during recent months at Scapa Flow. There under the deep but by no means placid waters, repose the German Fleet sunk on June 21, 1919. British merchant vessels, sunk at an earlier date, blocked up the sounds leading to the anchorage. Within recent weeks the submerged Scapa Flow Fleet has been the object of titanic salvage efforts, and has been the means of directing attention once more to one of the most remarkable tragedies of the sea which exists in history. The difficulties which have to deal with ponderous sunken warships are inevitably great. In the present case these have been added to by unforeseen circumstances. The divers have had to operate in surroundings which surpass in picturesqueness and strangeness any conceptions of the imaginative sea romancer. The great vessels have almost been concealed by a growth of gigantic seaweed. The divers have had to cut their way through the tangle, after the manner of explorers cutting a path through the exuberant growth of a tropical forest. These monstrous tangles, or "sea ware," wave about in the clear water, with thick stalks and trailing leaves 15 feet long and between 15 and 20 inches broad. The divers, using long, double-edged knives, hack their way through this formidable growth. If the diver's task is made more difficult by the seaweed, it is lightened by the limpid clearness of the water. The northern waters are much clearer than those of the south; and often the Orcadian summer seas are only less blue than the skies above them.

Operations have been going on during the past four years which have for their object the clearing away of the blockages protecting the approaches of Scapa Flow. First the hurdles were raised. These were sunk to block Hoy Sound, which was a sure opening for the enemy from the Atlantic Ocean. Those hurdles were a great danger to navigation, and took over one year to clear away, owing to the strong tides and rough Orkney weather. They were made of railway lines, which formed a kind of lattice work, about 70 feet square at the bottom, tapering to a point at the top, and placed right in the tideway. The hurdles were raised by two ships, with very strong tackling gear. Divers went down and hooked on the tackles, and the ships brought them out of the tideway into the shore, near Stromness. There they were dismantled. Then there came the raising of vessels sunk in Holm Sound to protect the anchorage—the Numidian, the Aorangi, and the Thames, the mast of the fourth merely jutting above water.

The great floating dock, divers, and driving gear assembled to raise the German ships are now at Scapa Flow carrying out preliminary work. The German floating dock, which is to be used to raise the German destroyers, has created great interest among the islanders. It was originally 412 feet long by 112 feet beam. On the deck of this are built various workshops, power houses, and store rooms. The whole concern is to be cut into two parts to facilitate the lifting of the war vessels.

Sunday School Convention.

Glasgow has been the scene of not a few great religious conventions of an international character, but few of them have equalled in importance that of the World's Sunday School Convention. It is the largest that has been held since the origin of the international movement 35 years ago. To read that there are 4,000 delegates present from 40 different countries does not convey much idea of the diverse gathering which one purpose has summoned. Needless to say there are a number of representatives from the East and Far East. One of the most interesting incidents on the opening day was when Mr. Kiyoshi Koidzumi, iron merchant, Japan, a dapper, smiling little figure, approached the chairman's table. He laid down a large box of white wood bound with a scarlet cord, opened the box with a clatter and took out two scrolls. "The English," he said, "will be read perhaps by someone whom chairman will appoint. Better I will read my Japanese," which he did forthwith. Thereupon he replaced the scrolls, tied the scarlet thread about the white box, replaced it on the table, and, bowing to the four winds, retired.

The policy followed in developing the Sunday school movement throughout the world is directed to the investment at the earliest opportunity of the indigenous workers with the responsibility of full control of the service among their compatriots. This policy had its manifestation in the number of native leaders, who supplied glimpses of particular fields. A Jap spoke for Japan, a Korean for Korea, an Egyptian for Egypt. It is a matter worthy of passing notice that these educated men of foreign race seem all to be able to express themselves fairly well in the English language. Both the Jap and the Korean opened with an apology for their "pronunciation," but they both succeeded in reading their notes with an easily followed diction. The Japanese representative mentioned incidentally that when the World Convention was held in Tokio in 1920 he had to train 1,000 interpreters to translate from Japanese to English, and about 100 interpreters to translate English into Japanese. It was a matter of gratification, he suggested, that that Convention was relieved of the necessity for the "interpreter," which he facetiously added was another name for "interrupter."

In the introduction of the native students who have dedicated themselves to take up the Sunday school work in China there was an element of the dramatic and spectacular. The Rev. E. G. Tewksbury, of Shanghai, who has been doing the pioneer work in China, appeared before the audience in a long red robe, profusely trimmed with pennant-like strips of many colours, all bearing Chinese characters in white lettering. These characters, he explained, represented the names of his pupils. When at his request the Chinese "leaders-of-the-future" stepped forward he doffed his robe and put it on one of the trio, with a significance which immediately suggested the Old Testament story of the prophet's mantle. The Chinaman's countenance is not always inscrutable—on this occasion pleasure was writ large upon it. A further touch of the spectacular was given by the unfurling by the three Chinese teachers of a huge striped banner, coloured red, yellow, blue, white, and black—the flag, explained Mr. Tewksbury, of the new Chinese Republic.

Among the other speakers were the Rev. Shoichi Imamura, of Japan, and the Rev. H. Namkung, Korea.

The Wandering Scot.

One of the raciest speakers at the Sunday School Convention is the Rev. Dr. M'Asee of Chicago. At the civic reception he said that the delegates from overseas felt that in coming to Scotland they were coming home. But he wondered what would happen if everybody who claimed to be a Scotsman came back. He added that when approaching our coast he observed a man peering admiringly at the distant shore, and asked him what was his native place. "Oh," was the reply, "I'm a Scotsman, but I was born in Canada, and have been to sea ever since."

A Rare Coin.

The youngsters wanted to play "Kim's Game." There were over a dozen of them. Half of them have been at work for a year or more, some earning from 15s. to £1 a week. The other half are still at school. I raked out everything in my pockets—pen, pencils, rubber, knife, leather case, spectacles, button, matches, etc., and last—to make up the 20 articles—a half-sovereign, which is one of my cherished possessions. The test ample evidence of keen and accurate observation; one, after a hurried glance, writing down every article and several others missing only one or two. Everyone described the coin, but not one knew it by its name. Such descriptions were given as—"A foreign coin," "A yellow coin," "A polished farthing." Only one came near the mark, hazarding "A sovereign." Not one of these lads remembered having seen a half-sovereign.

Holt Liner for Far East.

There was launched from the Cartsdyke yard of Scott's Shipbuilding and Engineering Co., Ld., Greenock, the twin-screw geared turbine vessel Hector built to the order of Messrs. Alfred Holt and Co., Liverpool, for their passenger and cargo service between Great Britain and the Far East. The length of the vessel is 517 feet, with a gross tonnage of about 11,400, and accommodation is provided for about 175 passengers in 74 staterooms.

Marriage.

At Grand Hotel, Charing Cross, Glasgow, on June 20, by the Rev. D. Langlands Seath, Eaglesham Parish Church, George Butchart, of Shanghai, China, son of the late David Butchart and of Mrs. Butchart, 8 Dudley Drive, Glasgow, to Alice Elizabeth, only daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Alexander S. Petrie, Station Road, Dunblane.

The "Open."

I do not know any event of such importance that carries with it so poor a monetary reward as the Open Championship in golf. A whole week is needed to find the winner; and the prize awarded is only a bare £70. Yet to achieve victory, if they can, half a dozen men have come all the way from America, while 270 British players are spending at least £15 or £20 a head in travelling and hotel expenses. The truth is that the real reward lies in the name. The British golfer who can win it is sure of plenty engagements for exhibitions at big fees—and also a trip to America with probably £3,000 to be earned over there in "shows." The Americans are always ready to fix up a tour for the British Champion and a partner; but "no other need apply" is now, I believe, the rule out there for British exhibitionists.

In the recent Amateur Championship the American "menace" was confined to one dapper little fellow, "Honolulu" Brown—or Hallelujah Brown, as Andra' Kirkcaldy styled him. A much more formidable challenge is launched in the Open Championship. A strong contingent of overseas golfers is forward.

Cricket.

Rain again interfered with cricket, and naturally the ball got the better of the bat. A. Linton, Selkirk, had the only century. The curiosity of the week was provided by Cartha, who were dismissed for 7 runs by Kilmarnock. Stirling County lost their first match in the Scottish Counties' Championship, Aberdeenshire beating them at Mannofield. Forfarshire and Fifeshire, who have yet to win their first match in this competition, played a drawn game. Clackmannan are the only undefeated club. In the Western Union, Uddingston, West, Drumpellier, and Kelburne were the winners. In club matches Grange scored 166 for 9, and Perthshire 132 for 6. Glasgow High School F. P. beat Clackmannanshire; Stewart's F. P. had easily the better of Royal High School F. P.; and Carlton put on 117 for 8 against Greenock 27 for 6.

By The Way.

As a contribution to the controversy, "Is Rodeo cruel?" it may be mentioned that there is a pipe band in attendance.

Mr. L. MacNeill Weir, M.P. for Clackmannan, in his new "Guide to Islay," takes this motto from Virgil in the chapter dealing with Machrie as a golf course,—Miscueruntque herbas, et non innoxia verba (And they mingled grass and words not harmless).

Mr. John Masefield has been treading on dangerous ground. Speaking at the Edinburgh Musical Festival, he said: "Burns enjoyed primarily three things—love, drink, and poetry." Then he made the even more remarkable statement: "His was not a life for serious contemplation. It was rather shocking." It seems as if John was looking for trouble.

Mr. William Graham, the Scots Financial Secretary to the Treasury, has earned the nickname of "Datas"—after the music-hall performer—owing to the remarkable memory he has for figures Out of sheer fun M.P.'s hurl questions about sums of money and trade facilities at Mr. Graham, who is always ready with the correct answer. He has not yet been "caught."

JAPAN'S U. S. BOYCOTT

(Apologies to "Japan Chronicle")

In the Land of Yankee Pankee,
A million miles away.
People care but little.
What poor Jasbo has to say.
If the Land of Jasbo Rasbo
Wants to Boycott U.S.A.,
Why not let the beggars do it?
"We should worry," so they say.
When the Rising Sun has risen.
High enough for them to see.
May be then our dear old Rasbo
Will have seen what others see.
Do not all the Yankee flappers
And, forsooth, the old ones too,
Wrap themselves in gauzy nighties
Using silk as few can do?
So when Yankee Pankee maidens.
Hear that Jasbo wants a "spat,"
It's ten to one to that Rasbo.
Will get its tit for tat.

THE GREAT RODEO CONTROVERSY

Lassooing Steers at Wembley: Cowboy Display Banned by the R.S.P.C.A.

From Our Own Correspondent.

London, June 18.

The newspapers really enjoyed themselves this week by running a "stunt" over the Rodeo Exhibition at Wembley. This is, as you probably know, a reproduction of various Western American Cowboy Feats, including broncho-riding, steer lassooing, and "roping" and steer-wrestling, and though it has nothing particular to do with the Empire Exhibition it was introduced as an attraction and probably also because Mr. C. B. Cochran came to the conclusion he could make a good deal of money out of it.

Long before the Exhibition started a controversy began in the papers on the humanitarian aspect of the whole affair. This was doubtless greatly encouraged for various reasons. Possibly there was the impression that newspaper discussion might be good for advertising purposes, while the R.S.P.C.A. and its friends thought that if there was going to be any free advertising they ought to have their share. So opinion was divided into two camps, one composed of those who know nothing about the show and denounced it and the others of those who did and praised it. Then the cowboys arrived; one paper sent a special correspondent to accompany them from the United States and the others "wrote them up" in great detail when they arrived. In fact, we had columns of personal impressions, and harmless little stunts of the cowboys themselves when being conveyed about London in char-à-bancs. Consequently, when the day of the first performance arrived the rival camps of spectators rolled up, either to praise or blame, but with all their convictions thoroughly well formed before they saw an animal enter the Stadium arena.

A Steer Injured.

At the morning show there was nothing of a very criticizable nature, while there was a good deal that was clever. The whole of the programme was carried out in its entirety, and I presume that the pro-Rodeoites retired with the gratifying feeling that everything they had maintained in the past had been more than justified by actuality. This ended Act 1. At night they had again rolled up in the hope that they would see something they could object to. This time they found something. During the roping contest a steer put up an unusually good fight, and though roped round the horns and twice thrown by the cowboy, succeeded on each occasion in regaining its feet before it could be secured by the roping together of fore and hind legs. At the third throw such was the impetus of horse and steer galloping from each other at a widening angle that as the rope drew taut to the pommel of the saddle the steer was flung violently to the ground and dragged a short distance, and the judges found that the off fore leg was injured; apparently broken near the shoulder. The steer cantered from the arena with the leg swinging, and when this was seen by a section of the crowd there was some booing and hissing. The injured animal was immediately destroyed.

Act 3 commenced on the Monday afternoon, with the steer-roping contests eliminated altogether, and with Mr. C. B. Cochran trying to get his own back and issuing the following statement.

"Most of the cowboys who have come to London specialize in roping, and they stand a chance of making more money in prizes in that than in any other event. Consequently we shall work off these heats in private as rapidly as possible. They will be taken before the public performance, probably each morning.

"I am convinced by the attitude of the people who saw the first two Rodeo competitions that I was justified in my belief that these feats of skill and endurance would appeal to sportsmen and to the British public generally. This is proved by the fact that the cowboys had a reception far greater than they have ever received in Canada or the United States.

"The booing on Saturday night was started by a party of medical students in fancy dress who had been refused free admission. After paying 2/- a head they signified their disapproval by booing the grand entry of the cowboys and cowgirls.

"When a steer broke its leg their renewed jeers were supported by a portion of the audience. There was absolutely no booing afterwards. Seven steers were roped in turn after the injured one had been removed, and each event was enthusiastically received, the cheering varying only in proportion to the speed with which each competitor finished his roping."

Things, as you will see, were going quite briskly from the point of view of the pro-Rodeoites, so that the R.S.P.C.A. enthusiasts decided to "get one in at" the Cochranists. So they promptly applied for summonses for cruelty against him and Mr. Tex Austin, the American promotor of the Show. First of all they applied at one Police Court, which was the wrong one, so they had a shot at another one, and now the summonses are returnable for next Tuesday. As the show stops on the following Saturday, Mr. Cochran will probably appeal against the conviction, if there is one, and no one will be any the worse off for the move. The R.S.P.C.A. wired to the Prime Minister "Press announces steer-roping at Wembley to continue in private and bulldozing in public or private. In the name of humanity please forbid it, if necessary, by resolution of the House of Commons." The issue was also raised in the House, where Mr. Henderson, the Home Secretary, while promising supervision, turned down the "'cruelty" stunt very hard, suggesting that in most sport people broke a leg or two at some time.

Act 4, saw the pro-Cochranists gaining ground. The cowboys are holding their private performances to work off the heats in steer-lassooing. Three cowboys have been badly injured and one has broken his arm, while one of the woman riders is in hospital.

A Series of Robberies.

Incessant robberies are reported at town and country houses. Quite one of the largest for very many years is outlined in the following notice across three columns of the different papers:—

£2,000 Reward.

The above reward will be paid to the first person giving such information as will lead to the conviction of the thief or thieves and the recovery of the property stolen on the night of the 11th-12th June, 1924, from Bath House, Piccadilly, London, or in proportion of the value so recovered. A list of the property stolen is given hereunder. Information may be sent to Charles Russell & Co., 37 Norfolk Street, Strand, Solicitors, or to the Commissioner of Police. New Scotland Yard, S.W., or to any Police Station."

In this case Lady Ludlow was the victim, and the stolen articles, which were mostly jewelled or gold works of art, are assessed at about £250,000, although if melted down the aggregate value would not greatly exceed two or three thousand. There is no clue whatever to the criminals and yet none of the articles if they remain in their present form are marketable, because it would be the easiest thing in the world to trace them.

Apart from this type of crime, there is very much less serious business for the Police Courts than usual, and a particular diminution in crimes of common street violence.

SEEING SPEECH

Sound Turned into Light

An apparatus, the ultimate development of which may be that the deaf will "hear' by seeing, was demonstrated to the "Daily News" recently by Dr. E. E. Fournier d'Albe, the eminent scientist, world famous for his work on selenmum and his invention of the optophone, the instrument by which the blind read ordinary print.

The apparatus styled by its inventor an acoustic spectroscope, consists of a series of resonating boxes provided with tiny mirrors attached to mica reeds. Each of these reeds is tuned to correspond to the fundamental note of its own resonator.

The first acoustic spectroscope is provided with only 20 resonators, which cover just over an octave of sound, but when a gramophone record of the "Yeomen of the Guard" was played about four feet from the apparatus the spots of light on the screen danced cheerily to the tune, indicating notes coming within the scope of the octave provided for.

Dr. Fournier d'Albe then showed that speech would cause vibrations.

"I see no reason," he said, "why speech should not ultimately become visible to the deaf in this way. Music presents a comparatively easy problem.

"I think it will be quite possible for the trained eye to 'see' speech owing to the fundamental tones, which will give some characteristic form to the medley of vibrations produced by a word, no matter who speaks it."

THE OMNIPOTENT GLAND

The Future of Mankind in Its Own Hands

"To stand out from the ruck of mankind in any distinguished manner whatever the individual must depend entirely on the gift of one or more of the endocrine organs by reason of a chemical substance in the blood destined for the activation of a certain group of cells in the vegetative system," said Lt.-Col. F. A. F. Barnardo, C.I.E., I.M.S., in the course of the concluding portion of a lecture entitled "Man, the Arbiter of his Destiny," in the hall of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, Calcutta, on June 18. Personality, he said, embraced much more than psychic attributes. Soul and body were not distinct. Man must be regarded as a soul-body or a body-mind, and internal secretions would enable us to ascertain why the living flickered, why it flared and why it fluttered. The discovery that the shape of the body and mind depended on the chemical supply of the internal secretions inspired us to the hope of being one day able to control human life, for whenever there was chemical discovery there was always chemical control. Thousands of workers were contributing their mites to the task but it was like individuals working at a mountain, which required organized engineering machinery for blasting.

Shakespeare's seven ages clearly defined the epochs of man's life: infancy as the epoch of the thymus, childhood that of the pineal, adolescence that of the sex glands, maturity as the epoch of whatever gland was left in the control of the life-struggle, senility as the age of general endocrine deficiency. Infancy beng the epoch of the thymus explained why babies all look alike and act alike. It was not until the second year that any practical differentiation was observed by checking the action of the thymus: It gave the child time to grow in bulk and mind. The thymus shrunk after the second year when its work was done. Adolescence was the period of stress and strain due to the upheaval of the sex glands and their demands for recognition. Maturity commenced when a stable sense of sex had been entered upon; but senility was the epoch which shed gloom and shadow on all. The senility followed maturity as night followed day. Degeneration occurred certainly from emotional exhaustion in addition to bacterial infections from the intestines. Man's brain had at present outgrown by stimulation of the endocrines his capacity for feeding the brain indefinitely, and extra energy led to exhaustion before recuperation could set in. The elixir of youth was not the whole story. Old age was an exhaustion of all members of the gland directorate. The most important was the thyroid. It became wasted after forty years. An explanation was that one of the main functions of the thyroid was the neutralization of poisons which arose in the intestine.

Effect of Heredity.

A man's gifts to his children were his endocrine secretions. They were the causes of inherited physical and psychic dispositions. Endocrine deficiencies, frquently at marrying age, showed themselves more in psychic than in bodily shadows. Occasional attacks of the "blues," unaccompanied by any bodily disease, may be sole evidence of endocrine failure somewhere in the brain due to the low potential strength of the hereditary factor concerned. Pre-disposition would be traced in some families and degeneracy in others.

The question now remained as to what uses were going to be made of the knowledge that had been accumulated of the endocrine glands. Modern man's existence consisted in an accumulation of wealth, concentration of sex, and the quest of the novel, but nevertheless he was the last word of mind working on matter ,and had always persistently refused to recognize himself as matter and subject to the laws of physics and the chemistry of matter. Hitherto imagination had been allowed fullplay. Visions and dreams constituted the sum of what 99 per cent. of the human race knew about themselves and their fate. Man's cruelty to man only revealed how dangerous was this delusion. But now all was changed. We could regard ourseleves as chemical machines which could be overhauled, remodelled, repaired; our code of morality as rules of guiding our conduct towards other members of our species. In the future it would be a case of education of the masses. A judicious use of endocrine extracts might mean everything to the statesman.

Colonel Barnardo said an American medical friend had told him that in Chicago to-day there was not a single brothel, simply because girls at the age of 10 were examined and if found mentally deficient were sent to a special institution till they reached the age of seventeen and where they were experimented upon, and their weakness counterbalanced and corrected. The average of life, continued the speaker, would be enormously prolonged through the discoveries of the potentialities of gland operation. The application of endocrine control would arrange for the best breeding of the admixtures oof glands of internal secretion possible and there would be treatment for those born with a handicap or for those who by disease had became depressed in the life-struggle, while the mind would become controllable in proportion as we could put our fingers on and handle the endocrine factors which comprised the process of adaptation of each individual to his environment. It would depend on the attitude which we now took up whether there was a hopeless acquiescence in the inevitable or a complete self-determination of self and our surroundings. The adventures of personality which were episodes of life on earth, friendships and sex-relations, mishaps and discases and the final fate which overtook us began to be comprehensible, hence controllable. The future of the race and the future of human nature then depended on the use we put our knowledge to and in time man, the adventurer, the prey of chance, will become the captain and architect of his fate and destiny.

SHELL-SHOCK SINGERS

Choral Work as a Cure In Nerve Cases

"For 'tis better far to laugh than cry."

This is not a bad working philosophy, as the Jovial Monk knew. But what happens when you cannot laugh and cannot cry and cannot speak; when you are shell-shocked and cannot make yourself do things? Then you sing.

I was surprised to see so many men in he old familiar hospital blue (writes a "Daily News" reporter), and at first sight the hall of the Chelsea Polytechnic, where the Vocal Therapy Society had its united concert looked like a room in a hospital where an entertainment was about to be given by a visiting concert party. But here the men were to give their own concert, however hard it was for some of them to "get going."

The society believes in the value of choral singing as a cure for neurasthenia due to wounds or shell-shock.

Sir Frederick Mott presented a silver challenge cup for choral singing, and three of the choirs competed for it during the afternoon in private. Meanwhile the others had a sing-song.

"A Jovial Monk am I" was the first chorus. It "hung fire" for a verse or two, but by the end of the song it swang along splendidly.

Later there was a severer test. The Ewell Choir sent up a mandoline quartet. Playing appeared to be more difficult than singing, and the men were grateful for the courage shown by their teacher, Miss Meta Dredge. The quartet was a great success.

The Italian warship Calabria left Basra on June 19 viâ Persian Gulf ports for Italy. She carried on board the bodies of two Italian aviators who lost their lives in 1920 while flying from Italy to Tokyo as instructors to the Japanese Air Force. Their bodies were exhumed recently and taken on board at Bushire, where an impressive ceremony took place, in the presence of Col. Prideaux, British Resident in the Gulf, Commander Guy Coleridge, R.N., and the officers of H.M.S. Cyclamen. The Calabria was returning home from the China station and under orders from the Italian Ministry of Marine investigated oil supplies and prices at various points en route.

OUR AUSTRALIAN LETTER

Can the Two Anti-Labour Parties Get Together? Government Tribulations over the Wool Purchase: Nauru and the Futility of the Mandated Territories Scheme

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Melbourne June 16.

The exigencies of a somewhat indifferent mail service compel me to write at a moment when a most mementous convention commences its sittings. The Federated Farmers' organizations meet to-day in Victoria, and their chief interest will centre in the adoption or otherwise of the agreement between Mr. Bruce, the Prime Minister representing the Nationalists, and Dr. Earle Page, the Commonwealth Treasurer representing, as leader, the Country party. If the convention adopts the principles of the agreement then it may be accepted that the two so-called anti-Labour parties will act in unison at the next general elections and the life of the present government may be prolonged indefinitely. The agreement provides that neither Nationalists nor Country party will seek to win seats at the expense of the other, and that both will interchange preferences where there are more than two candidates.

It would be idle to forecast the results of the conference, though there is a good deal of evidence that the two leaders are somewhat nervous as to them. In the case of Dr. Page it means that if the agreement is rejected he ceases to be leader. He has said so himself. The farmers' newspaper in New South Wales approves the agreement; that in Victoria opposes it. Clearly we seem to be getting back to the old rivalry between the two principal States. Mr. Bruce seems to be taking a definite stand. He has said that if the Country party organizations are determined at the next elections to fight the Nationalists, then he must of necessity reform his ministry to the exclusion of Country members, who will not be taken back after the elections should he still be in a position to constitute a cabinet. That attitude of course spells war between the two sections, which should be joined together in opposition to the Labour party's avowed programme, and the Nationalist organization is supporting the Prime Minister.

The real trouble lies at the door of the "hayseeds" of the country—men who do not understand anything of the difficulties of government and are indifferent to all matters except those immediately affecting themselves and their own business. Amongst them are many who started life as manual labourers, and acquired with their livelihood a staunch faith in Labour doctrines. These men stand in the way of the agreement, and the moment politics cease to affect them personally, their old faith comes to guide them along the paths of socialism, and the taxation of wealth for the benefit of the many, however injurious it may be to industry and progress.

Wool Settlement and Labour Accusations.

In the House of Representatives the Government has been vigorously attacked by the Labour Opposition in connexion with the final settlement of a matter arising out of the purchase of wool during three war years by the Imperial Government The original amount involved was something in the neighbourhood of £15,000,000, but with the end of the war came the disposal of enormous stocks, and a settlement concerning the huge accumulated profits made by the increased price of wool.

Inter alia, a matter cropped up owing to the demand of local companies for wool wherefrom to manufacture wool-tops. The companies wanted to buy wool at the upset price fixed by the Imperial Government, and the Commonwealth told the wool-growers that 80 per cent. of the profits of the manufacturers of tops would go to the Government, which would see that they did not lose by the wool not going into the British pool. In actual fact the profits did not materialize, and to keep faith with the growers Mr. Hughes, after much discussion, agreed to pay from revenue the sum of £275,000 to the Wool Committee, or its executors, the British-Australasian Wool Realization Association. The matter was mentioned in parliament, and the details of the agreement fully disclosed in the annual report of the Auditor-General. The Labour Opposition discovered the other day that half this agreed-upon amount had been paid, without any parliamentary appropriation. It seized the opportunity to supply political ammunition to its friends now fighting the Victorian State elections, and accused the Government of handing over the people's money to the wealthy graziers without any authority from parliament.

The Government answer was hardly happy. The Prime Minister said that the money had been paid out of Treasurer's Advance Account, which had been duly authorized by parliament. The leader of the Opposition naturally scouted this statement as a mean subterfuge. The Treasurer's Advance Account was merely petty cash and was never intended to meet such a case as the wool settlement. The debate on the action of the Government naturally drifted from this important issue, and resolved itself into a discussion of the merits of the agreement, which is something like three years old.

On the main point the Labour party had not sound ground to stand upon, for in the early part of the war it warmly endorsed the action of Mr. Hughes in spending £2,000,000 on steamers, and that without parliamentary authority and, it subsequently transpired, without even the approval of the cabinet. The attack, therefofre, resolved itself into one upon the so-called wealthy pastoralists, and an effort was made to show that somehow these bug-bears of the proletariat had been specially favoured by the Bruce Government.

The motion of censure was defeated on a party division, but the debate showed that the Government had blundered in not getting the necessary appropriation passed, and in that way supplied platform thunder to the opponents of the State Nationalist Government which is fighting for its existence against the attacks of both the Labour and the Country parties. The State election takes place on the 26th instant, and Federal Labour may be expected to subordinate Commonwealth business in parliament to further attempts to discredit the Nationalists as a party in both Commonwealth and State politics. Victoria has never had a Labour Government, and to win to power now would be a tremendous triumph following upon the Labour victories in South and Western Australia.

Commonweath and State Finances.

The Federal Ministry is apparently prepared to risk everything in order to disentangle the ghastly muddle of Commonwealth and State finance, for which we have very largely to thank the Labour party as far back as 1910. Other Federal treasurers have tried to unravel the tangle, but they have been faced with the fact that the States do not want any unravelment. The Federal at present pays the several States 25/- per head per annum; and the States like this, because they have money—some £7,000,000—a year to spend for which they do not have to impose taxation. They frankly say that they do not want to incur the odium of imposing taxation, even if at the same time the Commonwealth remits even a greater amount. When Federation was being debated in the last months of the last century the chief financial argument put to the people was that the Commonwealth would rely upon indirect taxation for its revenues, and the States would have the proceeds of direct taxation. The right to impose direct taxation was reserved to the Commonwealth for use in case of national emergency—war being the chief.

No sooner had Labour won to power in 1910 than it introduced a land tax for the purpose of breaking up large estates. As it did not control land, roads or railways this was clearly a matter for the States, but the ever-present desire to tax some one, which permeates Labour, brushed aside all such arguments and the tax was imposed. The next stage was to start a Commonwealth savings bank, and so encroach upon the sources from which the States raised money for advances to workers building their own homes and to agriculturists. With the war came the imposition of income taxes, entertainment tax, estate duties, war profits taxes and so on. At present the Commonwealth is raising about £12,000,000 a year in direct taxation, and paying back to the States £7,000,000. It is now proposed that the Commonwealth shall withdraw almost entirely from the field of direct taxation and shall discontinue the £7,000,000 payment to the States, an amount which increases each year with the additions to the population. Dr. Page is expected to make his proposals public very shortly, and he is likely to find himself vigorously opposed by all the State government. Such men as the late Lord Forrest, the Rt. Hon. W. A. Watt, and Sir Joseph Cook, P.C., have all tried to reach finality in this matter and have failed, chiefly because they have tried to reach an agreement with the States. The present government is expected to exercise its right of discontinuing the payments to States, and of abolishing about £8,000,000 of direct taxation. There will be a mighty outery, but if it is carried through Dr. Page will have accomplished much for which he will receive a niche, in the fane of Australian statesmanship.

The Irish Question.

Clearly Australia rejoiced too soon that the Irish Question had been settled. In the past it afforded a pretext for anti-English attacks by certain priests and other firebrands, and was used adroitly by the Labour party to capture the Irish vote at election time, but it has remained at the present quite free from any anti-Australian taint. It remained for the Ramsay MacDonald Government in England to drag the three chief dominions into the wretched fray, by asking that they lend the services of their high judicial authorities to form a commission to fix the boundaries between North Ireland and the Free State, which are so much in dispute as to threaten a recrudescence of civil war.

Australia has always tried to keep out of the Irish trouble, and there is a general feeling of surprise and almost dismay that the Commonwealth Government should have hurriedly agreed to the MacDonald request to interfere in what seems to be an entirely domestic concern. A few newspaper profess to see in the Commission a compliment paid to the Dominions, but the majority feel that the British Labour Government has gratuitously dragged them into the quarrel, because it wishes to shift all odium off its own shoulders. How Mr. Bruce ever came to agree that the Australian Chief Justice, Sir Adrian Knox, should drop his own important work and start overseas to settle the Irish imbroglio, no one can understand.

If the Commission comes to a conclusion, it is bound to offend one or other of the parties and the Dominions, like the man who interferes between husband and wife, are likely to get most of the buffets. But there is another side to the matter. If at Britain's request three Dominions interfere in a dispute between the self-governing dominion of North and South Ireland, why should they expect to be free from interference by North or South Ireland in any dispute which may occur within their own territories? Thus Dr. Page has been preaching the subdivision of the larger States, and has even said that if his particular part of New South Wales is not given self-government it will take it. Here is an excellent opportunity for Ireland to appoint a Commission to settle the matter. In a similar case South Africa might be invaded by a Commission of Canadians, Australians and Irishmen. We thought we were rid of the Irish question, but we seem to have blundered into it in a worse form than ever.

The Mandated Territories.

Federal Ministers in both Houses are protesting against the attitude of Opposition members in regard to the mandated territories. It may be recalled that at one time the League of Nations had before it a report concerning the phosphate island of Nauru, which had, as a result of the war, passed from the casual control of Germany to that of Britain, Australia and New Zealand. It is probably one of the most valuable properties in the world, and, under the Wilson scheme of mandates, was a fair subject of experiment.

The enemies of the Allies, and therefore the friends of Germany, busily explained that the Australian control sacrified the native women to the Chinese coolies, and that the latter were sacrificed to the greed of wealth; meanwhile also Australia was making huge profits at the expense of the rest of the world. All this was plainly disproved. Then came the attacks upon the administration of German New Guinea, and the missionaries—German and other—came to the rescue. The charges were disproved, but it was shown that the accusations were mainly inspired by Germans, and absorbed by the sensational writers in the Australian press. That charge was disposed of, but only for a moment. The next annual conference of the Permanent Mandates Commission is about to sit, and the attack upon the mandatory authorities has been renewed.

Labour members in the Australian parliament are busily seeking to make political capital out of reports, the truth of which they do not believe. They are creating an atmosphere of suspicion, entirely in the interests of their attacks upon the political party to which they are opposed in the Commonwealth parliament. And every man who applauds "each century but this and every country but his own" is backing up the German agents or patriots.

The late President Wilson could hardly have dreamt that his scheme of mandates would have resulted in making these various pawns in the international game a source of constant irritation and intrigue, creating a position which might quite conceivably lead to the wars which he so earnestly desired to bring to an end. Yet the matter has reached this stage, with the weakening of mandatory control, and the disinclination of public officials to take office in the territories lest they may be sacrificed to party politics in their own countries. There seems every reason to fear that the Wilson scheme will result in the mandated territories becoming the happy hunting grounds of unscrupulous adventurers — whether nominally official or otherwise.

Social and Otherwise.

The Royal Opera Company, chiefly of Italians, brought to this country by Dame Nellie Melba in conjunction with the Williamson entrepreneurs, is just completing a marvellous season of operatic success in Melbourne. It was expected that eight weeks would be the limit of the public's and the management's endurance, but the people have packed the houses all the time, despite prices which would absorb a week's wages, if an artisan wished to take his wife and family to a hearing. Melba herself was naturally a great attraction, though it must be admitted that the Italian soprano, Toti del Monte, took the Australian playgoers by storm, and the divine Nellie might find it hard to outrival her, even in the Australian diva's birthplace. The Company is about to move over to Sydney, and cynics are delighted to learn that they are indignant because they are dunned for income tax on the basis of what, probably for publicity purposes, the management says it is paying.

Another interesting public entertainment is that given in lecture form by Dr. Stefansson, the Arctic explorer. To hear Stefansson one would assume that the North Pole, and thereabouts, was a place where you could get sunburnt, where flowers bloomed in their hundreds, and bird and animal life formed the paradise of the zoologist. He was busy trying to make us understand that the far North was quite fitted for the white man, despite the theories of the ancient Greeks as reproduced in our school text books. As a result he might have given an extreme impression that the Arctic circle was, if you kept off the mountains, something like an English meadow in summer. He was much more interesting than convincing for the very reason that he had theories to contradict, and the man who is contradicting history is not disposed to qualify his disproofs. He is an amusing person, with an American accent and gift as a raconteur. He also has a great admiration for the Chinese, whose brains he declares are greater than those of the Europeans and equal to those of the Esquimaux.

Business Prospects.

Generally speaking Australia is most prosperous. Her trouble has been that she has been milked by the banks to such an extent that the accumulated millions in London cannot be brought out here, except at a heavy discount, even sufficient to hang up £6,000,000 of Bawra money, preventing the small woolgrowers getting their money when they wanted it, and so compelling them to sell to their wealthier advisers. But that is another story. The facts as disclosed in the Treasury memorandum at the Imperial Economic Conference show that the banks made money out of exchanges, when where there was a really national bank, working for its own country and not for profits, Empire exchange could have been made "free." The Australian Government has now before Parliament a banking Bill which will emphasise the fact that the Commonwealth Bank is expected to be a national bank. We have so far only had a hardly convincing speech from the Commonwealth Treasurer, but if his intentions are good, and their purpose carried out, for a time there will be joy in the ranks of the exporters, a loosening of the purse-strings in Australia, and a general lightening of what seems at the moment an inexplicably tight business position. The wheat crop has exceeded expectations, wool retains its high values, meat is being exported, and fruits are being profitably harvested, while in the secondary industries there is still sufficient prosperity to back up strikes. There are few who are willingly or wilfully unemployed; yet money generally is tight and town business at least, slack. The anomaly seems to be in the banking business, and Parliament now has that in hand. Whether it will do any good remains to be seen.

KNIGHTS OF SAINT PATRICK

Ancient Order to be Abolished?

The death of the Earl of Enniskillen has once more brought into prominence the future of the Order of St. Patrick, of which he had been a knight since 1902, and it is anticipated that some official announcement on this subject will shortly be forthcoming. When Ireland was granted a measure of self-government the insignia of this Order, founded in 1783 by George III. were transferred from Dublin Castle to London, and at that time it was currently reported the King had decided to make no further appointments, and that the Order would thus be allowed to lapse as the present knights died, as was the case some years ago with the now obsolete Order of Victoria and Albert.

In this connexion it is believed to be significant that the Prince of Wales has not been created a Knight of St. Patrick, though he wears the ribands of the sister Orders of the Garter and the Thistle. The only Royal Knight of St. Patrick at the present day is the Duke of Connaught, upon whom the Order was bestowed by Queen Victoria in 1869. There are now only 20 of these knights, as against the 22 provided for in the Statutes by which the Order is governed. Another suggestion regarding the future of the order which, it is understood, has already been brought under the consideration of the King is that it should be reconstituted on lines similar to those of the Order of St. Michael and St. George, which is the decoration usually awarded to those who have rendered distinguished service in various parts of the Overseas Empire, with the exception of India.

This would mean that the Order of St. Patrick would be divided into various classes and would be available for commoners instead of for peers alone and for those of non-Irish birth or descent who had rendered good service in the sister isle. An impressive religious service was observed at one time upon the formal investiture of a knight. This service was, however, abolished with the disestablishment of the Church in Ireland when the offices of Prelate and Registrar of the Order and the rule that the Chancellor of the Order of St. Patrick must be an archbishop, were also abolished.

HOUSE OF COMMONS' REJECTION OF IMPERIAL PREFERENCE PROPOSALS

Duties That Would Have Brought in Cheaper Dried Fruits, Tobacco, Wines and Sugar Thrown out for Sake ofFree Trade Shibboleth

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

London, June 26.

Politics are beginning to get very brisk as the Session advances. We have discussed and rejected the resolutions in favour of Imperial Preference. The divisions were as follows:—

DRIED FRUITS for	272
Against	278
Maj: against	6
TOBACCO for	271
Against	284
Maj: against	13
WINES for	268
Against	285
Maj: against	17
SUGAR for	263
Against	283
Maj: against	20

On the other six resolutions, which dealt with other aspects of Imperial Preference, no vote was taken. I have set the figures out, because they are important, and because a good deal of them may be heard in the near future. You can gather this from several points in the debate which I may summarize as follows:—

(1) The admission by Mr. J. H. Thomas, the Colonial Secretary, that debates of this nature "might have a very disastrous effect upon Colonial opinion. I am perfectly certain that it will only lead to disaster to go on with these conferences, and find when they are broken up that nothing whatever has been done."

(2) The melancholy reflexion by the Prime Minister: "I am very unhappy and the reason is that in resisting these resolutions I am conscious that to-morrow morning the Government will be misrepresented in the Dominions as having taken a step towards breaking our word, or as saying good-day to the Dominions, who wish us to pay court to them, or are paying court to us, and turning to them the cold shoulder. (Hon. Members: Hear, Hear.) Yes, that is the danger, and it has even been said that some of us are going out of our way to promote trade with Russia, and are also going out of our way to depress trade with our own kin. That is said, and it is untrue, and if untrue, it is very cruel to think it."

The Fetish Before All.

(3). The fact that the bulk of the Liberal and Labour Parties voted against the guarantee of cheaper sugar for 10 years, against cheaper currants, against cheaper dried fruit, against cheaper tobacco, against cheaper wine, merely because they cut across the great and glorious fetish of Free Trade, thus sacrificing the well-being of the masses to cast-iron dogma.

(4). The dawning realization by a number of Liberals of the more enlighted type and by a certain number of Labour men that Imperial Preference is the greatest safeguard imaginable for the well-being of the working classes.

(5) By the general realization that the whole of the force of the arguments was in favour of the Opposition, which none the less was defeated by the alliance of Liberalism and Socialism.

As the result of this debate, Imperial Preference has become a real live issue in our national life. For once the public is beginning to see its value to the working classes. About 38 per cent. of our Overseas trade goes to the different parts of the British Empire—far more than to the whole of Europe together. The Preference last year was worth to us about £11,000,000 sterling and we were enabled to compete in all the Dominion markets with goods manufactured by labour better paid and working under better conditions than in the case of any of our competitiors. It is this inter-working which the working classes more than anyone have every reason to encourage, and yet, for the sake of an idea, Liberalism was found quite ready to join with Socialism in bringing our competition down to the same basis as that existing in Germany, with the result that the standard of life and remuneration become the same as their own. This policy, of course, is on exactly the same lines as that dictated by the abolition of the McKenna Duties and the refusal to renew Part 11 of the Safeguarding of Industries Act.

The Housing Fiasco.

Last Monday the House of Commons gave more or less definite approval to the Government Housing proposals, but it did so apathetically because nobody believes in them. The Opposition, indeed, moved a formal vote of objection on the ground that the Bill "did' not meet any of the difficulties, either as regards labour or material, that at present limit the building of houses discourages private enterprise and private ownership, tends to increase costs, and throws an excessive burden upon the State and the local authorities without any likelihood that an adequate supply of houses will thereby be made available." This was rejected on a vote with Liberal support, but then the "patient oxen," as Mr. Asquith's followers are called, turned on the Government and supported the Opposition in a demand that the Bill should be considered in Committee of the whole House. The Government were very annoyed, and retorted that members instead of going grouse-shooting in the north on the 12th of August would be "grousing" instead at Westminster, where they would be kept owing to the prolongation of Parliament. Some people suggest that the Session will not end before the middle of September but it is quite safe to say that it will not go, at the worst, beyond the middle of August. Legislation in this hot weather in the stuffy House of Commons is very trying.

Meantime the Government is trying to realize some of its election promises. The performances, however, are a long way off promises. Thus, this week we had the Government intentions with regard to what is known as the removal of the Thrift Penalty on Old Age Pensions. Most enthusiasts have been recommending that Old Age Pensions should be paid to everybody irrespective of their means. The Government Bill is much more modest, and the Chancellor explained that he had not enough money to meet all claims and further that people nowadays are living much longer than they used to. All he proposes, therefore is, an allowance of 15/- a week in addition to the 10/- a week allowed at present to a single man, and 30/- a week in the case of a married couple. This means that private income would be disregarded up to £39 per annum, plus the present income allowance for a single man and £78 for a married couple. The Chancellor also promised us Mothers' Pensions next year. We shall, of course, have a General Election before he can find all the money he will need for his social reform, and the Labour Party will go to the country with an appeal for support to enable all these projects to materialize.

Preparing for an Election.

In fact, they are already preparing their electioneering material. It is said that the Government does not intend to pass the Bill giving a vote to both sexes on complete equality; it will allege that the Opposition has prevented this most necessary project from materializing, and next year it will ask the electors to give support against such wicked Party tactics. We have also nearly passed the Traffic Bill, though the opposition to this is very great, and the Government is defeated about once a week on it. The state of London traffic could not be worse than it is, though whether the Bill would produce any good results is a very open question.

So much for politics.

They are not occupying our exclusive attention, because the social season is in full swing and Society, quite apart from the Royal Garden Party this week, which was brilliantly successful in glorious weather, has been able to attend Ascot, Windsor, Lord's the Theatrical Garden Party, Hurlingham, Ranelagh, Wimbledon and the Opera. All these functions have done, and are doing, well, though apart from the Opera there are not more than two theatres in London which are paying, mainly owing to the warm weather. In some cases matinées have only been taking £5.

OUR PARIS LETTER

Personages in the New Administration: Gen. Nollet's Good Work in Germany

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Paris, June 19.

So far as one can judge at present, the "execution" of M. Millerand has left France perfectly calm. Anxiety has been allayed, at any rate for a time, by the choice of his successor. The Chamber and Senate realized in time that, if they put M. Painlevé in M. Millerand's place, they would give the extremists too much of a free hand. As an expert in the higher mathematics, M. Painlevé has few superiors, and it is no doubt his great reputation in this realm of intellect that has made the Radical-Socialists so ready to use him as a figurehead. He has been pushed forward to such an extent that he perhaps began to take himself seriously as a party leader, but this is a part for which he has neither the character nor the temperament necessary for success, and there was a pronounced feeling that, if he were elected president, he would not be strong enough to deal with any grave crisis.

This is the feeling that has sent M. Gaston Doumergue to the Elysée. At the beginning of the crisis, the groups of the Left sent delegates to him to say that M. Painlevé was their candidate and that, in the interest of the party, it would be advisable for him (M. Doumergue) not to come forward, so as to avoid any splitting of votes. M. Doumergue replied very politely that he had not presented himself as a candidate, but that if any of his friends wanted to vote for him he would certainly not attempt to dissuade them. The delegates retired discomfited, and the party councils could find no way of obtaining any material addition to the 309 votes on which they could count for M. Painlevé. From that moment the star of the President of the Senate was in the ascendant, and when the two Houses of Parliament assembled in congress at Versailles, he was elected at the first ballot by a handsome majority. The extremists who forced M. Millerand to resign were actually defeated before their side could take office, and they were told very plainly that they would not be allowed to have it all their own way.

The New President.

Unlike most French political men, M. Doumergue has travelled afar. In his younger days he lived in the East and obtained a good first-hand knowledge of colonial questions—a knowledge which stood him in good stead when he entered politics some 30 years ago. He sent a very cordial message through me to the "North-China Daily News" on the occasion of its jubilee in 1914. He has no claim to brilliancy, but he has a large stock of the solid common-sense with which the French bourgeoisie is so well endowed. He is an early riser, a methodical worker and a good trencherman. Like so many of his predecessors at the Elysée, the only outdoor exercise he takes is in the form of morning walks, but, like M. Clemenceau, he always begins the day by a quarter of an hour of physical exercises, so as to keep himself fit. He has announced that his desire is to be the arbitre impartial et indiscuté, by which he means no doubt, that if he is given a fair chance he will avoid the expressions of personal opinion which proved so disastrous to his predecessor.

And the New Premier.

M. Herriot, the new Premier, is distinctly modern and democratic in his methods. He wears a soft hat, smokes a pipe in public, receives newspaper representatives after his Cabinet meetings and tells them all that can be told with safety. After forming his Cabinet, a process which lasted until well after 11 o'clock at night, he insisted on all his colleagues accompanying him to a brasserie in the neighbourhood of the Place de la Bastille for a democratic supper of sausage and sauerkraut, or choucroute as it is called in French. One wonders what that severely methodical toiler M. Poincaré thinks of these free and easy ways. A smoker of pipes in the Minister's room at the Quai d'Orsay!

Gen. Nollet's Appointment.

The most significant selection by M. Herriot is that of General Nollet to be Minister of War. It is quite a long time since a military man filled this post, and in view of the prejudice entertained by the advanced Socialists against professional soldiers, M. Herriot must have put forward some strong reasons to obtain the endorsement of his choice. Most people suppose that the object is to show to the world at large that, however anxious the new French Government may be for a peaceful settlement with Germany, it does not intend to be hoodwinked. Since the difficult process of putting the Treaty of Versailles into effect began, General Nollet has been president of the Inter-Allied Commission which has been doing its best to control Germany's armaments. In this post, requiring a great deal of firmness and tact, General Nollet has been very successful. He found valuable help even among the Germans themselves. Arms factory workmen, who saw that he is a genuine democrat, supplied him with valuable information. For the last 18 months German officials have resorted to every possible device to prevent the commission from knowing what the army was doing and what war material was being manufactured, but, thanks to General Nollet, the Allies have been kept well informed. Without any fuss or endeavour to make the situation appear worse than it really is, General Nollet has supplied a series of reports which have convinced even Mr. MacDonald. Everybody approves of M. Herriot's selection, as head of the army, of the man who knows more than anyone about German war preparations.

Mme. Thiers' Jewellery.

Not since the Crown diamonds were sold in 1887 has the State reaped such a harvest from the disposal of portable property as from the pearl necklace and other jewellery once owned by Mme. Thiers, wife of the first President of the Third Republic. She left her surviving sister, Mlle. Dosne, a life interest in this jewellery, directing that, after her sister died, it should go to the Louvre. Mme. Thiers no doubt thought her necklace too rare and wonderful to be worn by any private individual, and this view was accepted until after the jewellery had been on view in the Louvre for many years. When, after the war, money was badly needed, it occurred to somebody that, as the jewellery had neither artistic nor archæological value, it might as well be converted into cash. After long negotiations with the family, an agreement was reached, whereby part of the proceeds of the eventual sale were to go to a charitable institution founded and endowed by Mlle. Dosne and called after her, and the rest to the fund out of which the art collections in the national museums are enriched from time to time. This agreement was embodied in a special Act of Parliament, and the sale, by public auction, took place this week in one of the big sculpture galleries on the ground floor of the Louvre. The necklace, consisting of three rows of large pearls, which cost £9,500 (having been bought long before pearls came into fashion) was knocked down at Frs. 11,280,000. Adding fees and taxes, the total cost to the buyer was Frs. 12,802,800, which, at the prevailing rate of exchange, works out at £164,140. The necklace was bought by a well-known firm of Rue de la Paix jewellers, who will shortly place it on view in their premises.

VERTICAL FLIGHT

British Machine's Achievement Sunrise Trial: Anti-Spy Precautions

A British aeroplane capable vertical flight has been construc for the Air Ministry and has cessfully passed its first trials.

The machine has been built secret by Mr. Brennan, the design in the huge airship shed at Far Farnborough, where the Germ one of the first of the military ships, was housed. The trial flig was carried out at 5 o'clock in morning in a secluded spot on aerodrome, with only Air Minis experts present. Extraordina precautions were taken to secu the absolute secrecy of the tri Extra guards were posted all o the neighbourhood. A complete systematic search of all the land the district was made. Hedge were examined, bushes beaten, ditches scoured. Even trees we closely searched to ensure that th screened no unauthorized person.

Hovering at 20ft.

Only when it was satisfactorily ascertained that no one was in hi ing in the precincts of the aerodrom was the Brennan craft wheeled o from the closely guarded hangar.

It rose straight up with an eas and certainty that delighted the ex perts who were looking on to height of nearly 20ft. It hovere for some minutes, and then safel descended. All the time it wa under the completest control.

Horizontal flight was not attempt ed on this occasion. Mr. Brennan anxious to make certain slight modi fications, revealed by the test flig as necessary, before the fuller test are carried out. Trials will als have to be made in rougher weathe than existed at the early mornin flight.

The Brennan helicopter, which i entirely unlike any of the foreign machines, is based on the gyroscop principle. The research and ex perimental work has been going o in secret for some years. The Stat has given financial assistance t the inventor and the craft is, o course, the property of the Air Ministry.

Septuagenarian Inventor.

Mr. Brennan, who is an Irishman born at Castlebar, West Ireland, is 72 years of age. He had achieved fame as an inventor before he turned his attention seriously to solving the problem of vertical flight.

He produced the Brennan torpedo which, in 1880, was sold to the British Government for £110,000— more than four times the largest sum ever before paid to an inventor by the Government. He also in vented the mono-rail, a gyroscope railway, and the research work in volved in that production has been of considerable value to him in the evolution of the helicopter.

COMMON-SENSE IN LAW AND GOSPEL

Notes of a Sermon Preached by the Rev. C. E. Darwent in Union Church, Tientsin, Sunday Evening, June 1

Text: St. Luke XII 57. "And why even of yourselves, judge ye not, that which is right?"

I have a book by the Professor of Jurisprudence in the University of Oxford. I always congratulate myself in having had the sense to spend a shilling on that little book. It is one of the "Home University" series, by Dent & Co. The writer is Professor Paul Vinogradoff D.C.L., D.HIST and I know not how many other titles of honour. The position he occupies in the world of law is a very great one; as great as any in the world. I think the great Blackstone held the same position. And this shining legal authority, who is not only Professor of Jurisprudence, but Corpus Professor of Jurisprudence, has written this little book, and entitled it "Common-sense in Law."

I can imagine, that the reason why many people have not bought it, is, that the title put them off altogether. They have said to themselves, as multitudes of people have said, "Common-sense in Law! The Law is about the last place where we should expect to find common-sense." The idea has been, that a man cannot expect to sell a book with a title like that. I remember an old gentleman in Lancashire, who expressed his opinion of the law quite forcibly, "The law is a-hass." That is the common idea of it. "The law is an ass"; a hopeless kind of thing for the ordinary man to handle at all. There is a bitter proverb about it to the effect, that "a man, who is his own lawyer has a fool for a client." That is true technically, but, as we shall see, not true essentially. There are varieties of phrases conveying the ordinary person's idea of it. We talk of "The uncertainties of the law"; "Think twice before going to law." There is the story of the Scottish Sheriff, who said, that if he were riding a horse along Leith Walk, and a man went up to him, saying, that the horse was his, it would be cheaper to let him have the horse, and buy another, than go to law with him about it. That is the nadir of pessimistic criticism of the law, surely. Novelists have, no doubt, unintentionally, given the law a bad name for hopeless complications. There is the great case of Jarndyce v. Jarndyce in "Bleak House." Then there is the immortal Serjeant Buzfuz. The drama too often makes a plot hang on legal complications. I remember years ago seeing a play, in which the heroine—a young widow—is seen sitting, a sad lonely figure in the middle of the stage with a copy of the Code Napoleon on her lap; the very image of despair. Someone has said, that "it is very difficult to believe, that the average lawyer was ever an innocent babe."

Common Sense and Morals.

You can hardly imagine any profession having harder things said about it than these. And, of course, Professor Vinogradoff must know them all. Still, this is the engaging thesis of his book, that the law is the essence of common-sense. And he proves it too. He says that, although the details of legal procedure are complicated and technical, the operations of the mind in the domain of law are based on common-sense, and may be followed without difficulty by persons of ordinary intelligence and education." Then he says that "Laws take their place among the rules of conduct, which ensure social order and intercourse. Therefore jurisprudence appears among social sciences within the section of moral science." That is true. No one can maintain, that zoology is a moral science. No, indeed. Law is. Its complications, its antiquated language, its technicalities do not belong to its nature at all. Now, as we are, I hope, "persons of ordinary intelligence and education," we can see that. The law has to do only with moral questions, questions of right and wrong, and we are all able to form a judgment on questions of right and wrong, for each one of has a conscience of some sort, its capacity of judgment depending on the way we have treated it. But we all have it. The technicalities of law are on the surface only; the technicalities of other sciences are of their very essence. That is the difference between law as a science and other especially, physical sciences. In law you always come to common-sense, which it is to be hoped we all possess, at least, in some degree. Old Ulpian, the Roman lawyer, sums up all law in three clauses which are amous; "Honeste vivere, alterum non laedere, suum cuique tribuere," that is, "To live honourably, not to harm your neighbour, to give everyone his due. You can boil down all the proceedings of courts, Acts of Parliament, Norman-French expressions into those three clauses, that anyone can understand.

For Common Men.

Two common facts prove that this is so. No one can deny them. The first is the fact, that no matter how complicated a law case may be, we all read the reports in the newspapers, and manage to understand them. The Tichborne trial was followed by scores of thousands of ordinary people. Judges and counsel are among our ablest men, and they can manage to analyse the most awful legal mess, and make it so lucid, that you feel ashamed at ever having had any difficulty at all. But we cannot read an astronomical treatise on the motions of the planets unless we know something of the higher mathematics. If we don't know the higher mathematics we don't, and no amount of common-sense gives us the necessary capacity to read it. Secondly, there is the jury-system. No one in an ordinary jury has had any legal training. The jury is made up of of 12 ordinary honest men. Yet we take for granted, and rightly, that the judge, aided by counsel, can make the most abstruse point crystal clear to a jury of plain men, of no special training in law, just ordinary men. This is not so as to an engineering question. Take that wreck of the new dynamo at the Shanghai Riverside station a few months ago. You could not form a jury of twelve ordinary men to give a decision as to the cause of that disaster. No, indeed. A jury of electric engineers might serve, but not of ordinary men, a butcher, a baker and the rest. No. A decision on that disaster depends on the possession of technical knowledge on voltage, on stresses and strains, and formulae, which you either know or do not. If you do not know the technicalities of electric engineering your judgment is not worth a cent, even if you have the moral capacity of St. Paul. But you can give a judgment on the most complicated law-case, because it has to do with moral considerations only, of which God has made everyone of us a judge, for we are essentially moral beings. Professor Vinogradoff shows, that the law always comes round to common-sense. He instances the case of great Corporations and libel. When great Companies began to be formed the law held, that "A Corporation is incapable of libel." That was atrocious. A great Company could call the directors of a rival concern a "pack of thieves," without being liable to prosecution for libel, the reason given being that a Corporation is not a person. But that soon got altered. Lord Lindley said, "it is absurd to make a statement libellous in one case, and not in another." The law came round to the moral view.

In fact, you can take these words of our Lord, which I have quoted as my text, and apply them to law, "And why even of yourselves judge ye not that which is right?" This word "judge" has says Professor Deissman, been found on old Greek letters dug up in the sands of Egypt. There has been found one letter, in which a man prays a goddess to give a right judgment on a prayer of his for revenge on an enemy.

Religion a Simple Thing.

And now you may have, by this time, guessed why I have spent so long a time on common-sense and the law. What Jesus means by these words is just this, that religion is precisely like law, not like engineering or any science depending on technicalities. Every word, that I have said about the distinction between law and sciences depending on the knowledge of technicalities is true of religion generally and of Christianity in particular. Religion deals with nothing that the ordinary decent man cannot understand. If anything requiring deep historical knowledge and severe reasoning has got into any form of Christianity, it is an interloper. Jesus required nothing but moral, and spiritual things. He did not make His appeal to scholars. He didn't require everyone, who preached Him to be University educated. Some of the biggest muffs, who preach Him hail from Universities. What he did require was, that men be ordained and possessed by the Holy Ghost, whether they preach or are preached to. He asked for simple things, that the most unlearned often possess far above the learned, faith, love to God and man, holiness, truth, love and zeal for Him. It is nice to have learning, and know the state of the world when Christ was born; it helps you; but it is not necessary, like engineering knowledge. Jesus appeals to moral and spiritual common-sense. John Bunyan had no scholarship, but he knew, his soul knew, what sin is, knew how far he was from "The celestial City," till he found the Saviour. Jesus said, we are "blessed, if we hunger and thirst after righteousness." We all know whether we have the faintest desire to be better men and women or not. Most do not want, and they know it. He said that it is better to pluck out an eye than leave sins to rule us and make no attempt to pluck them out, pride, avarice, hatred and all the rest. We can all judge that which is right. God asks nothing that is beyond our capacity to judge. Jesus sums up religion very simply, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and thy neighbour as thyself." It is useless to say, as people often do, that they "don't know what Christianity is." Nonsense. Loving God, they know whether they even try to love Him or not. It is no use for a liar or a gambler or a loose liver or a sharper or a malicious and revengeful man or woman to say they "don't know what religion is." It is cutting out those things anyhow, to begin with. They know that right enough. Religion lies in common things, that we can all have, if we want them, just as the law does. And at the present day people are apt to be misled by all the talk about education and culture. Lay preachers and Sunday School teachers are lectured for their want of learning. Let them get what they can, but faith in God, holiness, love come first. There is another thing that misleads people that is the enormous number of books to elucidate the Bible. Commentaries, archaeology, history. The ordinary man says, "My! I can never read all those." He need not. He can judge himself what is right. Jesus said, "Follow me." A man can know whether he is trying to do that or not. Every man knows, what Jesus calls "his treasure" is, that is, the thing he loves best. Is it money, fame or horses or all put together, or is it the favour and approval of God?

Beati Mundo Corde.

You can apply this to religion generally. That does not depend on scholarship. It depends on a pure heart. There is an eternal in man that responds to the eternal in God. If we seek Him, we shall find Him. No one wants a positive proof. God is not far from any of us. We can all say, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth." The manner of God's being is a mystery, but so is the manner of any other kind of being, this pulpit for instance. If I could not preach from it till I could explain how electrons become atoms, and atoms molecules, and they wood, I should never preach at all. So of God. He is accessible to all, who want Him, if we "thirst" for Him as David did. We don't need to be learned, but we do need to be sincere, not consciously sinning against Him. Light cannot get through a dirty window-pane. If the conscience is clear, we can know well enough, that an infinite and holy God is near us.

And just so as regards the main element of the Gospel of Christ. A man can judge for himself as to its truth, if he has any earnestness any real desire to be delivered form his sins. If he doesn't care a cent whether his sins are forgiven or not, or whether they remain "thick upon him" as Shakspeare says, he is hopeless, and will have to wait till, like the Prodigal, he "comes to himself," and is in a position to appreciate the Gospel.

The Wisdom of Nicodemus.

What are the main propositions of Christianity? First, that man is a son of God. He "does not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." We can judge that for ourselves. Secondly, that man has got into a very unsatisfactory condition. There is something like the "borer," that cuts and eats the roots of plants in our gardens, that has got into us. We call it sin. Man cannot flower as he should. The flesh flowers and the spirit tends to die and be "alienated from God." Any man can know that for himself. The third proposition of Christianity is, that things were so bad with man, that God himself had to take the matter in hand. What Huxley called "man's resident forces," philosophy, moral discipline, ethics had utterly failed to redeem man. The wisest men of the ancient world judged that that was so. It is being seen now. And the statement of Christianity is, that God in the infinity of his love entered humanity in his Son, in a divine person, in whom "dwelt the fulness of the Godhead." That is the rich stream of the eternal life of God flowed into the impoverished blood of man in Jesus Christ. God made an unspeakable sacrifice for us in Christ, who lived and died and rose again. It may be said, we cannot know that for ourselves. Yes, we can. God has made us subject to the law of sacrifice. And God is bound by his own law. Yes. If He made no personal sacrifice for man, then every soldier who died in the war was a loftier moral being than God, which is absurd. It would have been no sacrifice for God to have sent a million prophets. It was an unspeakable sacrifice that God came Himself, suffered and died on the cross. The essence of it is, that God took our burdens on Himself in Jesus Christ, "God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself." The next proposition of Christianity is that nothing short of a fundamental change in man's nature can save him. Small reforms are no good. That is a fact, that a man know the truth of himself. And the final proposition is, that the fundamental change a man needs comes to him when he has faith in Jesus Christ as Lord and Saviour. Faith brings him into vital relations with God through Christ. It is called being "born again," and so it is. It makes such a difference, in motive, in outlook, in everything. And a man can, if he likes, judge if that is true.

SHANGHAI TASTES IN DRESS

Why should I wear a collar
About my manly neck?
And why should cuffs, unknown to roughs,
My shapely wrists bedeck?
A collarless and cuffless state
I find more comfy far,
Why should we care for what we wear
Instead of what we are?

If people choose to think me
A low beachcomber chap,
Of course they can, but, man for man,
I do not care a rap.
I stroll the gardens in a cap
And silken 'andkerchee,
And greet each friend who would pretend
He hath no eyes to see.

Appearances have never
Concerned me in the least,
In flannels old I oft have strolled
To grace some big-wig's feast,
To think of aught but comfort here
Makes life a hollow sham.
Let people cry "There goes a guy!"
I do not care a—.

AN amusing story is told in one of the Japanese papers of the caustic remarks of one of the members of the Committee in the House of Peers which discussed the Luxury Tariff Bill. In opposing the measure and questioning the list of commodities brought together as luxuries, the member is said to have suggested that the Committee would be in a better position to decide what articles were luxuries if they removed their gold spectacles. As all the other members of the Committee except himself were wearing these articles of luxury, the shaft went home.

At greatest brilliancy on 7th; attains its ascending node on 12th; in conjunction with moon on 26th.
Rises on 1st at 2.46 a.m.;
,, 16th at 2.17 a.m.;
,, 30th at 2.8 a.m.

MARS.—An early evening star in Aquarius, reaching opposition during this month, and highly brilliant, surpassing Jupiter, but inferior to Venus.
In conjunction with moon on 16th; at point of its orbit nearest our earth on 23rd (distance 34,637,500 miles); in opposition to sun on 24th; in perihelion on 31st.
Rises on 1st at 8.33 p.m.;
,, 16th at 7.28 p.m.;

Stationary on 7th; in conjunction with moon on 10th.
Souths on 1st at 7.55 p.m.; sets at 1.6 a.m.;
,, 16th at 6.56 p.m.; sets at 0.7 a.m.;
,, 30th at 6.5 p.m.; sets at 11.18 p.m.

SATURN.—An evening star in Virgo, visible in the west for about 3 hours after sunset.
Sets on 1st at 10.45 p.m.;
,, 16th at 9.49 p.m.;
,, 30th at 8.54 p.m.

Venus at Greatest Brilliancy.

Venus, which was in inferior conjunction with the sun on July 1, and henceforth moving westwards on its orbit, will be at greatest brilliancy on the 7th. The planet is located in Gemini, and rises unusually early, about 3 hours before the sun, thus affording a rare opportunity for en-

...joying its spectacular beauty in the eastern skies. On the morning of August 26, Venus may be observed in close proximity to the moon.

Total Eclipse of the Moon.

A total eclipse of the moon takes place on the morning of the 16th, and will be visible in North China. The moon is full on that date, and sets at 6.33 a.m. The principal phases of the phenomenon are as follows—Moon enters shadow of the earth 2.31 a.m.; eclipse commences 3.30 a.m.; the middle is reached at 4.20; eclipse ends at 5.9 a.m. The magnitude of the eclipse is 1.66.

Mars in Opposition.

Mars, which is the first of the exterior planets, is a little larger than Mercury, and considerably smaller than Venus and the Earth. The planet will be in opposition to the sun on the 24th, and hence excessively bright on this occasion, its brilliancy surpassing that of Jupiter. On this date, Mars is very near our earth, the distance from us being a little over 34,000,000 miles. This is the nearest approach of the century, and hence should afford the best opportunity for the study of this neighbouring world.

Mars has a highly transparent atmosphere, and probably water and vegetation, this latter being much affected by the considerable difference between the temperatures of its northern and southern hemispheres, Newcomb admitted extreme cold and a frozen globe throughout, but this is now rejected. Heat exists in the equatorial zone, but possibly not enough to maintain life, at least in its advanced stages. In such conditions, there is little hope of receiving messages from the planet on this occasion.

The ruddy colour of Mars is largely due to its red Sahara, extending over ... of its surface, and to the peculiarities of ... atmosphere and clouds. No mountains have yet been discovered. ... the vicinity of the poles are white ..., generally considered to be "snow. ... in each hemisphere. The ... and which melt with the return ... snow-zone is now well visible ... strong telescope.

You can say goodbye to study for a life
that's quite kaTISH:
Though the lib'ral arts are thrilling and though science has its savour
There are many things in favour of the dumb-bell and the fish.

Think of whales and think of weasels and the sunlit garden weed—
Do they ponder? Do they read? Do they cogitate and cram?
Yet they all develop nicely as an East-

'Mid the buzz of busy traffic dwell the

By the laws of our crea-

With a brace of well-oiled sentiments

You dodge the mind's proclivity as

And believe me (though an I.Q. high

One can say a lot in favour of the dumb-bell and the simp.

Take a wad of economics—will it help

Mathematics—can a sinner get to

And the same applies to every other matter intellectual,
It is highly ineffectual when it comes to brassy tacks.
You can be as enterpris-

But there's no amount of wising that will ease the worldly whacks.

There were days when all were anx-

And a handful of tuition served to lift us from the mud,
But they're hardly what we modern for—

There is much too much in favour of the dumb-bell and the dud.

CYCLOPS.

UNGUMMED 3-sen and 1½-sen postage stamps, which have been the cause of so much public complaint, will disappear henceforth throughout Japan. All post offices have been instructed by the Department of Communications not to sell them any more. Post-cards will also be restored to the old size, but the sale of the new ones will not begin until those on the market are exhausted. With regard to the restoration of post-cards to the former size, the "Jiji" says, there was considerable opposition among the Communications officials, who asserted that the sum of Y.150,000 could be saved by keeping them in the present small size. Public criticism of the present form was, however, so strong that they at last yielded to the popular demand. Official ideas of economy are, of course, peculiar.

YOUNG CHINA AND THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH

BY TIMOTHY T. LEW, M.A., B.D., Ph.D.

The Christian Movement of the Protestant Churches in China is not quite a century and a quarter old. It has experienced three stages of development. We may roughly designate the first stages as the stage of prejudice and opposition. The prejudices were of two kinds, political and social. Political prejudices could be traced largely to two sources, the earlier source was that of the political failure of Roman Catholic missionaries during the reign of Young Cheng. The Roman Catholic missionaries were respected and highly honoured in the prevous reign. They commanded a great deal of confidence at Court. By a combnation of circumstances they lost the confidence and support of the Emperor. This failure gave a serious blow to the Roman Catholic work and under the power and influence of absolute monarchy even enthusiastic supporters of Roman Christianity had to yield. It practically became a prohibited faith among the literati to which it was regarded as dangerous to express allegiance. The prejudices thus created had quite a lasting influence because they became part of the background of the habit of thinking of the educated class.

A more serious political prejudice came later through the failure of the Taiping Revolution. The leaders of the Taiping Movement took on their political programme, Christian symbols and expressions. The head of the movement regarded himself as one of the sons of God and Jesus Christ his elder brother. The use of the Christian Cross and the practice of Christian prayer and service and many Christian terms together with the prominent place it gave to the Christian Bible, led the people to identify the political movement with the religious movement. The failure of the revolution condemned its sympathizers to a fate which is common to all such undertakings. Added to it, the experience of terror created by such civil wars and by the unfortunate practice of brutality of some of the Taiping followers further deepened the prejudice which was widespread among the population who had suffered. Protestant Christianity during the first period, therefore, inherited the natural effect of these two kinds of political prejudices among the people. Along with these and partly as a result of this there was social prejudice because of the fact that the faith was propagated by foreigners and that its regulations and discipline were foreign to the social customs of the people, particularly in such important questions as ancestral worship, and other rigid requirements of church life which alienated the sympathy of society toward Christians. Ignorance of things foreign due to lack of contact, superstition practiced in daily living owing to lack of scientific knowledge, social solidarity due to the family system, all helped to arouse opposition to the Christian movement and on occasions they fanned the flame of prejudice. In spite of the serious attempts, and in part very creditable work, done by some missionaries toward interpreting the Christian faith in Chinese literature, the educated class still cast looks of contempt upon Christian teaching and propaganda as beneath their attention, because they regarded them as Philistine as well as foreign.

Unfortunate International Incidents.

International relationship between China and the foreign nations from which the missionaries came had been a chapter of unpleasant Chinese history unfortunatly strewn with many unhappy incidents. These have seriously coloured the thinking and attitude of the people toward the Christian Movement. Opposition was again and again aroused against Christianity by the transactions of international diplomacy, such as the Opium War, the forced lease of various territories, and such opposition resulted more than once in the serious outcome of loss of property and life. These brought further international complications until cause and effect were almost confused in the minds of the public. Other factors in national life followed, and combination of all this opposition culminated in the Boxer trouble of 1900, for which China has suffered great humiliation. We may regard three quarters of a century as a period of opposition and prejudice, though during that period Christian work was steadily developing and growing

Since 1900 the old prejudices and opposition though still existing have been greatly abated and modified by the general awakening of the nation, and by a steady dissemination of the knowledge of the science and closer contact with foreign nations. Instead of opposition there was developed gradually an attitude of indifference. The usual courtesy of the Chinese people forbade them from treating harshly any issue that was not actually forced upon them. And their practical maxim of minding one's own business also trained them to view things in general with a calm and placid attitude. As the number of Christians grew and the work of Christian institutions showed good results the people showed a more kindly attitude toward the Christian movement as a whole. The inherent love for peace and the age-long control of instincts of pugnacity and of self-assertion encouraged most of the intelligent class who came in contact with Christianity to show the usual courtesy. But such courtesy is mere courtesy. Any expressions of appreciation and approval do not necessarily imply real conviction or acceptance. The social service and educational and medical work have shown a rapid development which paved the way for a better understanding and gradually built up confidence. The good work was recognized and appreciated. The old time opposition and prejudice was pushed into the background and gradually overcome by the results of the genuine applications of Christian principles shown in such forms of philanthropic service as the church has conducted. But with the exception of those who came in immediate contact and through a process of painstaking education in Christian teaching the public at large at its best was only indifferent.

The Renaissance Movement

But in the last six years there has been a great intellectual awakening which is a result of the last hundred years' social and political evolution. The Renaissance Movement or Hsin Wen Hua Yun Tung is the culmination of the nations search after a solution to its problems, in the modern world. It first thought that the solution should be sought in the acquisition of Western knowledge of science with which to build up naval and military power. The failure of this first search led the nation to realize the importance of a new government needed to make such power felt, and of educated men and women to use such power. Political revolution and the adoption of the new educational system marked the second state of the evolution, but for several years a vigorous attempt and only partial success led the nation to go still a step further into a revolution of thinking and to inquire into the problem of the philosophy of life. The Renaissance Movement is a movement of creating new attitudes toward all things, ancient and modern, Chinese and foreign. It is bold in the advocacy of science and democracy, bolder than any former attempts to the extent that it is fearless in its revision of judgment and revolution of values. The greatest contribution it has made and is still making to-day is the rude awakening of people from their indifference and to make every problem, social, political and religious, a burning issue. The nation is facing a new era pregnant with many possibilities, in spite of many gloomy clouds that are hovering above. This Renaissance Movement has created a new situation for Christianity as well as for other things. The ultimate result remains to be seen but one can hardly over-estimate the immediate influence. Outside of the church it has first of all aroused a new interest in the Christian Movement as a social problem. People are beginning to have a closer look at it than ever before. It took Christianity as a problem whch requires attention along with other problems, for it is bound up with many of them. People as a whole, particularly those of the younger generation who have come under the influence of the Renaissance Movement, can no longer remain indifferent toward Christianity. It "compels their attention."

In the second place, the insistence upon critical judgment and evaluation put Christianity before a public tribunal which is growing in its exacting standards and shrewd scrutiny. The good qualities of the Christian Movement and the benefits which it has brought to the nation have gained a better chance to be more widely known and justly appreciated than ever before. But at the same time whatever weaknesses the Christian Movement has and its inevitable effect on the life of the nation also come to the front and receive such criticisms and new opposition as they may deserve.

In the third place, the unqualified support which the Renaissance Movement has pledged to social democracy, industrial revolution and international justice has given Christianity the severest test of its own alleged principles, severer than any test it has come up against. The reading public is facing daily the discussions of applications of Christian principles which the church professes to preach and propagate, upon social and international problems.

The Poet's Challenge.

Such sentiment as expressed in the following verses (written by C. T. Tai published in "The Five Hundred New Poems" and translated by T. T. Lew) reflects the typical attitude of the Young China outside of the Christian Church towards Christianity and the Church. The piece is entitled Amen.

The pastor said "The pleasures of the flesh
Have little to do with the spiritual life of a man.
Go ahead and do your work
Continually being patient:
All the difficulties that come from suffering
Are decreed by the Almighty God,
Thou shalt raise no finger of protest,
It is thy duty to obey.
Wait until thy dying hour comes
Then will come the angel
To welcome thee to the heavenly abode
Amen.

Leaving the gate of the church
Enter into he workshop
Work hard for twelve hours
Sweat hard for twelve hours
Earn twenty cents in small money
Exchange for a measure of rough rice
This is the gift of God
For which I should offer my gratitude
"God! Oh God!
Such bountiful grace from thee
How can I repay back to Thee
I only hope Thou wilt allow me
To enter Thy kingdom to wait on Thee,
Amen.

One month, two months, three months;
One year, two years, three years;
Eat, yet suffer hunger
Sleep, but with fatigue
Hands and feet attacked by disease
Wet and benumbed
The passages of the lungs are filled with microbes
Where has gone that strong, stout, healthy muscle,
All that is left—a few skinny bones
"God! Oh God!
How dare I disobey Thy decree
But, look, I am full of disease
Amen."

One day without work, rice is gone.
Two days without work, clothes are gone
And then, that merciless landlord comes
To drive me out into the streets.
Such a luxurious Shanghai
I can only see many serene and beautifully built churches of God
But I fail to find a poor, even broken house of refuge
"God! Oh, God!
Speed Thy coming and take me
Into Thy heavenly kingdom to wait on Thee
Amen."

In the fourth place, the Renaissance Movement because of its insistence upon international good will and justice, compels the nation to think what is its own contribution to the world. It, therefore, is building up a new national consciousness which is against political aggressions in international relationship and naturally feels more keenly the unfortunate and difficult experiences China has suffered, in her relationship with foreign nations. Chinese people, and that everyth... ...pted by the Chinese church really has permanent value, that they are not accepting more husks than grain and that they are not receiving the casket while losing the jewel. They want to conserve all that is best, all that is genuine and therefore helpful, all that is truely Christian and therefore essential in the traditions, forms, standards of faith and practices, which the western churches have built up in the last two thousand years and which are freely offered to the Chinese Church through the missionaries. But they are positively sure that the Western statements of doctrines have been conserved because they expressed the genuine religious experiences of western Christians. They would not be valuable and real to the Chinese Christians except as the latter have had the same or similar experiences. If the experiences should vary in any detail, restatement will be necessary to that extent. Such restatement therefore does not necessarily imply in any way at all the abandonment or mutilation of the historical traditions or standards of Western Churches, but rather a thoughtful re-evaluation, a more careful examination, a better understanding and a more effective assimilation through indigenous interpretation based on vital religious experience and expressed in the terms of Chinese culture and civilization.

The desire for restatement based on real religious experience is accompanied with and followed by an insistence upon actual application of the principles of Christianity to the various phases of life. They want to take Christianity at its face value. They believe that if Christianity is really from God, and if there is really a God such as Christians profess to believe in, then they insist that the teaching of Christ must be put into actual practice. There should be no compromise nor allowance made that would minimize the all-sufficiency of Jesus Christ. Christianity to them is either a practical and workable religion or nothing. It should not lag behind any of the movements for the advance of human welfare. They do not wish to start at a point where the Western churches started, but where they have left off. They respect the experiences of the Western churches and of their heroes and saints. They are sympathetic in the interpretation and explanation of its mistakes and failures as well as enthusiastic over the records of progress and success, but they do not believe that the Chinese Church should go through the same experiences of division, strife, misunderstanding, blundering and blood-shed. In matters pertaining to faith and practice they wish to be loyal and true to the teachings of Christ as unadulterated by the later accretions.

Indigenous Religious Experience.

With vital religious experience and faithful application of true Christian principles to life, the young China in the Christian church is gradually becoming more and more inspired to creative expression. Thus far, the Chinese church has been fed with spiritual nourishment from the West. Practically everything she has is in translation. Hymns, prayers, literature of devotion and of other kinds have none of them been original. Young China believes that translations and adaptations of their best are borrowed plumes. They have their place and value in the transition stage. What is to be really effective and permanent must be original, the crystalization of their own experience. They are perfectly aware of the fact that any maiden attempts at such work will be inadequate, and that the work must be the result of a long series of experiments. Such enthusiasm in the task which they believe to be theirs, the humble experimental attitude which is the soul of the Renaissance Movement, together with such confidence in its ultimate success, characterizes the general mental make up of the young China of the Christian church to-day.

Young China in the Christian church is as thirsty after knowledge as Young China outside the Christian church. They are open-minded. They are willing to learn, they believe that various phases of God's truth cannot be antagonistic to each other. They believe in science and welcome its introduction in China. They are determined not to be ruled by theological prejudices of bygone days against such divine illumination as is well attested through nature. They will not rest until by the help of God they shatter the fetters of obscurantism in the church, sifting that which is temporary and non-essential from that which is vital and permanent, so that the latter may be given its right place and due attention. "Prove all things and hold fast that which is good" is the motto of young China.

Economic Difficulties.

Young China of the Christian church faces, however, many serious problems which involve great difficulties. Take for example, the problem of economic independence of an institution which at present employs 31,000 paid workers to carry on the work in over 16,000 centres, aiming to serve self a million members with another million inquirers; with a system of education that possesses 4 colleges and Universities, nearly 3,000 schools of lower grade with nearly 200,000 students, together with hospitals, dispensaries and other forms of social service, involving an expenditure of nearly $20,000,000 L. C. per annum, is not an easy proposition. The welding together of men and women representing 160 odd denominational and other differentiations into a working unit possessing a single purpose and animated by the lofty ambition and common aspiration which Young China represents, is no mean task. The rapid development of denominationalism through transplanting the old differences of the West into China under the cloak of efficient organization, is becoming in some aspects alarming because it is shaping the minds of many to reproduce that which is Western, before the Chinese Christians are able to determine things for themselves. How Young China can conserve all the valuable contributions which have been severally made by the various denominations and yet free the Chinese church from the obvious harmful effects which denominationalism involves; how unity can be achieved without sacrifice of convictions; how co-operation can be achieved and individual differences harmonized without resorting to force and artificial conformity; is a great problem as pressing to young China as it is to the West. The problem of not only maintaining the work which has been already established, but also its expansion so that the remaining third of the nation's territory which has not been adequately provided with centres of Christian service, can be so provided, staggers the imagination of any thoughtful person. These and other problems are confronting Young China in the Christian church. Their future will depend upon how able they are to reconcile the new and the old, the young and the aged, the educated and the less enlightened, the missionaries and the Chinese workers: how effectively they are able to bring about the adjustment of the established procedures and practices to a rapidly changing world, and how loyal they are to the principles and teachings of their Lord and Master, Jesus Christ, as revealed in the Word of God and witnessed by the work of the Spirit of God in the experience of human life throughout the history of the world.

While Young China believes in independence in thinking and action, it believes also in cooperation and graves sympathy and understanding. Of radicals and extremists there there may be a few, but they do not represent Young China as a whole. The Christians in Western lands and the foreign residents in China who share these aspirations are invited to participate in this great work—the establishment of God's Kingdom in China.

THE fall in the incidence of beri-beri in the Federated Malay States during the past 10 years has been so notable that it is thought that simple measures will suffice within a few years to abolish the disease, writes the Director of Government Laboratories in his report for 1923. Even now the recorded incidence of the disease is believed to be in excess of its real incidence. Because of its ill-defined clinical character, beri-beri is a convenient diagnosis for any condition of which weakness of the legs is a feature. Within the past year cases have been diagnosed as beri-beri which turned out to be such widely different conditions as traumatic myolitis and septicaemic plague.

A London woman who nursed wounded tribesmen is a romantic figure in the Moroccan war zone where Spaniards and Riffs are in conflict. A special correspondent writing in the "Daily Express" from Adjir says she has been in the country for some time and takes a great interest in the welfare of the tribes. She visits the Riff camp and even the most isolated outposts alone, for she is quite fearless. The tribesmen worship her, and never refer to her in other terms than the Riff equivalent for "Sister of Mercy," or "The one who is sent by Allah." Occasionally she gives them gramophone concerts which the tribesmen greatly appreciate. Her little stock of records are all English songs, and it is sometimes startling to hear an old and familiar tune in this desolate country. The tribesmen show their appreciation in a hundred-and-one little ways, running into the water waist deep to help her ashore when she returns from a rowingboat excursion, bringing her some rare and imported delicacy, or voluntarily escorting her when she goes shooting.

MAN—THE ARBITER OF HIS DESTINY

How the "Omnipotent Glands" Are Controlled by Man Himself: Problem of the Secretion of the Fluds of Life: The Human Mind—the Great Battery of thought

BY "SCRUTATOR."

One of the most important articles that the "N.-C. Daily News" has printed for some time past was that which appeared on "The Omnipotent Gland." The article dealt with the concluding portion of a lecture entitled "Man, the Arbiter of His Destiny" by Lt.-Col. F. A. F. Barnado, C.I.E., M.S., in the hall of the Asiatic Society of Bengal on June 18.

Man is fast getting to know what his glands mean to his organism. He is beginning to discover that soul and body are not distinct, that he is a soul-mind or a body-mind, and that the body and mind depend upon the chemical supply of the internal secretions. Thousands of men and women travelled to Vienna to be treated by Dr. Steinach, the famous originator of the operation for the transplanting of glands, and there appears to be no doubt that many have derived benefit in this way, regaining some of their early vigour and vitality, but—and this a statement with which few, other than those who understand the power of concentrated thought, will probably agree—whether it is actually the operation or the very powerful suggestion that it carries with it, is hard to decide.

Now, it is better to have the appendix removed than die of inflammation; it is better to draw a bad tooth than suffer torment; it is better to have a gland transplanted or the secretion of an animal put into your organism than die of decay. But it is wiser and safer to prevent the decayed tooth, the inflamed appendix, or the physical degeneration. When we pull a tooth, when we cut away an appendix, when we plant a gland, we are dealing with effects and leaving the cause to go on producing the same condition. We remove the effect and leave the cause untouched. So it has already been found that the effect of the gland operation, as cannot be otherwise, is only temporary; its effect dies away, and another operation is necessary to maintain the rejuvenation. Each time the operation is made the result is less effective, and a time comes of course when it will be quite ineffective.

Here we are dealing with the external (where the effect is) and leaving the internal (where the cause is).

Function of Ductless Glands.

The function of the endocrines is to "secrete," and the secretions are the vitae elixir. Now, there are some thinkers who say that a better word is "create," because it is obvious that the fluids the glands secrete do not exist as such until they are stimulated. Put a piece of chewing gum in your mouth, and, although the mouth is normally moist, the saliva will begin to flow freely, and will flow as long as your chew; and it is impossible that these salivary gland contain at one time all the fluids thus created. You smell ham and eggs, and if you like ham and eggs and are hungry, your "mouth will water." You hear of the death of a great friend, and particularly if you are a woman the emotion sets open the tear ducts and you weep—first the thought, then the emotion, then the tears. And you can go on crying all day long for many days. But later on you may find out that it is a false report, and have to admit that your tears were the result of the thought, not the grief. A child will cry because it thinks it has lost its geegee, but smiles again when it finds it. Intense jealousy will cause an over secretion of of the gall ducts, and jaundice result—there may be no cause for jealousy, but the thought invites the "green-eyed monster." Sometimes you get a fright and "feel sick at stomach"—due to an over-secretion of bile, caused by the thought of danger. A man gets a dry mouth (the salivary ducts refuse to function), as in stage fright. We all know also where lascivious thought leads.

So all the glands are acted upon by weal or woe by the thinker; but this power of thought is not given the attention it should be given by those who are engaged in the chemical discoveries.

Does it not appear reasonable to assume that if intense jealousy will open the gall ducts and flood the blood with poison, from which one may never recover, that the opposite thought and emotion will have the opposite effect? If the fear thought will cause an excess flow of bile, surely the fearless thought, the thought of being bold, dauntless and brave will have an opposite effect and lead a man on to nobler action. The point I am endeavouring to make is that man is Mind; everything that he is, is directed by his thought, whether he knows it or not, and that the practice of intense thought—the learning of the art of living—will render his physical organism whatever he wishes it to be, and that in the human mind (the most marvellous battery and the most marvellous chemist in the world) resides the power to create and control the fluids of our omnipotent glands.

How are the Glands Controlled?

This subject is somewhat too technical for the public press, but I am one of those who believe that it requires only for a man to know that he has within his mind the power actually to become the arbiter of his fate to induce him to begin to discover how he can get at this power. Everybody knows that the theory of the atom is now the theory of the electron, electronic energy, and that the smaller ion is also electronic energy, and that all matter is electronic energy—crystallized, solidified, massed. In man's thought in the self of him—there resides the power which holds together the particles of his body intact, in spite of the fact that every part of him changes in the course of a twelve-month or so. When you think of it, it is perfectly clear that the blood that you had last week does not exist in you to—day as it did then, and that very little of the physical substance of you existed three months ago—the eternal mystery of our "selves."

We are all ready to admit that the stream of life is positive, that creation is positive—hence constructive. The stream of life, it may be said, is created by our glands. When they become sluggish, weak, they are incapable of carrying on their work of maintenance and repair; degeneration then sets in. In this condition they may be stimulated by an operation, as we have seen, or by light waves, purple rays, X rays, rays emanating from radium and other radioactive elements. The process is that of ionization.

Even in the radiation of light waves we are depending upon external remedy, which is actually another method of medication; in this case the medicine is radiant energy. You take radiant energy when you take potash or brimstone.

Glimpse into the Future.

There is a better way, a safe way, and a way which need never fail of ionizing our bodies through our glands. All the endocrines may be stimulated (ionized) by our thought. We cannot touch the pineal gland with the knife, but can with our thought. We cannot get at the gyrus fornicatus with an instrument, but we can in concentration. We cannot operate the spleen with safety, but we can in meditation.

Without doubt science is on the threshold of its discovery of what Man really is. What we every-day men of affairs are after is to ascertain what we are and how we are to think and consciously act to develop the highest capacities of ourselves. There are others who glimpse the possibility of man living indefinitely, and being able to learn how to do it. There are others who claim that a knowledge of what man is will provide a vision for the transformation of this world by a universal system of re-education. Most men do not know anything about themselves, anatomically, chemically, psychically or otherwise. But when a man knows that he is biologically young, and never should be old, when he knows that he produces in himself only that which exists in his consciousness, and that he has the power to develop a new consciousness, when he knows that his emotions are playing upon his marvellous human instrument every moment that he lives, and that he can, through the power of thought, play upon that instrument whatever tune he desires . . . and a thousand other things then he begins to think, and decides to learn the Art of Living. There is a man in Victoria, B.C., at the present moment (whose name would be willingly given to anyone who would be genuinely interested) who has so mastered this knowledge that if it were possible for him to place the result of his long years of learning and practice within the reach of all in Shanghai, we should find that the city would indeed rapidly develop, because it could not do otherwise, into really Model Settlement.

Man is on the very threshold of the greatest scientific discovery of all time—the Discovery of Man's Self.

ANOTHER PORTENT OF EMPIRE

A Heavenly Fish That Becomes a Dragon: Gods Angry Until the Emperor Returns

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

That the "Gods" are angry with the present government in China is proven to the older Chinese by the devastating floods and famine which is throughout the land, especially where the military powers are so corrupt that the people are in a state of practical bondage.

Just before the rains this year the Chinese report that they saw a large fish, the kind that Chinese legend says changes into a dragon when it can enter the Dragon gates of Heaven, swimming in the sky through the rain. Two Shanghai Chinese, both well educated, aver that they saw it very clearly, they could see the fins, the large eyes and even the scales very clearly as it swam with that peculiar motion of fish in water, the waving of the tail and the fins looking beautiful against the dark and lowering clouds. Asked what this meant the Chinese stated:

"This fish," when it passes the Dragon gates of Heaven, then becomes a Dragon. On its way to Heaven it must have water so it creates rains and storms and when the rains become heavy enough it swims from the sea through the rain to the sky. The fish as we saw it was headed north east toward the northern mountains. The only reason of its appearance now is that the Gods are angry and as long as the people neglect the Gods then this fish before it can enter the gates of Heaven must punish the people by floods and famine in the land.

"Our Emperor was the Son of Heaven whose forefathers were of the Heavenly Dragon and while he has been expelled from the Throne of the Celestial Country, still the Gods were not so angry as to cause a great deal of trouble. But now that he contemplates leaving his country the Gods will create such conditions on the people that he will be compelled again to ascend the throne and when this is so, then peace and prosperity will again return to the land.

"How can the people commune with their Gods when the Son of the Gods has no power over the people? This fish will not be permitted again to return to the ocean and will not be enabled to enter the gates of Heaven and become a Dragon until his work on earth is finished; and as long as that work is unfinished he must have water in which to live and that means rains and storms. So we Chinese who know the history of the heavenly Powers are looking for the day when our Emperor will again sit on the Celestial Throne."

The Chinese who told this tale is an educated man and really believes that he saw this fish and no ridicule can dissuade him. He declares that the same has been seen in various parts of China and that is the reason that most of the people to-day are watching very patiently for signs that will foretell the coming of the Emperor to the Throne of China. These Chinese can then commune with their Gods and the Son of the Gods will intervene for them.

THE well-known astronomer Professor Todd of Philadelphia has predicted that New York will be completely destroyed by an earthquake similar to the Japanese catastrophe of last year. His prediction appears in the London Press, according to a Berlin telegram of July 16.

BOOK NOTES AND NEWS

The appearance of an additional six volumes of the charming Tusitala Edition (William Heinemann, Ld.) of the works of R. L. Stevenson, includes an interesting volume of fragments. Stevenson, we are told, had never appeared so well as during the months preceding his death; there was about him a strange serenity and a curious detachment from the past which enabled him to judge himself and his work with almost scientific disinterestedness. Here is a curiously candid piece of self-criticism uttered in conversation.

"I am not a man of any unusual talent, Lloyd; I started out with very moderate abilities; my success has been due to my really remarkable industry—to developing what I had in me to the extreme limit. When a man begins to sharpen one faculty, and keeps on sharpening it with tireless perseverance, he can achieve wonders. Everybody knows it; it's a commonplace; and yet how rare it is to find anybody doing it—I mean to the uttermost as I did. What genius I had was for work!"

There are no dull pages in "Rust of Murder," by Jermyn March (Hurst and Blackett, 7s. 6d.). It is as closely packed with exciting incidents as a Lyceum drama, and as full of mystery as a Ruritanian romance. Country-house life is vividly portrayed, and there is capital golf dialogue; the story, however, is complicated and not very convincing.

Literary Paris is still chuckling over the amazing hoax played on one of the officials of the Comédie Française by a M. Bourgeois. More or less embroidered narratives of the affair have been published, but what actually happened, according to the brief and sober narrative of M. Pierre Brisson, the dramatic critic of the "Temps," was this. M. Bougeois submitted to the Comédie Française a piece entitled "Agéslas" as his own work; it is, in fact, one of the seldom performed and less known plays of Corneille. One of the experts whose special business it is to read new plays for the great French national theatre considered "Agéslas," and returned it to M. Bourgeois, its supposed author, with the intimation that it was not up to the standard of the Comédie Française. M. Bourgeois lost no time in communicating the success of his joke to the press; and now the victimised official is demanding that the author of the trick shall be prosecuted.

Apparently none of the obituary notices of Sir Mortimer Durand included any mention of an incident he related some years ago in an address to the Society of Arts. It seems that when he was Minister at Teheran the Omar Khayyám Society induced him to ask the Shah to give orders that Omar's tomb at Nishapur should be restored. Nasir-ed-Din "leant back in his big chair and laughed loudly" on hearing the request. "Do you mean to tell me," said he, "that there is a society in London named after Omar Khayyám? Why, he has been dead a thousand years!" "That is all the more reason," pleaded Sir Mortimer, "for doing honour to his memory." This opinion was not shared by Nasir-ed-Din. He declared emphatically that he would not order the tomb to be restored. "We possess many better poets than Omar Khayyám, Indeed, I myself ——," and then he stopped.

Mr. Howel Evans, one supposes, invented "The Murder Club" (Jarrolds, 7s. 6d. net) to give unity to a long series of mysteries and to bring quickness into narration. The machinery adequately serves its purpose: the excitements are fast and furious, and are helped out by these Secret Service agents, disguised as tradesmen and journalists, practising detection with profit. (Mr. Evans, at least, believes in the co-operation of Press and police.) But is this rapidity all gain? Most readers delight in chewing the cud of sensation.

The fanatical Rajah of Kohajulia, coming under a strange obligation to Major Hugh Garfield, makes the Englishman's honour his own, and when Vivienne, Hugh's wife, would elope with Oldham, captures her, conveys her to his palace, and in due time carries out the native punishment for an adultress by having her trampled to death by elephants. That, briefly, is the story that is quite legitimate. Her Premer, 7s. 6d. net), which Miss Pearl Weymouth chooses to tell with an emphasis on the effect of horror that is quite legitimate. Her Preface anticipating criticism on the score of its incredibility is beside the mark, and injudicious.

A new book on Cancer: "How it is caused and how it can be prevented" by Mr. Ellis Barker, is to be published by Mr. John Murray at the end of this month. The author is not a medical man; hitherto his chief claim to recognition has been through his able volumes on Economics and International Politics, but, as he explains in his Preface, the subject of cancer has long interested him. He thinks that the cause of cancer might possibly be found in a direction which has been somewhat overlooked. The book has the support of Sir Arbuthnot Lane, Bart., and other eminent medical men, but it is addressed principally to the general public.

A FRENCH VIEW OF CHINA

Since the time when Napoleon Bonaparte made his famous declaration that when China awoke she would astonish the world, the French have furnished a succession of able interpreters of things Chinese. M. Hovelaque fills a worthy place in this series and his book "China" is interesting, not only because of its interpretation of China, but because it throws light on the attitude of France.

The most striking characteristic of the book is its style. It is clever with no attempt to conceal its cleverness, but it leaves the reader grateful for innumerable carefully elaborated verdicts. Dealing with the Summer Palace at Peking, for instance, M. Hovelaque writes: "The general effect is as gay and sumptuous as a piece of porcelain, vigorous, fresh and precious in hue like old cloisonnè"—a brilliant piece of description, clever and terse in its use of words, and revealing much of the elusive beauty of the Summer palace and of Chinese art.

The book opens with some 80 pages of description on this high and suggestive level. Then some interpretation is attempted of the civilization, religion and art of China. With a basis thus securely laid, the history and present political situation of China are rapidly sketched. Finally, M. Hovelaque returns to his general view of China, which he has outlined in his introduction.

"East is East and West is West" we are often told to-day. M. Hovelaque has very suggestive material on this topic. While recognizing the fundamental human characteristics, hè yet paints the difference of Orient and Occident in vivid and unforgettable phrases.

"To the European everything in these lands is astonishing and perplexing. This world is indeed another world, so remote from ours, subject to unknown influences so numerous, so all-pervading, so completely alien, that we find it hard to believe it real, and finally despair of ever being able to guess its baffling secret.

"And in truth the secret remains impenetrable to us. The essence of these civilizations, the mystery of the life of these countries is hidden from us; familiarity only reveals more clearly the irreducible differences. The opinion of those who have lived longest in the Far East is unanimous on this point, and study only confirms it. This world . . . . will never be as completely understood by us as Greece, Rome, Judea, Persia, even India. We must resign ourselves to ignorance and admit that all the ideals we can form about these countries are only a fiction of the mind."

This position is one which Friends will not readily accept, but we ought to be familiar with it and have reasons for a different position.

Another topic which will arrest the attention of Friends is the writer's view of Chinese mysticism, illustrated as it is by a most illuminating comparison with the attitude of Wordsworth. While we need not accept his conclusions in detail, his suggestive treatment of the theme leaves us with quickened interest and appreciation and more understanding sympathy.

The sketch of Chinese history and the present political situation is, like the rest of the book, arresting and suggestive. M. Hovelaque is a careful observer, though he appears not to have penetrated into any of the more remote parts of China. There is a statement about the prevalence of literacy on page 43—"every Chinese can read and write"—which will leave those who know China aghast, but with this solitary exception the book seems accurate. It is a book to read and possess, not as a compendium of historical or other facts, but as a continually challenging interpretation.

A BOJER NOVEL

"The Prisoner Who Sang." By Johan Bojer. (Hodder and Stoughton. 7s. 6d).

"Growth of the Soil" stands out as triumphantly the work of a genius The present book hardly impresses the critic as that; but it is original, distinctive; it has humour and a soul. The almost farcical plot has an under-current of wistfulness and secret shame; and the end has real beauty.

The tale is of a peasant lad to whom monotony is death. He has an almost incredible gift of successful impersonation, which he quickly discovers. As he grows up, he uses this in fraud after entertaining fraud. Prosperity never long remains with him, for it is the daring effort, not the established result, that is his passion. When real love catches and flings him by the heels in the middle of this amusing but highly disreputable career, we fancy that his last impersonation has been made; but even love has no chance, at the first, against his temperament.

It is a dramatic, sometimes seriocomic study of a man in whom impatience and audacity conquer all the usual human inhibitions. It is told with the naiveté and detachment of the original, and Mrs. Sara Weedon has done her work to admiration; but genius? We can only say. "That is a mighty word."

THAT EVERLASTING NEAR EAST

By Henry W. Nevinson.

"Victors and Vanquished." By C. B. Thomson. (Cape.) 4s. 6d. net.

General C. B. Thomson has now become Lord Thomson, Secretary of State for the Air Force, but the articles of which this small book is composed were written before the present Government came into power, and so have no official authority. The writer has been all the more free to express his own independent judgment, and the judgment is singularly shrewd. The sub-title is "The New Balance of Power in Central and South-Eastern Europe," and that fairly denotes the design and limits. Each chapter is a summary of the author's conclusions about one or other of the Balkan and South-Eastern States—Bulgaria (with Macedonia), Jugo-Slavia, Roumania, Hungary, and the Danube, with an extra chapter added upon the present condition of Germany, or what that condition was last Christmas.

Lord Thomson writes with unusual personal knowledge. He is familiar with the countries mentioned, and in Roumania he was stationed as Military Attaché during the war. That perhaps accounts for his hopeful and favourable estimate of the Roumanians. As the writer says, "Greater Roumania is a modern miracle." It cannot be said that she did well in the war. She came to the verge of utter ruin, and she dragged others down with her. Yet so far as size goes, no nation gained so much profit, unless indeed the creation of the ramshackle State of Jugo-Slavia can be called a profit to Serbia. In spite of her appalling failure on the field, Roumania issued from the Treaties with a population increased by more than double, and with vast increases of territory, both east and west.

For the Serbs also Lord Thomson displays more admiration than I have ever felt. He favours them chiefly for the real prowess of the peasants during the war, but he is not blind to their savagery, their backward civilization, and the extreme difficulty of their position as would be dominant leaders in a collection of new States with which they have very little in common, except perhaps fear of Italy.

Macedonia, with its Bulgar population, is part of the same Jugo-Slavian problem, and Lord Thomson clearly sees that, so long as Macedonia is left in the subjection to which the ignorance of politicians at Versailles condemned it, there can be no assured peace in the Balkans, and unless the Balkans are at peace, Europe remains perpetually in danger. To the Bulgarians in their own country Lord Thomson is entirely just. He thinks of them as I have always thought since I accompanied their armies in the Balkan War of 12 years ago. He speaks of them as "this race of frugal, reserved, industrious, unsentimental and efficient peasants." I have often called them the Scots of the Balkans, and have never doubted that, whatever happens, even in spite of the mistakes committed by the Fox or Elephant Ferdinand, their former king, they will come out top. But if there is to be peace, two claims must be settled—the claim of Macedonia to independence or at least to federation, and the claim of Bulgaria to a genuine exit to the Ægean Sea, free from the interference of Greece. If the Powers have not statesmanship enough to settle these claims, Bulgaria will never be content till she has settled them for herself, and heaven knows in what her attempt might end.

But over the whole of the Near East, as over the rest of Europe, hangs the ominious shadow of France, and Lord Thomson shows that, in the Vain hope of maintaining her own security by the ruin and encirclement of Germany, France is steadily promoting that terrible "next war," which all dread and all are beginning to regard as "inevitable." The danger has been lately increased.—(The "Weekly Westminster.")

SELECT SOCIETY

Memories and Friends. By A. C. Benson. London: John Murray Pp. xiv. 338. 16s. net.

Mr. A. C. Benson has, of course, been during most of his life in a fortunate position for meeting a number of interesting people. Of these he has already written from time to time in various books. In the present volume he has chosen to deal with 18 figures, most of whom, as Mr. Benson says in his preface, "left no deep mark upon the world"—people whom he himself knew intimately, in whose often deliberately-limited circle he was persona grata. There are other figures also, of course. Henry James and Ruskin are in the list with Sir Cecil Spring-Rice, Mrs. Oliphant, Dr. Warre, and other names more exclusively Etonian. But on the whole the effect of the book on an average reader is a little curious. He is introduced to a number of small cliques and clientèles, all of them delightful and highly cultured, to which he would probably not have been actually admitted in the flesh, and the atmosphere he is invited to breathe seems sometimes, in consequence, rather more stagnant than merely calm. It is perhaps natural that Mr. Benson should seem most happy, affectionate, and at ease when living over again the hours spent in the society of those whose intimacy meant most to him; and even in dealing with those larger figures before mentioned he most explicitly refuses to do more than state his own impressions—not a rounded, complete figure of a man, but his figure just as Mr. Benson saw it. Thus the book is very largely about its author, and there are few readers nowadays who do not know what a delightful maker of books Mr. Benson is. They will not be disappointed in this volume. Mr. Benson's recollections are as vivid as ever, his impressions as detailed, and old Etonians especially will read these records gladly.

Perhaps the most interesting impression for the general reader will be the one contained in the closing pages on Rupert Brooke—a chapter which especially shows how Mr. Benson can mingle sound judgment with true appreciation.—"Manchester Guardian."

OLD NEW YORK

False Dawn (The Forties); The Old Maid (The Fifties); The Spark (The Sixties); New Year's Day (The Seventies). By Edith Wharton. Appleton and Co. 4s. 6d. each.

The English reader of these four little volumes could wish himself a New Yorker, so that he might relish all their nuances. There must be so much, he knows, that he will miss among their associations and implications. Each book relates a specific incident typical and illuminative of New York at a particular period of its social development. Each of them is a story, and its teller is Mrs. Wharton; that is to say, their impersonal artistry is secure and what was meant for delight has not been sacrificed to instruction. Still, as seems to be confirmed by their particular format, the historian as well as the novelist is at work in them, and intrigues us by the fact within their fiction. They are fashioned to be so many mirrors to America at so many stages of its evolution—and America, Dean Inge has been telling us, is now the most interesting country in the world. It is the fine shades of the reflections that may hold most significance.

The earliest is "The False Dawn," with its setting of Tuscan villa and weeping beech, overlooking the Sound, the décor of ruffled sarsenet and Pont de Paris, Lowestoft ware and waffles, echoes of Benedict Arnold mingling with those of Edgar Allan Poe, relics of the proud little Colonial society, cherishing cousinship with a "Signer," and vanishing like a pinch of dust when they disappeared from their pews and their dinner-tables. One of these, a forgotten Halston Raycie, eager to found a family with the ritual of the English "landed" tradition, sends Lewis his son on the Grand Tour, placing a credit to his name in Europe so that he may bring back with him an Old Master or two—Raphael beyond aspiration, alas! (though Cousin Huzzard contrived to pick up one), but a Carlo Dolce, certainly, a Guido Reni, a Sassoferrato. . . . But Lewis, falling to the glamour of a young Englishman in the face of Mont Blanc, collects only the Italian Primitives; returns with no Lo Spagnoletto, no Guillo Romano, but only Carpatchers (so the father, who confounds Angelico with Kauffmann, and cuts off the wretched son with the pictures gathered by the inspiration of this upsetting John Ruskin he had met in his travels—"father, a respected wine-merchant in London?" say you. "Retail?—Faugh!") Mrs. Wharton's irony over this Gallery of Christian Art, exposed and neglected behind Consin Ebenezer's intensely private front-door in the Forties, is like to get smothered in the guffaw of its rescue half a century later—five millions' worth—just as elderly Miss Netta Cosby, who inherited them in the attic, had started out to clean Piero della Francescas and the rest with a pail of hot water and soapsuds!

Similar in method (incident illuminating its social surround and reflecting it), and typical Mrs. Wharton tales, are the two of the Fifties and Seventies; but more significant still seems to us that which reveals the source of the latent fire in Hayley Delane of the Nineties. Only then Hayley learned the identity of the old backwoodsman, who struck out "the Spark" in the Sixties, in hospital after Bull's Run, and his literary fame meant nothing to him, though the man himself was everything.

"Yes; that's it. Old Walt—that was what all the fellows used to call him. He was a great chap; I'll never forget him. I rather wish, though," Delane added, in his mildest tone of reproach, "you hadn't told me that he wrote all that rubbish."

In the just published "Remembered Yesterdays," by Robert Underwood Johnson, one reads the opinion of Dr. Holland, Editor of the Century, in the Eighties, when he wrote to Richard Gilder that "you might strike out of existence all Whitman had written and the world would not be consciously poorer." That letter gives us a measure for the fact in fiction of these stories; American social history is displayed in them with the fine technical art, the saltness, the wide-eyed, cool outlook of the best of living American novelists.—"Morning Post."

TO-DAY'S MOMENTOUS DICTUMS

The Laws of the Modes and Parisians

By Elizabeth Pepys.

The really great things of life are too often ignored. A saddening reflexion that, but can you deny it? During the summer's heat when it is considerable of a concession to the conventions to wear any clothes at all, one's interest in the latest style wrinkle pales before besides the question, Is it cool?

...ever and anon our higher ...ture, or what is the same thing, ...e eternal feminine, resident in ...th men and women, leads us on ...contemplation of the essentially ...rect in clothing. It is no doubt ...alutary, yet at times a painful ...cupation. Unless we have the high moral ...nvictions of "Sartor Resartus" ...ything which satisfies the ...ardians of the public morals is ...ely to be good enough for us.

Tempering the Style.

...Even the Bazar itself could not ...pect Shanghai leaders of fashion ...wear tailored suit before luncheon so we pass by the first law, and ...d no difficulty in keeping the ...ond: "Don't wear a small fur ...kpiece." The third is harder: ...ver carry a stick." No reasons ...e given. "Don't wear, even for ...e evening, footwear built on the ...ndal last. The shoe cut down to ...a sole is obsolete." "Don't carry ...bag, especially one on a chain, ...d most especially one of brocade." ...will be hard to keep Shanghai ...ople from this breach of etiquette, ...though the preferred envelope ...rse is often seen on our streets.

FEATHERS ARE VERY MUCH THE VOGUE.

..."Don't wear white kid gloves." ...fear. "Don't wear unusual ...des of stockings." Well—what ...unusual? "Never wear a black ...cking; almost never, grey," which ...minds us of the Shanghai woman ...o said the other day that one ...uld tell when a woman was in ...rning because she wore black ...ckings. The Costume Creed.

The Editors of the Bazar believe ...: The continued simplicity of ...ess; the tailored mode; the ...Costume Complete" the three-piece ...stume suit; the continuance of the ...raight silhouette and the short, ...ght skirt; no sleeves at all or tight ...es; refinement of detail; the ...irectoire note, but only casually ...troduced, the merest touch will ...arf; gay colours.

One might think when one has ...astered one's catechism on the ...bove that all which remained would ...e to follow it diligently; but there ...Higher Criticism in the canons ...Fashion as well as in other re...gions. While Vogue, which also ...tudies the style whims of London ...aris, and New York, agrees for the ...ain part in what has been said ...here are a few points on which it ...akes issue. One of these is the important subject of hosiery. Vogue, perhaps more attentive to turns of the popular weather-vane, notes that sheer black stockings may be worn with a black satin suit, although it admits that this is a sudden reappearance, and hints that it needed some one like the danseuse Leonora Hughes to carry it off successfully. Moreover, "Vogue" also sponsors the use of deep mandarine or blood-orange hose with black clothes. Which colour will you stake your money upon, ladies?

One of the points upon which both journals agree is the fact that skirts are much shorter, and, since bodices are very low necked, there really isn't very much to the popular evening gown, whose transparent skirts are slashed into the fashionable decoupage to give the fluttering, airy effect so much desired.

Brown seems to be admitted as the coming hue for the autumn, with perhaps an interlude of grey. The three-quarter length coat for tailored suits or extra wrap is rapidly merging into the seven-eights length. The Paquin, slightly fitted coat with the circular swing, trimmed with chinchilla, ermine or leopard is also bound to create a sensation. But ostrich feathers are ubiquitous. They even serve as collars for the inevitable mink coat of Paris, they trim dancing gowns, clipped or pleureuse, they make new fans in uncurled lengths so voluminous as to hide the tortoiseshell mount and almost trail upon the floor.

Sunburn is Necessary.

No less an authority than Baron de Meyer insists that rose-and-lily complexions are nothing to sigh for. Rather should one devote one's endeavours to sunburning aesthetically, by wearing low-cut bathing suits, so there will be no ugly line of demarcation twixt the tan and the white. Even the straps to bathing suits should be moved, or at times slipped from the shoulder to avoid the light marking. To achieve the dashing, smooth copper tint of the young sportswoman the face and exposed part of the body should be rubbed with cocoanut oil. If this is too much trouble the assistance of ultra violet rays may be invoked and of course there are plenty of cosmetics to simulate the healthy, outdoor bronze.

Even table linen is sharing the popular sunburnt craze. We have heard rumours of the passing of the snowy cloth, but now our worst fears are realized and ochre linen is reported from Paris to be the only chic thing. For luncheon blue, rose or yellow is used and polished wood, with a centrepiece of fruit or flowers is good form. Lace insertions are lavishly used and napkins are plaited and pressed, the plaits about an inch wide and then folded once on the plate. Of course this new fad leads the way to all manner of unusual and artistic colour schemes in cobmination with black Wedgwood and coloured procelains but it seems like a shortlived fad which may pass away without influencing the outside world to any extent. Let us hope so, for the thought of discarding all one's carefully assembled linens, or even retiring them for a time, is not a cheering thought to contemplate.

THE SEVEN-EIGHTHS LENGTH IS CONFIDENTLY EXPECTED IN COATS.

SUMMER VALUES

O, who can hold a fire in his hand
By thinking on the frosty Caucasus?
Or cloy the hungry edge of appetite
By bare imagination of a feast?
Or wallow naked in December snow
By thinking on fantastic summer's heat?-Shakespeare.

By Elizabeth Pepys.

Our artificial standards are often smartly set to rights by that little touch of nature which makes the whole world squirm. For example, I will boldly state that should the hot weather of the past week continue or augment itself, Sartor Resartus himself, who now says he would rather go about in a state of humidity than break one little rule of good form, would be smashing whole pages of "Rules for the Correctly Dressed Man." Coolness, not collars; comfort, not style; health, not elegance are the goals the world is seeking whether coolie or taipan.

Summer is more democratic than Winter. for in the heated term, although we may spend much money trying to keep cool, nevertheless the simplest and most efficacious device is to discard clothing. Anybody can do that, although in winter we may not all be able to buy fur coats and tons upon tons of coal. Elimination is the keynote to summer happiness. Less to wear, to eat, to drink, to work at, to play at. A bathtub full of cold water and a good book is really more diverting than the most elaborate of dinners which demands a rigid toilette.

A Closed Season for Entertaining.

And speaking of entertainments, we have heard rumours of a distinctly anti-social nature. Anti-amusement, that is. It seems that anarchistic natures have frankly admitted the boredom of being entertained in the summer. They say there is only one thing worse than being the guest at a hot-weather function and that is being the host or hostess. Further they say that an invitation extended under the stimulation of the cooling breezes on the Carlton Roof ought not to be insisted upon in the heat of the morning afterward, any more than a proposal in the moonlight should be seriously considered at tiffin the next day.

They talk, these young iconoclasts, about forming an association, called the Summer Solacers, or something of the sort, with a bathing suit for a costume and a pledge neither to accept nor extend a single invitation during the heated months. They will not be hermits or recluse nuns, but they will dance when they want to, for as long or as short a time as they desire, from a genuine joie de vivre, and not because of the prickings of a super-sensitive social conscience.

The Nature Life.

They will take time for sports, since in the long run they make for summer—health and sanity, they will get out into the country and if possible into the water, they wil use some of their leisure in getting acquainted with birds and flowers and in cultivating an inward serenity which can disregard the mounting thermometer. A closer companionship with leaves of grass and wayside flowers will do more towards constructive thinking than dozens of clever, controversial lectures.

What is the sense of this mad pursuit of the elusive Tael in search of a large income, which only involves larger responsibilities? What is man, any way? Why should he be so puffed up over being around six feet tall and living for seventy more or less stupid years? Why not, together with Humbert Wolfe, derive a suitable humility from the flowers in Kensington Gardens, saying with regard to the superior mortal in his own modern versifying:

"Rather let me to him propose the flushed example of the rose,

who, with her dazzling
inch of scent,
a summer's day weighs imminent

upon the spirit entranced, and goes more rich with that than he with those."

THE BLACK SHEEP OF THE NURSERY

Almost every nursery has its particular black sheep. A doll, a gollywog, or an animal of some kind is chosen for the part, and once given its bad name it is forever hanged! Naughtiness of all kind is ascribed to it. It is greedy, disobedient, faithless, bullying, and absurd; its moments of grace are few and far between.

The old notion of giving Virtue and Vice a concrete personality seems to survive in nurserydom, and bit by bit the force of association becomes so strong that the owner of "Naughty Tommy" cannot separate him, even in imagination, from his wrongdoings.

Give a Penguin a Bad Name!

In one delightful nursery there were two penguins. The larger and presumably the elder, Joey by name, was a model of propriety.

NOTE THE SCARF AND LONG TUNIC.

He answered politely, he moved quietly, and he spoke gently. Any child might have been proud to claim him as her possession. But the younger, Penny, was a prodigal indeed!

It was not in him to be pleasant and polite. His long, straw-stuffed, yellow beak was poked into everyone's business. He pecked, he squeaked, he spoke high and shrilly, and he invariably ended his day in the corner, while Joey the virtuous reposed all night in his master's cot.

And the children simply could not separate the respective characters from those two birds. If Nurse attempted to make Joey naughty Penny's mistress at once retorted, "You know Joey is always good: it is nonsense to pretend that he is disobedient." Similarly any proposed reformation of Penny was ruthlessly crushed by both children with the scathing observation "Fancy Penny being good!"

Possibly the explanation of the nursery black sheep lies in the fact that we all like to make a scapegoat of some one or other. We like to feel that we can direct and govern some one less exalted than ourselves; it gives us a pleasant sense of superiority.

The Human Touch.

Then, too, children are crude in their tastes and their sense of humour is undeveloped. With all their love of change they adore familiarity as well. It saves the troubles of further invention if one character is persistently good and the other consistently naughty. The children know whom to praise and whom to blame without further speculation. The dramatis personæ are, so to speak, ready cast for the parts, so discussion can be dispensed with.

And the human touch in these matters is clearly evident, for however mischievous, troublesome, and renegade he may be, the children invariably have a warm corner in their hearts for the most incorrigible and defiant of the nursery black sheep.—Enid Leale in "Glasgow Herald."

RECIPES FROM "POTLUCK"

Pillau (Cheshire)

Spread a small baking-dish all over with rashers of bacon; stick an onion with a dozen cloves; cut a fowl in pieces, and rub it well with pepper and salt; put the onion in the middle of the dish, and place the fowl over it. Have some rice boiled tender to fill the dish. Fill up with gravy. Cover with a water and flour paste; bake about an hour; take off the crust, and garnish with hard-boiled eggs cut in quarters, and sliced onions.

Boiled Lettuces (Middlesex).

Wash and put them into boiling water, with a little salt, let them boil it 30 minutes, and drain it. colander, and chop them up; then put them into a saucepan with some fresh butter, a spoonful of flour, a little nutmeg, salt, and the juice of a lemon; let the whole boil for a quarter of an hour. This may be varied by omitting the lemon juice, adding some good cream, and thickening with the yolks of two eggs. (This is an excellent plan where lettuces are "bolted" and unsuitable for serving cold. Ed.)

Macaroni Cheese (Boiled) (Isle of Wight).

Half a pound of tomatoes, one tablespoonful curry powder, a quarter of a pound of macaroni, two ounces butter, salt and pepper, two ounces grated cheese. Put the macaroni into salted boiling water, boil it 30 minutes, and drain it. Scald the tomatoes, peel and slice them. Put the butter in a saucepan to melt, add sliced tomatoes, and macaroni, stir well together, add pinch of salt and curry powder. Lastly, with two forks, stir in the grated cheese for five minutes, then serve.

Scones (Hertfordshire).

SHANGHAI MOTHER GOOSE

Sartor Resartus

There was a young man
And what do you suppose?
He dressed himself daily
In nothing but clothes.

But the ties that he wore
Were foulards, you may note:
And in spite of the heat
He wore collar and coat.

Riding Roads

Green Bonnet went to town
Upon a little pony.
He had to walk his horse except
On Avenue Foch only.

"Alas, Play Fair," he sadly said,
"When this dispute is settled,
I greatly fear that it will be
The road, not horse, that's metalled."

Elizabeth Pepys.

THE GOLDEN BIRD

If Joy, the Golden Bird, would fly,
Do not close a hand upon her;
She belongeth to the sky,
With all the winds of heaven on her:
Only when her wings are free
Bird of Lovely Life is she.

He who Joy of Life would store
Heart of his be widely open;
Throw the key out with the door,
Throw the hope out with the hopen;
Give her, as she finds in sky,
Place to dip and soar and fly.

She will come again, I wist;
She of thee shall not be frighted;
She shall sing upon thy fist;
By her shall thy dark be lighted;
By her freedom thou art given
Right and room in joycus heaven.

James Stephens.

NOTABLE KUOMINTANG MANIFESTO

Strong Recommendation from Canton Headquarters to Shanghai Branch to Avoid Trouble and Retaliation on Council

Shanghai, Aug. 3.

The following translation of an order issued by the Central Executive Committee of the Kuomintang to its members at Shanghai has been received from Reuter's correspondent at Canton:—

A report has been received from the Shanghai members of the Kuomintang that the letter dated June 20 of the Chairman of the Municipal Council of the International Settlement of Shanghai, in reply to the Senior Consul, indicates an intention on the part of the Council, at the instigation of the illegal Government of Peking, to take action detrimental to the Party. Local members, being highly incensed thereby, have submitted proposals that the Kuomintang rescind its standing orders prohibiting anti-foreignism and refrain from interfering with the activities, as in the days before the Boxer rising, of the secret societies, the Green and Red sections of the Kolao Hui. Other members advocate the encouragement of a general strike in the Foreign Settlement.

The Kuomintang declines to entertain such reactionary proposals and the following order is hereby issued:—

It is the duty of this Party to make China a really independent and sovereign State on the basis of the Party's Three Principles. It regards all narrow and violent anti-foreign sentiments as harmful to society and the world at large and detrimental to the complete independence and equality of the Chinese State and race. For this reason the Party has always strongly exerted itself in suppressing such tendencies.

Special Care for Foreigners.

In 1900 while the Manchu Empress Dowager and nobility were encouraging the Boxers in their insane movement to "uphold the Manchu and destroy the foreigner," the same year the Kuomintang, which had started a revolution at Wsichow, accorded protection to foreign life and property within the affected area in accordance with international law, thus showing its opposition to the anti-foreign policy of the Manchu Government. Since then whenever the revolutionists took up arms, they never failed to take special care to give adequate protection to foreigners. During the 1911 revolution there was not a single case of violation of foreign life and property, although revolutionary troops were spread throughout the country. This was due to the fact that the Party's policy had had a salutary influence on the minds of the people, and had been obeyed by the members. When the President of our Party, Dr. Sun Yat-sen, took up office as provisional President of the Republic on January 1, 1912, he declared that China should observe all the obligations of a civilized State in order to enjoy all the privileges of a civilized State. Thus the Party's policy and attitude have always been clear and known to the world.

Militarist Superstition.

During the last 13 years the Northern militarists, having usurped the Peking government, have not hesitated to word in league with the Imperialistic Powers and to sell the country in order to further their selfish aims. Our people have often denounced their slavishness towards foreign Powers, but the minds of the reactionaries and militarists are really suffused with mediæval and monarchical notions and superstitions which are closely associated with anti-foreign sentiments. While in their conduct they are servile, in their mentality they are really hostile to foreigners. This is proved by the widespread growth in recent years of secret societies in the North among the leading militarists and reactionaries, which worship such gods as Lu Shun-yang (See note at end), whose orders are issued through the medium of the planchette and who is believed to be able to destroy an enemy by the use of the "Flying Swords." The aims and characters of such societies are really similar to those of the Boxer movement. The Kuomintang plans to exterminate such societies because they are identified or associated with mediæval and monarchical beliefs to the detriment of the State as well as of international relations owing to their anti-foreign tendencies. Wherever the influence of the Kuomintang extends such beliefs are automatically eradicated; on the other hand, where it does not prevail such mischievous beliefs take root and spread. For instance, in Anhui which is outside the influence of the Party there is a Dah Tao Hui (大刀會, Great Sword Society) and in portions of Szechuan recently wrested from the Kuomintang there exist what is known as a Shen Ta Hui (神打會, Divine Fighting Society).

Kuomintang's Mission.

The Kuomintang should therefore realize that its historic mission is to lead the country in the revolutionary movement and should not throw off the restraints hitherto imposed on the revolutionary armies. It should continue to discountenance all barbarous anti-foreign acts. All the members should be guided by this policy and set an example to the people so that they may not be led astray. Even should foreigners not understand clearly our policy and go so far as to help the Peking Government against our Party, treating it which is their friend as their enemy, and supporting Peking which is their enemy as their friend, perhaps compelling it, when necessary, to adopt measures of self-protection, it will, nevertheless, continue to maintain its past policy of international friendliness.

A Shanghai Strike Discouraged.

The proposal to encourage a general strike in the foreign Settlement likewise cannot be considered, as it is too drastic a measure.

Moreover, the Municipal Council's reply to the Senior Consul, while refering to persons "secretly or otherwise plotting against the security or well-being of the Chinese Government," does not necessarily apply to members of the Party. It is true that the Party has always strenuously opposed the illegal Peking Government from first to last. But since Tsao Kun usurped the power of the Peking Government through corruption and bribery last year, open opposition has been aroused throughout the whole country, excepting only such areas as are immediately under his despotic influence where persons dare not give utterance to their indignation. Besides the Southwestern Provinces, Manchuria and Chêkiang, even the Shanghai-Woosung region has also clearly expressed its repudiation of and opposition to the Peking Government, as evident by the declaration of the General Chamber of Commerce and the attitude of the Military Governor of Shanghai.

Calmness Enjoined.

The Municipal authorities in the International Settlement cannot be blind to the real sentiments of the people and side with the Peking Government to oppose right and popular opinion. Even if they could do so, they could not reverse the policy of neutrality hitherto observed by civilized Powers without the approval of the Consular and Diplomatic Bodies and the foreign Governments. We do not believe that such approval will be given.

Therefore, it behoves the members of the Party to maintain an attitude of calmness and patience, to refrain from all precipitate action and to await further instructions.

Canton, July 21, 1924.

Translator's Note.—Lu Shun-yang, or Lu Tung-pin, who lived during the Tang Dynasty, was a Taoist student and canonized as a God after his death. Two years ago an official document actually appeared in the Peking Government Gazette in which a banking corporation, formed by prominent people and officials, petitioned for registration with this Taoist God, Lu Shun-yang, as its President. The application for registration was granted by the Ministry of Agriculture and Commerce. There is also, it is reported, a society in Peking, organized by prominent military and civil officials, with Lu Shun-yang as its President, Tsao Kun as its Vice President, and Wang Huai-ching and others as directors!

NORTHERN ADVANCE ON FUKIEN

Peking, Aug. 4.

A telegram received by the "Chen-Pao" from Foochow says that the military authorities there have received important instructions from Loyang, as the result of which Admiral Tu Hsi-kuei at once started from Nanking, while Gen. Chow Yin-jen began to recruit another division of troops and sent Gen. Tung Tze-liang with a newly-recruited brigade of reserves to Chungan and Pucheng on the Fukien-Chêkiang border. Meanwhile Gen. Sun Chuan-fang sent the 3rd Brigade also to the Fukien-Chêkiang border.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

A CANTON TRADE MARK LAW

Information reaches us that the Canton Government have now issued a Trademark Act and have announced that there will be no protection, within their jurisdiction, for trademarks not registered in their bureau.

Nothing could better illustrate the vital importance for foreign Powers of not accepting the Peking, or for that matter any other Trademark Act, and of standing out firmly for the provisions of the Mackay Treaty, in respect of trademark registrations, and full compliance with the extraterritorial provisions of the Tientsin Treaty.

PEKING'S QUEST FOR A PREMIER

Dr. Yen Personally Acceptable But Barred Out by Usual Party Intrigue

From Our Own Correspondent.

Peking, July 29.

Even the most restrained of political observers expected that a vote on Dr. Yen's nomination would be taken by the House of Representatives last Friday. The motion was on the agenda, but although the members were very loquacious, a vote was not taken. Instead, the principal speakers devoted their attention to the Acting Premiership of Dr. Koo, whether or not it was constitutional; but beyond the expression of individual opinion, no action was taken on that subject either.

Parliamentary failure to come to a decision on the Premiership has been interpreted as a good sign by the partisans of Dr. Yen. They point to the circumstances that precipitated Sun Pao-chi to office. Mr. Sun obtained the vote at a comparatively quiet session after the energies of the House had seemingly been exhausted in an attempt to howl down the nomination. It is thought that Dr. Yen will glide into the Premiership on a similar reaction.

A Deluge of Words.

Voting on the Premiership in China in recent times is not unlike the procedure of an American Convention, especially the last Democratic Convention. There is just the same display of verbal fisticuffs, of political manœuvring and bargaining. After a deluge of words, hiding the negotiations in the back rooms, action is taken without a sign that it has been born out of a long and arduous travail.

In the case of the Yen nomination on Friday, it was quite evident that both the Ayes and the Noes were afraid of the vote. The Government party would have forced the issue if they had felt certain of the result. But there were too many waverers in the House to allow a division to be taken. On the other hand, the anti-Government party, while realizing a strength beyond their expectations, were far from sure that they would be able to spike the nomination if it came to the vote. So they both indulged themselves in much wordy warfare, to the hurt of nobody and to the end that more time could be given to the business of political manœuvring. Even physical warfare was threatened at times to ensure that nothing was done, but the milder contestants had no difficulty in restraining their exuberant colleagues from annihilating themselves in the cause of a vacuum.

Dr. Yen's Personal Popularity.

If the members could have discarded their political clothes for an hour, and debated and divided on the subject of Dr. Yen's personal qualifications for the Premiership, there would have been an overwhelming majority vote. Dr. Yen is at the height of his popularity, even with those Parliamentarians to whom he has refused to truckle. Yet political expediency rules that there are grave doubts as to his qualifications for the high office to which he has been nominated by the President. Apart from the small groups, such as the Little Sun party, the strongest opposition comes from men who are very friendly to Dr. Yen, but implacably hostile to the President. This anti-government force is composed of the members who formed the minority in the Presidential election.

Dr. Yen remains unruffled by the storm that is breaking round his head, but is probably anxious to seek the first opportunity to bow before it, and to suggest another victim for the Parliamentary whirlpool.

Peking, Aug. 1.

The Opposition again prevented a vote by the House of Representatives to-day on the nomination of Dr. W. W. Yen as Premier.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Dr. W. W. Yen Now Formally Declining the Position

Dr. W. W. Yen, Premier designate, has formally requested the President to recall from Parliament his nomination to the Premiership, says the Chinese Press, on the ground that he feels himself incompetent to fulfil such a responsible position, and that the delay of Parliament in discussing his nomination might prejudice the efficient administration of the Government.

On August 2, Mr. Wang Yu-chi, Chief Secretary of the President, called on Dr. Yen, trying in vain to dissuade him from persisting in declining his nomination. Dr. Yen told Mr. Wang that he had no means to ingratiate himself with the M. P.'s, and that it would not be easy to carry out his policy. Mr. Wang has promised to lay Dr. Yen's views before the President.

M. Karakhan's Claim to a Protocol Power Despite Annulment of all Previous Treaties

Peking, Aug. 3.

In view of the surprise generally felt when M. Karakhan put forward to the Protocol Ministers the view that Soviet Russia is a Protocol Power and that, therefore, assurances that the Soviet Embassy would abide by the regulations of the Diplomatic Quarter should not be required from him, the text of the article in the Sino-Russian Agreement dealing with the cancellation of Tsarist treaties may be worth quoting. It says:

"The Governments of the contracting parties agree to annul at the conference as provided in the preceding article all conventions, treaties, agreements, protocols, contracts, etcetera, concluded between the Government of China and the Tsarist Government and to replace them," etc.

This seems to make it quite plain that cancellation of the Tsarist treaties, etcetera, is to take place at the forthcoming Sino-Russian conference. But the question arises whether or not Russian extraterritoriality has also been resumed by the Soviet Government as heir to the Tsarist Government, as well as other Russian rights not specifically dealt with by the declarations accompanying the Sino-Russian Agreement.

As regards the Protocol of 1901, however, it would be interesting to know what the views of the Chinese Government are in this respect, particularly as the Protocol Ministers are accredited to China and China is a principal in the Sino-Russian Agreement. — Reuter's Pacific Service.

Britain Making No Change in Diplomatic Representation for the Time Being

London, Aug. 4.

In the House of Commons to-day, Mr. MacDonald was questioned with regard to the possibility of promoting the British Legation in China to an Embassy, as the Soviet Government had done and as Japan had promised to do next year.

The Premier said that he did not think it desirable to make any change, except as a result of agreement between the signatories of the Washington Convention. Moreover, he continued, any such agreement should be withheld at least until China had taken steps to establish an effective Central Government.—Reuter.

Peking, Aug. 5.

According to a report published by the French Legation, France considers that it is premature to discuss the question of exchanging Ambassadors between China and France at this juncture as proposed by the Chinese Government. It is learnt that the French Government has already notified the Chinese Government of its disapproval of the latter's proposal.—Eastern News Agency.

END OF THE RUSSIAN COUNCIL IN TIENTSIN

Tientsin, Aug. 6.

The Russian Municipal Council was to-day dissolved by order of the Civil Governor of Chihli. The Council was informed that the former Russian Concession would be administered by Colonel Ting.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

CHANG TSO-LIN AND THE SOVIET

No Recognition Until Reds Accept Tsarist Obligations with Its Privileges

From Our Own Correspondent.

Peking, July 30.

A good deal of interest is being taken in the negotiations now being conducted between Marshal Chang Tso-lin and the Soviet in Mukden. Chang's attitude towards the agreement recently concluded between Dr. Wellington Koo and Mr. Karakhan is well-known; he is not interested in it. It seems that he will take up with the Soviet represenative all the questions that affect his territory, whether they are covered by the Koo-Karakhan instrument or not.

I am informed by somebody who has lately had an interview with him that the Manchurian chieftain is most eloquent on the subject of the fall of the rouble. Apparently, he has not despaired of ever getting his money back, unlike most people who have roubles in their possession, and it is likely that he will go so far as to insist on some reparation on behalf of himself and other people in Manchuria as a condition precedent to an agreement.

Before the Revolution all wages on the Chinese Eastern Railway were paid in roubles, large holdings of which are still in Mukden and the cities along the railway. Marshal Chang contends that if the Soviet claims to be heir to the privileges of the old Tsarist government, it must shoulder a few of the obligations, the redemption of some of the rouble issues being the most important. He points to the great distress caused by the depreciation in the rouble among the Chinese working classes in Manchuria, whose cause in this particular affair is his cause, there being undoubtedly an identity of interest in recouping losses sustained as a result of the fall in old Russian paper money.

The Lonely Furrow.

Questioned concerning his attitude toward Peking, the Governor said that while China remained disordered, it were better for the Three Eastern Provinces to remain aloof from the Central Government; but he assured his interviewer that when order was restored, he would gladly obey the President and work in harmony with any interest that was dedicated to constructive work. Unfortunately, he said, he could not see that time coming for many years; he could not see in China a single man who was capable of pulling China through her present crisis.

This left the questioner to infer that he would proceed with his policy of consolidating his independence, and a remark that he had 300,000 men under arms seemed to ask for the inference.

His Views on Chinese-Eastern Railway Problem Still a Matter of Doubt

Harbin, July 30.

Marshal Chang Tso-lin's final views of the Chinese Eastern Railway question are not yet known and it is doubtful whether he has definitely decided what attitude he will ultimately adopt. The Russo-Chinese Conference referred to in the press as having been in progress lately in Mukden in reality can only be regarded as partially bearing the character of a conference, as it is merely the clearing up of local points of view in preparation for the future conference in Peking.

As regards Marshal Chang Tso-lin's attitude towards Moscow, he has his own views on quite a number of questions and will probably stick to them, but it is said that he has no objection to putting into effect any results obtained from the Peking-Moscow negotiations which are not injurious to the interests of the Three Eastern Provinces.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE Chinese press reports that the Government intends to appoint a Tupan of Flood Relief whose duties would extend throughout the country. His work would be to coordinate the work of various bodies now engaged in relief. The papers say that Mr. Kao Ling-wei or Mr. Cheng Keh will be offered the post.

MANCHURIA AND SINO-RUSSIAN TREATY

Conditions Under Which Mukden Would Recognize It

The resolutions already passed by the officials of the Three Eastern Provinces at a conference held on August 1, reports a Harbin telegram to the "Sinwan-pao," are:—

'1.—The Chinese Eastern Railway—To abandon the demand for its unconditional restitution to China, and recognize the justice of joint-control provided that (a) the control of the land revenue be separated from the C.E.R. administration; (b) the vested interests of France in the Russian-Asiatic Bank shall not be prejudiced, although France shall not be allowed to interfere with the administrative and financial functions of the C.E.R.; (c) the Director-General to be appointed by Peking, and managers and officers by the Three Eastern Provinces; (d) there shall be no change in the defensive and administrative authorities in the C.E.R.; and (e) Chinese dollars in silver to be the standard currency in all financial transactions on the C.E.R.

2.—Navigation rights on the Sungari and Heilungkiang—National boundaries to be clearly defined, both Chinese and Russian ships to be at liberty to navigate both the rivers as freely as they may like, and taxes and dues to be fixed in advance.

3.—Demarcation of boundaries—To be preceded by a survey under the auspices of a Sino-Russian Survey Commission to be formed in the Three Eastern Provinces.

On August 2, the question of the rouble and other matters were to be discussed.

THE RUSSIAN LEGATION CONTROVERSY

Diplomatic Body Not at All Disposed to Give It up Unconditionally

Peking, Aug. 1.

At a meeting of the Protocol Ministers to-day the Senior Member, the American Minister Mr. Schurman, explained Mr. Karakhan's views regarding the Russian Legation, which Mr. Karakhan had embodied in a Note in which he asked for the Legation to be turned over to him.

Mr. Karakhan argued that, as Russia had not yet renounced the Protocol of 1901, the other Protocol Ministers should not make conditions concerning Soviet occupancy of the Legation. He also referred to the necessity of neighbourly relations in maintaining an efficient administration of the Legation Quarter, adding that in the event of the Soviet renouncing the Protocol later, he would inform his colleagues and the matter would be settled in accordance with the usages of international law.

The Protocol Ministers subsequently made representations to their Governments and if these are accepted, the Legation will be given over to Mr. Karakhan, but in reporting to their Governments the Ministers recognized certain contingencies and suggested reservations in connexion with the matter. —Reuter's Pacific Service.

Later.

The difficulties facing M. Karakhan in the occupation of the old Russian Legation seem to be dissolving. Shortly after his interview with Dr. Schurman, M. Karakhan sent a note to the Protocol Ministers, stating that he desired to take over the Legation, while the Chinese Government and M. Karakhan notified the Diplomatic Body of the latter's assumption of the post of Ambassador. It is also understood that the Soviet Ambassador intimated to the Diplomatic Corps that the Soviet claims Protocol rights as the Soviet has not yet renounced the 1901 Protocol.

This development is considered likely to facilitate the settlement of the question of M. Karakhan's entry into the Diplomatic Quarter. The matter is still being discussed, but the result is likely to be favourable to M. Karakhan and to be reached shortly.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

WAR BREAKS OUT ANEW IN SHENSI

Gen. Kao Defeated by Wu Pei-fu's Expedition Renews the Fight with Apparent Success

From a Correspondent.

East Shensi, July 21.

No one acquainted with things in China and the Chinese mind would ever think, that the war, which broke out so suddenly and unexpectedly in east Shensi at the beginning of last Chinese new year, bearing down on the cities of Peh-shui, Cheng-hsien and Hoyang, the strongholds of General Kao, an adherent to Wu Pei-fu, and ended within a month's time with the apparent breaking up and loss of General Kao's entire army, would believe that the war could have ended thus.

At that time General Kao's friends did not have time to come to his assistance, before he seemed to be all finished. But those who have been in China for tens of years, know the Chinese capacity for waiting their right opportunity. And the opportunity, Kao seems to think, has come now. All of a sudden, we learn, he has besieged the city of Peh-shui, the home of his ancestor resulting in some 700 of the ill-famed "Lao-Yang-ren's" men and others who took part in the campaign against him, and have since remained in his city, behaving in a way that has made it impossible for the then looted merchants to open a single shop during the four months that have since passed.

Upon hearing of this attack a Major in Chenghsien, some 70 "li" from Pehshui—also of Lao Yang-ren's party—hastened with some 700 men to the rescue of their comrades. On their way however, they met, three days ago, a strong ambuscade of Kao's friends, who surrounded and attacked them, killing a great number and driving the rest back to the west suburb of Chenghsien. Amongst those killed was the Major, and four of his captains were severely wounded, all of whom were carried back to the city. Cartloads of wounded soldiers were brought back as well, but many of the wounded were left to the mercy of the enemy.

Meanwhile the Lieutenant-General was telephoned to for assistance, and troops of all kinds with guns of various calibres have been pouring out night and day from Tunchowfu and elsewhere to the rescue of the said cities.

But what is the character of this war?— Is the question that occupies every thoughtful mind here. To give the correct answer to it may be too early yet. However, it is a well known fact, that all the soldiers as well as the large robber bands of this province are aware of the fact, that the Governor plans to replace Shensi soldiers with Honan men, cut down the number of the latter, relieve them of their arms and send them home. This has stirred up all the native militia, and caused them to make secret agreements to support each other in opposing this action. It is already known that trops have come down from northern regions, even from Ylinfu, in the very extreme north, to take part in this action; and Shensi troops from the south have already come to join in. Thus say some, that while General Kao's first aim is to take revenge, the aim of his supporters is no less, than the turning out of the present Tuchun.

In a few days we may be able to state this with more precision.

CHINA AND PERU

Peking, Aug. 5.

Negotiations have been in progress for some time past between the Chinese Chargé d'Affaires to Peru and the Minister for Foreign Affairs of that country with a view to the conclusion of a new treaty. The Waichiaopu is now examining the draft of an agreement drawn up by the Chinese Chargé d'Affaires. —Eastern News Agency.

According to a Chinese News Agency Mr. Wei Chen-tsu, Chinese Minister in Berlin, who has recently been in Peking on leave, will return to Germany shortly. While in Peking Mr. Wei was able to assist in the Sino-German negotiations.

THE GREAT WAR AND AFTER: 1914-24

Aug. 4.

TO-DAY'S anniversary is one of which people need no reminding and probably will not for many years, if not centuries, ahead; and although there has been, and is, much talk and much writing of the likely horrors and extent of future wars, it is not unreasonable to expect that unless humanity is altogether to lose control of its powers of reasoning, no future conflict will be on so enormous a scale, entail so great a sacrifice, produce so vastly negative a result, and have so far reaching an effect on the inhabitants of the world—combatant and non-combatant. Now, ten years after its commencement, when one is able to consider the war from a more detached aspect, to view more accurately its vastness and to realize more fully its effects, one is given to wonder whether even those who originally were responsible would have fired the train that led to the conflagration, and whether those who afterwards entered would have joined issue, had they any remote conception of what it was going to entail in wealth, in lives and in anguish, and in the shattering of almost every national fabric of victor and vanquished.

It was to be a "war to end war." But has it done so? Are the great nations of the world now, in the year 1924, any more peacefully inclined than they were in 1914? Is there now any more pronounced evidence of the comity of nations than there was then? Is international distrust any less apparent, international hatred any less rampant, than before? Does the thought of millions of dead, the sight of millions of maimed, the existence of millions of widows and orphans, the thought of the disintegration of millions of families, convey any message of the horrible futility of it all, to nations and those responsible for their destinies? Has the war, which proved beyond all doubt and cavil the futility of war on a vast scale, done anything to establish that universal brotherhood among mankind which, we are told, is possible of achievement? The war was an all-destroying force; its only creative productions were those whose mission was to destroy; it toppled over a civilization, which, though not the perfect one, represented the result of mankind's best effort for centuries; it turned more than half the mankind of Europe from peaceful occupations to those of slaughter and destruction; and it drew men from all corners of the earth to join in the general effort and accomplishment of extermination of mankind and his works. If the loss of lives resultant upon the war is colossal, the loss and destruction of wealth is so vast as to be incalculable; and none can foretell when its effects will cease to be felt, if ever they are.

Discussion and expression regarding the responsibility for the war can do no good at present—it is a matter which history will record and posterity judge upon, probably much more clearly than we are able to do now. Mankind's greatest need at present is to palliate (they can never wholly be remedied) the ravages of the calamity and to re-establish, so far as they can be re-established, the best elements of that structure of civilization which the war so completely shattered. Whether this is possible rests largely with what the present generation accomplishes in the next decade; and this rebuilding of a sundered and lacerated civilization will rely for its accomplishment more—incalculably more—on international ethics and goodwill than international ratios of martial power. The surfeit of ravage and destruction has left an ineradicable scar on the world, and there never was a period in history where general international comity was so necessary, and international bickering and hatred so fraught with grave consequences, as at present. The war is still so near to us that men and nations cannot forget it; on the world's statesmen rests an awful responsibility at the present time, and on what they accomplish rests the destiny of nations and the peace of the world. Let us hope that their endeavours will result in such a peace and such an abrogation of the present feelings of hatred and amibition as will make the late war—the most terrible of all—the first and last of its kind.

THE CHILD LABOUR COMMISION—I.

Aug. 5.

THE report of the Child Labour Commission of the Shanghai Municipal Council is easily one of the most significant documents published in this country. It is the first survey of its kind to be made in China. It is the first attempt scientifically to deal with any phase of the Labour question, which is constantly of more importance as industry in China ceases to be individual handicraft and becomes modern mass-production.

The Commission was appointed to recommend, if any, regulations to be "applied to child labour in the foreign Settlement of Shanghai, having regard to practical considerations and to local conditions generally." The Commission, which was presided over by Mr. H. Lipson Ward, and which had as members such experts in social legislation as Dame Adelaide Anderson and Miss Mary A. Dingman, found that little interest was taken in its proceedings, and that witnesses were slow to come forward with testimony and suggestions. This is not at all surprising.

For this commission was unusual, both in its appointment and its objects. As a rule, social reforms are wrung from the employers by the workers. Governments, in the past, have usually acceded to the minimum demands of labour after long struggles involving the general community in annoyances and disorder. Even the state socialism of Germany, which was so praised before the war, was the culmination of political revolutions and was designed, not altogether to help the workers, but to produce an efficient war machine, in which these workers would be fattened cannon fodder.

Here, on the other hand, a municipal body, in which the employers have a large voice while the labourers are almost non-represented, voluntarily undertakes to improve the conditions of labour, even against the wishes of many of the labourers themselves, who, unfortunately, are too ignorant to understand their own best interests and to realize how much is being done for them. The employers in Shanghai have been far in advance of labour in their efforts to produce better working conditions, whether it be in providing schools and hospital facilities, or in placing an age or a size limit on children coming into their mills and factories. Their efforts have in all cases been voluntary and have been prompted by a desire to reproduce, as far as is consistent with local conditions, the progress made in these fields in their own countries.

They are, however, in a difficult position vis-à-vis of employers outside the Settlement because, as the Commission indicates, there is no central authority in China capable of enforcing social legislation. Foreign employers in Shanghai cannot afford to improve conditions when Chinese employers in Chapei or Nanziang or Kashing will not make improvements. Such improvements may become commercially prohibitive, so that the goods of a humane firm would cost so much more than the goods of the inhumane firm. In a word, since the days of Robert Owen, it has been found that to make social reforms effective, the regulations have to be applied impartially to all engaged in similar industries. Reforms are better accomplished by legislation than by individual action, which at best depends upon the life of the benevolent person. General legislation is impossible if Shanghai alone is willing to enforce the labour regulation, while there is no government in Peking whose voice will carry beyond the walls of that delightful city. In a word, the recommendations of the Commission can only be enforced in Shanghai at a great sacrifice unless the Chinese Government is in a position to have them obeyed throughout the country, or unless the provincial governments of Kiangsu and Chêkiang are willing to join with the foreigners in Shanghai in doing something constructive for the Chinese people.

This should not be difficult, if blood is truly thicker than water. For those who would benefit by any reforms are the Chinese people, the poor souls who come in from the country, half starved by over-population, unscientific farming, floods, droughts, bandits and other sources of misery to them. Yet, the officials of China, Chinese themselves, have utterly disregarded the condition of their fellow-men, perhaps because under the ancient handicraft system children laboured as soon as they could, just as on the farm the little lad rides a water-buffalo as soon as he can stay on its fly-ridden back.

The problem of child labour is not altogether exceptional to China. It has existed everywhere. It has always existed. The economic and social conditions of the landless have usually been such that the little additional income brought home by the child was necessary that the household might not starve. But the introduction of the factory system, of power-driven machinery, of mass production and the acceleration of human efficiency, had made it possible for labour to earn more, to raise its standard of living and to keep its children at home and in school. This has been the history of labour in Western European countries during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. It is the history of labour struggles the world over to-day.

The International Labour Conference at Washington dealt with the question of labour with a view to standardizing to some extent the conditions under which workers shall produce. The League of Nations maintains a Bureau with a view to providing information as to how labour is improving itself throughout the world. In its publications, one may read of the efforts made in the poor, war-stricken countries of Europe. Yet nowhere is there such a crying need as in China that something be done to save the children who enter into the factory from the horrible conditions under which they spend the most impressionable years of their lives. Take this picture from the Commission's report:

"The Commission saw children at work who could not have been more than six or seven years of age. Some of these children are not on the pay-roll, but are allowed to be brought by their mothers in order that they may be under their care. In many mills the conditions during the night shift hour, according to western ideas, are most unusual. Rows of baskets, containing babies and children, sleeping or awake as the case may be, lie placed between the rapidly moving or noisy machinery. Young children, who are supposed to be working, but have been overcome by fatigue or who have taken advantage of the absence of adequate supervision, lie asleep in every corner, some in the open, others hidden in baskets under a covering of raw cotton. The discipline appears to be lax and those in charge seem to wink at much that goes on in this respect."

It is impossible to believe that any children in this age of mechanical substitutes for human toil should have to spend their first years under such conditions, bound as they are to become influenced by the hardness of life, the deceit that makes for safety, the selfishness that brings another grain of rice to the bowl. If the authorities of Kiangsu and Chêkiang will co-operate with the foreigners who manage Shanghai, these things shall no longer be in this part of China.

CHILD LABOUR COMMISSION—II

Aug. 7.

THE recommendations made by the Child Labour Commission for the improvement of conditions in Shanghai are humane, moderate and conservative. The Commission does not propose to usher in a millennium, to establish a Utopia in Shanghai. It asks that, within the limitations necessary for the continuance in Shanghai of industry on a competitive basis with other places in China and the Far East, certain reforms shall take place.

A minimum age for child labourers is difficult to determine anywhere. The question has troubled legislative assemblies and courts in many countries. The determining factor has usually been the age at which the human body can sustain the strains of continuous employment in a factory. The first efforts to improve the condition of child labour in Manchester were the result of the terrible ravages of disease among juvenile workers. The first corrective Commissions were medical. The Manchester Board of Health was organized in 1795 for the regulation of the hours of labour and the improvement of conditions. The matter was then regarded as one of health. It is a problem of health to-day. The Commission's recommendation that ten years of age be the minimum for the employment of children, to be raised to twelve in four years, is conservative and shows a due regard for the interests of Chinese capital, which is not yet used to the standard of not employing children under the ages of fourteen or sixteen, the system current where education is universal and compulsory.

The Commission also recommends a twelve-hour day for children under fourteen years of age. As one reads of a humanitarian commission defining the age of a working child as ten and of the maximum hours of labour as twelve for such a child, one realizes how these men and women must have struggled with their ideals and their own standards of civilization. For an eight-hour day is considered a full day for adults in the countries from which most of the commissioners came. They compromised with local conditions and local ideals. They desired to write a report which could not be rejected even by the most avaricious and hard-hearted. A twelve-hour day means that the child is to have no opportunities for education unless it be during the compulsory rest of one hour, when more than likely the little one will fall fast asleep from the weariness of his toil. It means that the child will grow up without play, which makes Jack a dull boy. The Commission, in making such a report, simply indicated the beginning, for compulsory education must come to China as it has come to every civilized country. And when it comes even a ten-hour day for children will be too long.

In this connexion it is interesting to note that some foreign employers have provided educational facilities for their workers and that a group of employers in Yangtszepoo support the Yangtszepoo Social Settlement which provides educational facilities for workers between shifts. The Commission's recommendation that children be prohibited from working during the night when they may be employed during the day, requires no comment. "The Commission considers night work for children such a serious evil" that it is hardly understandable why they want to look into it again after a four years' period. The time to stop night work for children is immediately, as soon as the ratepayers authorize action on the report.

The day of rest is almost unknown in China, where adult and child labour until the Chinese New Year festivities give both a short holiday for merriment and a little extra sleep. In Western countries, largely under the Biblical injunction, "Six days shalt thou labour," one day in seven for rest and peace has been a recognized condition for a very long period. The recommendation of the Commission that twenty-four hours in at least every fourteen days shall be devoted to rest is a compromise between Western and Oriental ideals, a compromise necessary perhaps to lessen the protests against the report. Yet, one can only hope that Chinese and foreign employers will realize that it is not asking too much to expect that one day in seven be devoted to rest. Surely Christian employers cannot expect that what is for them a religious injunction does not apply to industries under their control in China.

The protection against hazardous industries, recommended by the Commission, will prove difficult of enforcement because of the primitive methods still obtaining in many of the factories in China. This will perhaps require a reorganization of the mechanical devices in some industries and the purchase of new and additional equipment. But in China, where man-power is so plentiful, where there cannot be a shortage of workers, is it not possible to employ adults in hazardous industries and to limit the labour of children to those lighter tasks for which they are more fitted? The death of a child through the negligence of an employer may be a less serious matter in a nation of 400,000,000 than it is in a smaller country. Yet, death is not within the province of man and he who neglects to preserve life when he can commits a crime, perhaps not against the laws of man, but surely against the laws of God.

It need not be repeated that we shall support as best we can the report of the Child Labour Commission. This report marks a constructive step on the part of the Shanghai Municipal Council, which has grown from a rent-payers' meeting to appoint a committee for roads and jetties to a government for the metropolis of Asia. That the Council has it within its rights legally to enforce the recommendation of the report has to be determined by the proper authorities, the Ratepayers' Meeting and, finally, the Diplomatic Corps. That any municipal body vested with police powers has the right, moral and legal, to preserve the lives of those under its care is axiomatic in the modern conception of law. Shanghai is keeping step with the world.

THE STRIKE AT SHAMEEN

Aug. 6.

THE statement by the British and French authorities in Shameen which we publish to-day is the more welcome in view of the extremely scanty and inadequate news hitherto received regarding the strike. It certainly does nothing to lessen one's feeling of the pity and indeed, it must be said, the needlessness of the whole disturbance. By the showing of this statement the strike was within an ace of being settled five days after it had begun. Agreement broke down over the refusal of the Shameen authorities to reinstate the police; and thus the quarrel dragged on for three weeks and still shows no sign of coming to an end. There is one very curious statement which will attract general attention and supplies the keynote to the obstinacy of the struggle. The strikers' delegates, we read, objected that it was unreasonable not to reinstate the police because "they had left under compulsion." In connexion with this it will be noticed that the servants went out on the afternoon of July 15 without any notice of protest having been registered against the regulations. In other words, the strike is practically confessed as having been from the first the work of agitators and intimidators. With such people there can be no parleying.

There is a good deal of previous history necessary to a complete understanding of the situation, on which the statement does not touch. It is an old rule that Shameen is not to be used as a thoroughfare for Chinese and that the waterfront is reserved for the use of Europeans. For some time this rule has been more honoured in the breach than in the observance. Finally it was decided by the foreign authorities of Shameen to draft new regulations and to enforce them. These regulations were sent to the Chinese Chamber of Commerce to be translated, in order that the Chinese version might be so worded as to contain the least possibility of offence to Chinese. Then came the bomb outrage at the Hotel Victoria and this was felt to be a suitable opportunity for bringing the new regulations into force. Whether, as originally drafted, they provided that Chinese coming into Shameen after 9 p.m. must carry passports with their photographs upon them, we are not quite clear. At any rate that rule was included among the regulations which were to come into force on August 1. As we said, in writing about the strike last week, the idea of passports cannot but appear to the outside observer as a mistake. It could not, in view of the general nature of Shameen, afford the slightest protection against any assassin who might wish to get into the island to commit an outrage and it is precisely the sort of rule which anyone acquainted with the Chinese knows that they would violently resent. It would almost seem as if the agitators had only been waiting for the announcement that the regulations were to go into force, in view of the rapidity and completeness with which all the servants were called out. Then came the negotiations as described elsewhere to-day, ending in complete deadlock.

Up to the close of last week the strike was continuing as if it would never end. Foreign residents of Shameen had settled down to doing their work as if they had never been accustomed to having it done for them. The women and children had not, generally speaking, been removed. The electric light service had not been cut off from Canton city. Food was being regularly sent up from Hongkong by steamer and the foreigners were landing it themselves, apportioning it out and cooking it. There appears no reason why they should not continue to do so and we may be quite sure that, with the example of the recent Hongkong strike before them, they will endure any inconvenience sooner than give in. We are told that the Chinese merchants, particularly silk dealers, are suffering enormously from the strike and that if it lasts much longer, many of them are likely to be ruined. On the other hand, the Labour Unions and professional agitators in Canton are said to care very little indeed about the miseries of the merchants. The governing classes in Canton itself are said to be divided, and it is added, though with what truth we should not like to say, that those who favour the strike are stronger than those who do not. The opportunity appears to us an excellent one for the Kuomintang to prove the sincerity of their recent manifesto denouncing anti-foreign demonstrations. Considerable concessions have been offered by the Shameen authorities to the strikers, quite enough, we feel sure, to satisfy the servants if they were allowed to act according to their own feelings. The passports and photographs appear to be regarded as indispensable: but foreigners are to carry them equally with Chinese. As regards the reinstatement of the police it would certainly seem at this distance that the question of their having left under compulsion should be further examined and here, perhaps, the good offices of the Kuomintang wing of the Government might be employed for the general benefit of Canton business and the enhancement of their own reputation. At any rate in view of the agitators' threat disclosed in the latest telegram, there can be no surrender. And towards so menacing and unjustifiable an attitude it may well become a question whether the foreigners will not have to use other means than those of mere passive resistance.

ON PIRACY

Aug. 8.

THERE is something very fascinating about piracy to both young and old. We play with it in imagination, disregarding the cruelty and sordid details and think only of its romance and daring, the pirates themselves being hardly more real to us than ogres, dragons and enchanters. Hence the novels of R. L. Stevenson and the plays of W. S. Gilbert and Sir James Barrie enjoy a never-ending popularity. A book has been recently published entitled "The Pirates' 'Who's Who,'" which gives particulars of the lives and deaths of the most noted pirates and buccaneers. Although piracy has always been common in China, and still is, little space is devoted to the names and exploits of Chinese pirates, for the simple reason that no one recorded their short and simple annals. So they passed away unwept, unhonoured and unsung. Mention is made, however, of Mrs. Lo, the Chinese lady pirate, who won notoriety as a slave raider, a slayer of men, and a sacker of cities, until she departed this life "quite suddenly," in October, 1922. Perhaps we shall soon receive trustworthy information concerning existing Chinese pirates in the south. According to an item which appeared a few days ago, the shooting and throat-cutting by Chinese river pirates is having a great effect upon young and enterprising British naval officers; tired of their more or less humdrum existence they are anxious to take part in some fighting, and the work of clearing out the criminal gangs infesting the great water-ways of China is at this time particularly attractive. So the Admiralty is being bombarded with applications for service on the China Station. If the British government were to undertake this task vigorously, in defence of its own shipping, it would render a great service to the business world. Speaking generally, pirates are not desirable people and they would have disappeared long ago if Chinese officials had done their duty, but many of these gentry are morally not much better than the pirates.

It is a mistake to think that pirates come only from the lowest stratum of human society. Among those recorded in the "Who's Who," who have sailed under the black flag are an English duke, an English earl, an Irish baron, several Masters of Arts, naturalists, doctors, and others of education and decent upbringing. An old Etonian became a pirate in order to avoid the humiliation of being apprenticed to a breeches maker. A respectable householder was driven to the unholy calling by the constant nagging of his wife. Of the learned professions, strange to say, quite a number of pirates were physicians. The Chinese schoolboy, rather shaky in his use of l's and r's, seems to have had an inkling of this predatory tendency when he wrote in his essay on the medical profession: "The doctor is a good man. He comes to see you when you are sick. The first thing he does is to feel your purse." One noted physician pirate was Thomas Dover, M.B., (Camb.) L.R.C.P., (London), who composed a very useful diaphoretic and soothing powder, still very often prescribed under the name of "Dover's powder." He rose to the rank of a pirate captain. But among his good deeds he rescued from the island of Juan Fernandez, Alexander Selkirk, the prototype of Defoe's "Robinson Crusoe." So English boys owe him a debt of gratitude. Another piratical physician was Peter Scudamore. When signing the ship's articles on a pirate vessel he expressed the hope that he would prove as great a rogue as any of them. He attained his ambition and eventually paid the penalty. Sentenced to death he went through the motions of repentance. "On the gallows he sang, solo, the thirty-first Psalm. Died at the age of thirty-five." Like many other great men of the past, most of the famous pirates died young. Few lived to be forty or even thirty years old. No doubt Scudamore derived much comfort from singing the Psalm, with the noose round his neck, especially when he came to the verse stating that he had not been given over to the enemy, and that his feet had been set on a broad place. Another pirate, not a physician but even more devout than Scudamore, made a clergyman go through a religious service for him at the pistol's point and shot one of the men present for irreverence. Probably few went to sleep during the service. No doubt many doctors served on board pirate vessels strictly in their professional capacity without being actually pirates themselves. One cannot help thinking, however, of the adage that a man is known by the company he keeps. The author of the "Pirate's Who's Who" says that piracy must surely be the third oldest profession in the world, if we give the honour of the second place to the ancient craft of healing. He does not state which is the oldest profession of all.

On the whole, the subject gives rise to reflexions more disquieting than pleasant. Piracy is interesting because it is a call to the wild within, to the strange psychological inheritance which we inherit from remote barbaric ancestors. Even in Shanghai the writer was astonished one day when a professional friend, kind-hearted and of gentle manners, suddenly exclaimed during a desultory conversation on things in general that if he were to be born again and had the choice of his career he would be a thorough-paced, dyed-in-the-wool, successful villain. For the moment he was a pirate at heart. Probably the exclamation was expressive of a reaction against the monotony of life, a chafing against his complex of his moral inhibitions. Who is altogether free from such repressed inclinations which at times burst all restraint, particularly when the world ignores our abilities and virtues, and our enemies and competitors are flourishing like a green bay tree? In the next place, there are the Chinese by whom we are surrounded whose real nature we do not know. It is to be feared that most servants have the predatory instincts of pirates. Lastly, there is the more reassuring reflexion that despite the wild and sanguinary impulses which drive men to piracy, or to fight against it, the vast majority of men soon learn to bend beneath the yoke of custom, to submit to the moral prohibitions which rule the community. As boys we may yearn to be pirates, but with the years we become dull and respectable. The change is necessary and desirable, yet somehow we never tire of hearing about pirates until we become either very good or very old.

MIDSUMMER MADNESS AND MOSCOW

Aug. 9.

THE situation of the proposed agreement between Great Britain and the Soviet is probably without parallel. On Monday we are told definitely and unequivocally that the negotiations have broken down and no treaty will be signed. On Wednesday Mr. Ponsonby rushes into the House of Commons in a state of great excitement and incoherence, announces that agreement has been reached after all, that the Russians have signed and that Great Britain is going to sign on the morrow. Mr. Ponsonby's statement was possibly more intelligible in full than it was in telegraphed form, though from Mr. Lloyd George's gibe that Mr. Ponsonby "was going to sign on the morrow something of which he had not a ghost of an idea that night," it does not look as if he made himself very clear. The details of the bargain are as yet quite obscure. But three essential points stand out very plainly: that the Government's own claims have been put on the shelf in view of the impossibility of any reconcilement with the Soviet's counter-claims—we have never been told what these are and it would be most interesting to know; that the Soviet are to negotiate with British bondholders and other claimants—which looks pretty rough on the latter; and that eventually the British Government proposes to guarantee a loan to the Soviet, out of which whatever modicum of satisfaction bondholders had been able to squeeze out of the Reds would be paid. And that is really the only thing that matters, the one thing which the Soviet delegates came to London to secure.

It is worth while looking back over the very fragmentary news vouchsafed regarding the conference, in order to realize how insistent the Red delegates have always been on a loan, while as steadily refusing to comply with the conditions required normally for the raising of one. It may be recalled that, on April 13, leading London bankers sent to the Prime Minister a memorandum on certain principles which the Soviet must accept if it wished to restore its credit in Britain. These included recognition by Moscow of public and private debts to British subjects; restoration of private property taken from foreigners; sanctity of private contracts; private property to be freed from the danger of confiscation; traders to be permitted to deal direct with private firms in Russia without Government interference; no communist propaganda. The meaning of the memorandum was quite plain. If the Soviet wished to borrow money in Britain, it would be the bankers who would have to find it and these were the only terms on which they would do so. This memorandum raised a howl of execration and repudiation in Russia and no Bolshevik speaker, whether in Russia or London, has ever referred to it without declaring that in no circumstances would its terms be accepted. On April 14 the conference was opened, and very soon the Soviet's real purpose in coming to London peeped out. On April 25 the All Russian Council of Trade Unions issued a statement that private property would never be restored, but that if Britain would grant the Soviet credits, "a moderate percentage" of them would be applied to paying some of Britain's claims. On April 26 Comrade Rakovsky, the leader of the Red delegates, sent a communiqué to the English newspapers, urging a loan as the only means of solving Russia's pre-war debts, but reiterating that the bankers' memorandum would never be accepted. On May 16 Reuter informed us that British official circles were quite satisfied with the course of the negotiations, but a difficulty had arisen over the mutual claims of the British and Soviet Governments. On May 20, that is the date of the telegram, the Red delegates pointblank asked the British for a loan; out of it they would pay back a lump sum to cover Russia's pre-war debts, but these must be pared down, owing to the general depreciation of Russian assets and no accumulation of interest could be allowed. The British delegates replied that their Government would regard sympathetically any loan the Soviet might float in London, but certainly could not guarantee it. On May 27 the cables admitted that there was "a divergence of views with regard to the satisfaction of claims against Russia," the British delegation being unable to admit that she could not pay pre-war debts in full, if given time—about which there would be no difficulty. Great Britain was in no hurry; she merely wanted the Soviet to accept liability and that it would not. An interview was given in Moscow about this time by Comrade Krassin to Reuter's correspondent. He said that the Soviet was most anxious to attract British capital to Russia, "in view of the financial power of Great Britain and the importance of London as a money market, as well as of the high standard of British machinery and other branches of industry." But he also said that the Soviet state policy was to cut in on private industry wherever possible and he virtually admitted that it meant to get rid of foreign capital as soon as it should have served its turn. On June 25 the "Daily Telegraph" announced that the negotiations were in a state of "suspended animation." On July 11 it was announced that a treaty was being drafted, which would supersede the Krassin agreement of 1921, provide the Soviet with a loan of ten millions sterling and apparently allow Moscow to get possession of the Tsarist moneys held in London. On August 5 we are told that the Soviet object to this agreement because it would make them liable to restore property they have stolen—and your good Bolshevik is superior to the behests of the Eighth Commandment. On August 6 this difficulty has somehow been overcome—one would very much like to know how—and the Russian delegates sign.

There are four good reasons why the House of Commons rose in protest. First, the patching up of an agreement on the eve of the recess is an obvious electioneering dodge. The Labour Government has done nothing to fulfil its electioneering pledges, and it thinks, when Labour members are twitted therewith in their constituencies, that a Russian trade agreement, with vague promises of something to be repaid in the dim future, will be a clinching retort. Secondly, the House is angry at the obscurity which has veiled all the negotiations: again and again questioners have tried to get the veil lifted, but in vain: the "secret diplomacy" of bygone régimes was nothing to the impenetrability of Labour's. Thirdly, the House justly resents the idea of Government guaranteeing a loan, which simply means making the taxpayer do what no man of business would dream of doing. And lastly we cannot think that the House has ever taken kindly to the notion of treating with a Government of the stamp of the Soviet as an equal. The one bright spot in the course of the negotiations was when Mr. Davison, Labour member for Sheffield, asked in the House of Commons what precautions were being taken against propaganda, "to stop the Red delegates from being up to monkey tricks." He was reproved for using such language about the representatives of "a friendly Power"—save the mark. But one conceives that the House was grateful to him. To the overwhelming majority of the British people it has been most distasteful to have any dealings with the Bolsheviks. There is an old saying that you cannot touch pitch without being defiled.

NOTES AND COMMENTS

"Sour Grapes"

Herr Philipp Heineken, president of the Norddeutscher Lloyd, on his arrival in Plymouth from New York a few weeks ago, made some observations on the question of big ships which, to say the least, savour of sour grapes. Asked what in his opinion the general public wanted, he replied to the effect that what was looked for by the traveller today was safety and comfort, and not excessive size or speed. The statement is all the more remarkable when it is remembered that his own Company and the other great German shipping concern, the Hamburg-Amerika Line, when in the heyday of their power and glory, had no doubt whatever about the value of size and high speed. They strove and strove till they had obtained the Atlantic record for speed (a record which was wrested from them by the Mauretania) and up to the time of the outbreak of war they were striving their hardest to attain supremacy in the size of their vessels and the grandeur of their passenger accommodation. With the Vaterland and the Imperator (now sailing under the Stars and Stripes and the Red Ensign respectively) they achieved their ambition before the outbreak of war; and it was only the onset of that cataclysm that prevented their attaining even further supremacy in this direction with the Bismarck. All of these three great ships were handed over to the Allies, and now the worthy Herr Heineken would like to make out that they were no good anyway. It may be that the present is not the best time for the operation of these giant liners, but responsible opinion in the United Kingdom (where they really do know something about ships and their operation) is that the day when the very large and very fast ship will come into its own again is not very far away; and Germany's present efforts in rebuilding her merchant marine and in regaining her old power on the seas of the world leave no doubt that eventually she will be as much in the running for records in speed and size as she was before the war nullified her already great achievements in that direction.

The Passion for Peerage

The other day one of our readers wrote of the Bolshevik delegates having been received by the King at Buckingham Palace as if it must somehow be regarded as whitewashing the Soviet for ever and a day—on the old principle, no doubt, of touching for the "King's evil." Less philo-Bolshevik people probably thought of it as a matter of political convention, the sort of think a constitutional monarch has to submit to, and wished that His Majesty could have been spared the necessity of receiving the representatives of his consin's murderers. But a writer in the "Outlook," of London, lets out a secret which puts a very harmless construction on the whole business.

Serious students of Downing Street communiqués, he writes, had imagined that the real interest of the Bolshevik delegation was a loan from the City or the British Government; whereas what they really want is to shake hands with "a real English lord." (One touch of snobbery makes the whole world kin.) "Comrade Kutuzoff" has been quite frank about it in the "Izvestia;" but the problem was a more difficult one than I had thought. They were disappointed when Lady Cynthia Mosley gave a party in their honour to discover that no real lords were to grace the reception, and accordingly they did not trouble to put on clean collars; but when Commander Kenworthy entertained them, and a live peer was promised at last, it was felt that nothing less than "a clean starched collar" was required; I suppose if a Duke had been on the menu they might have run to a clean shirt without compromising their principles. There is more in this business of titles than one had supposed—the connexion between clean linen and the aristocracy had never occurred to me before.

For Buckingham Palace we may infer that the delegates even risked taking a bath. But who was the historical personage who "did dearly love a lord"? Even the high-toned, whole-souled Bolshevik is not proof, and after being received at Buckingham Palace, one imagines that Comrade Rakovsky went back to Moscow in the most benign temper.

The Kuomintang Note

It is to be hoped readers will not be deterred by the length of the Kuomintang manifesto, of which we pubbsh a translation, from reading this most remarkable document. At the present juncture in Chinese affairs it appears to be of special importance. The Shanghai branch of the party had taken umbrage at certain remarks in a letter from the Council to the Senior Consul and had written to Canton suggesting that it should take reprisals and call a general strike. Headquarters in Canton wrote back, strongly discountenancing "narrow and violent anti-foreign" views as harmful to society and damaging to China's international prestige. The real anti-foreignism, it points out, is to be found in Peking circles, which the foreigners treat as if they were their friends. There is a curious story of China's military men accepting supposed inspiration from a long-deceased Chinese hero, and a good deal of argument that the Kuomintang have always been scrupulously careful to protect foreign life and property. Also the Shanghai branch are reminded that there is no need to fit the words of the Council's letter to themselves. A good many people in reading this manifesto will no doubt exclaim "Is Saul also among the prophets?" But we see no reason for not accepting it as a perfectly sincere utterance. As regards the claim that the Kuomintang did its utmost to protect foreign life and property in 1911, we also see no reason to doubt it. We cannot recall any instance of foreigners or their property suffering either in 1911 or in 1913—if there were such, at least it was trivial compared with what has occurred in the past two or three years. Granting that the manifesto is a deliberate bid by the Southern party for foreign sympathy, we need not think the worse of it for that. There is no reason for being so much in love with the Peking administration—which Canton certainly has good grounds for calling illegal—that the Powers might not have space for a little sympathy with its opponents: and in these days when assaults on foreigners are unhappily prevalent we may as well not be too hasty to turn the cold shoulder on those who reveal a different spirit.

Old Age Pensions

The Labour Government of Great Britain did not have any difficulty with its proposals for the reform of the old age pensions system. Published in detail at the beginning of the last week in June they went through the House of Commons two days later without a division, all parties being pledged to the main point, that is, removal of what is known as the thrift disqualification. Under the old system a pensioner did not get the full 10s. a week, if he had any other income, which was simply another way of dissuading him from ever attempting to save anything. The new proposals do not remove the income disqualification altogether, or make the pension available to all persons over 70, irrespective of private income. To do so, apart from being open to other objections, would have entailed a burden on the Exchequer which would be quite indefensible in the present circumstances. What the Chancellor's measure means is in effect that private income up to 25s. a week will not interfere with the receipt of a full 10s. pension, provided that 15s. out of the 25s. comes from sources other than earnings. Without placing too heavy a burden on the national purse, this reform removes the system, and brings within its scope many thousands whose sole disqualification has hitherto been that they have been thrifty enough to put by a little out of their wages for their old age. That is mere justice, and a measure which tends to restore the incentive to saving must be beneficial. The cost of the reform is estimated at £4 millions in the first year, rising later on to £7 millions or more.

Tinker Tinker

Travellers from Shanghai to Mokanshan on Thursday, July 31, had an uncomfortable experience. One of them writes:—

The train got in in good time (Hangchow). We rushed to the launch and found a band of men with all the machinery out, the floor up, etc., and were told we could not come on "engine have spoil." Insisted on getting on as the party could not stand there in the sun, the heat being terrible. The party began to talk of taking the 2 p.m. train back to Shanghai, Then the down launch from Mokanshan came in, and after a time the passengers were transferred, after which it was found that engine "was spoil too." Another long delay about an hour and a half. Got up the mountain very late. Deplorable state of affairs.

Of course the whole trouble is that the engineer will not let the engine alone. He is for ever tinkering with it and the more sweetly it runs the more he appears to suspect it of malign plottings and pulls it about until it is no wonder that the poor thing loses temper and goes on strike. The railway authorities have tried everything, fining the engineers and sacking them, but in vain. Two years ago a friend of ours, who knows a lot about combustion engines, threatened the engineer with horrible pains and penalties if he touched the engine after starting it, and the boat had peace. But the average traveller, knowing himself ignorant, is afraid to take the risk of doing that.

Workers and War

The last budget of notes from the International Federation of Trades Unions—always interesting to read even if one does not agree with it—contains an article by Fred Bramley, secretary of the Trades Union Congress, very appropriate to the anniversary we were remembering yesterday. He says:—

The last great war involved the employment of over 50,000,000 able-bodied members of the working class in the degrading and brutal task of human slaughter.

The wage-earners were called from the fields, factories and workshops of Europe to engage in the task of scientific murder because their masters, social, industrial and political, had quarrelled.

The casualties caused by this disastrous mixture of crime and blunder left countless millions to mourn the loss of fathers, husbands, sons and brothers. Over 7,500,000 of the strongest and most promising of the young men of the nations engaged in the struggle were left dead on the field of battle. In addition over 12,500,000 were wounded, thousands of them so seriously as to destroy their physical and mental capacity beyond repair.

The blood cost of what we hope will be the last of our Capitalist wars must also be counted, together with the almost universal economic paralysis arising from the war.

The workers more than any other class suffer the tragic consequences of war. They also, more than any other class, provide the means which make war possible: by their unanimous refusal to provide men and to produce equipment, and transport material, they could make war impossible. Universal peace will never be secured by moral reasoning or pious resolutions. It will come from the refusal of the wage-earners to participate in a game in which they become the helpless pawns of the unscrupulous criminals who leave them to bleed, work and pay for the folly and crimes of others.

All this is very pretty—or very ugly—but it leaves out of account two important factors: first, that Capital has every bit as much motive for disliking war as Labour, possibly more; Secondly, that when a man's country is in danger he is driven by mean and sordid motives of patriotism which doubtless are incomprehensible to pure and lofty thinkers like Mr. Bramley to fight for it. One notes that the International Federation of Trades Unions is organizing an international anti-war demonstration for September 21 next. It would be rather amusing if Capital organized a similar demonstration for the same day.

The Emperor and an M. P.

We publish to-day Mr. R. F. Johnston's most interesting and trenchant reply to the unfounded and slanderous attack made by Mr. Li Shieh-yang M.P., on the Manchu Emperor and, in passing, on Mr. Johnston himself. No one who has read the article will grudge the time spent in doing so, and assuredly it must be felt that such a reply was entirely necssary. Under existing conditions in China it was impossible to leave Mr. Li's venomous attack unnoticed. Circumstances might arise at any moment when, popular feeling running high, it would only be remembered that such accusation had been made, and the Emperor's life might easily be endangered. One cannot help thinking that the political conditions of the day are at the bottom of Mr. Li's onslaught. As the failure of the republican régime, or what pretends to that name in China, becomes more glaringly conpicuous, men's minds are turning more and more to the idea of a monarchy as the only refuge from the intolerable anarchy which everywhere prevails. Everything that is heard of His Majesty Hsuan Tung disposes the public to think sympathetically of the last of the Ching Emperors; and just as Milton was compelled, after the beheadal of Charles I, to remonstrate with the people on their unaccountable sorrow at that tragedy, so perhaps Mr. Li conceives himself similarly appointed to do the best he can to blacken the Emperor's character, and disgust the Chinese people with him. Let it be said at once that we are not trying to thrust His Majesty or any other Emperor down China's throat. We are merely trying to get at what may have been the motive in Mr. Li's mind. Whatever that motive may have been, he has been guilty of an inexcusable slander of suggesting falsehoods, the truth of which could easily have been ascertained, and incidentally, of libelling Mr. Johnston himself, whom he presents to the Chinese as using his position in order to intrigue for a monarchical restoration. No more telling exposure could well be imagined than that we have published from Mr. Johnston. It only remains for Mr. Li to do what his position as a member of Parliament requires, and that is to apologize for his unfounded charges as publicly as he delivered them.

Wireless for Lifeboats.

The advances of science and engineering have removed many of the dangers attendant upon travel at sea that were so prevalent so recently as a quarter of a century ago, and statistics published last year by Sir Westcott Abel, chief surveyor to Lloyd's Register of Shipping, proved that travelling by sea is now probably attended by less risk than any other method of journeying from one point to another. However, whatever shipbuilding science and its allied spheres of activity may do, disasters at sea can never wholly be eliminated, and for that reason every additional factor for ensuring further safety to those who travel by ship is strongly to be encouraged. Wireless on ships has done wonders and is doing wonders, but even wireless, greatly as it has progressed, has not reached its limit of development. Among its latest applications to the cause of safety is its installation in ships' lifeboats and some remarkable specimens of this apparatus are, we understand, now being demonstrated at Wembley. Although the importance of the apparatus has been realized for some years, the recent disaster to the Clan MacMillan in the Bay of Bengal has given the matter added importance, and has emphasized the desirability of ships' lifeboats being equipped with wireless so as to enable them to communicate their whereabouts. It will be remembered that when the crew of the ship in question took to their boats there was for some time much anxiety as to their safety; and the same position arose with regard to the ill-fated Trevessa. Australia has for some time set the world a lead on this question, for all of the passenger-carrying vessels of the Commonwealth Line (the "Bay" class of vessels) have, for more than three years, been provided with at least two motor lifeboats, each of which is completely equipped with modern wireless apparatus; while the P. & O. liner to be launched, the Rasmak, has a lifeboat fitted with the very latest apparatus, including the direction-finder. We shall doubtless hear more of this question of wireless for ships' lifeboats in the near future, though, so far as the majority of passenger-carrying vessels in Chinese waters are concerned, a start will have to made by equipping the vessels themselves. That is by far the most urgent consideration for those who travel in China Coast ships.

MR. Chen Lu, Chinese Minister to France, reports regarding the proposed exchange of ambassadors, that the French Government has replied that the time is not yet ripe for taking such a step.

NEWS FROM THE OUTPORTS

GRAVE NEWS OF THE STRIKE AT SHAMEEN

Statement of the Course of Negotiations and Concessions Offered to Strikers by British and French Municipal Councils

The following account of the course of the strike and the negotiations which so nearly succeeded was issued for publication in Canton on July 26. By the vagaries of the post it has just reached this office.

In view of the intensive propaganda and consequent distortion of facts adopted in the Chinese local papers, it was decided that, while negotiations tended towards an early settlement, information should not be made public. The versions given in the local papers in English being so inaccurate as to be obvious propaganda, the following statement as to the facts is now issued.

No approach of any kind was made by those discontented with the new Traffic and Pass Regulations until after July 15, when the strike had commenced. When Mr. Tam Lai-ting, together with Mr. Ma Chui-chun (Director of the Government arsenal), approached Colonel Crosse, (the Chairman of the British Municipal Council) with a view to mediating for the purpose of a settlement, Colonel Crosse explained at the time that, as Chairman of the British Council, such a position would be difficult, and that he could only accept provided his efforts in this direction were not confused with his duties as Chairman.

Interview with Dr. C. C. Wu.

On the evening of the 16th Mr. Ma asked Colonel Crosse if he would accompany him and Mr. Tam to interview Mr. C. C. Wu, the Minister of Foreign Affairs to Dr. Sun Yat-sen, who had agreed, he said, to mediate on behalf of the strikers. On the morning of the 16th a discussion took place, at which Mr. Wu stated that the origin of the feeling aroused by the Regulations was certain correspondence which had taken place between the British Consul-General and the Civil Governor, to which Colonel Crosse replied that was a question he was not in a position to discuss. Mr. Wu further stated that had the Regulations been published at a different time the present difficulty would probably not have arisen: that he had not been in personal touch with the strikers, and that he would ascertain from them their views: he also asked Colonel Crosse to return in the evening to learn the result of such an inquiry. Colonel Crosse called on Mr. Wu at 6.30 p.m., when Mr. Wu informed him that the dispute centred itself on the XII Pass Regulation, which formed the elaboration of Number Nine of the Traffic Regulation. He said that the strikers raised no point as to the Traffic Regulations, but that he himself had objections to certain portions, of which he gave detail, consisting of four minor portions of paragraphs. He considered, however, that the Traffic Regulations were unnecessary and irksome as a whole. Colonel Crosse said he thought there would be no difficulty in amending the portions considered undesirable, and Mr. Wu, having studied the Traffic Regulations, considered that this was sufficient. He informed Colonel Crosse that the strikers had not yet returned with their views.

Strikers' Demands.

At this moment the return of the strikers was announced, and they were shown into a different room. Mr. Wu proceeded alone and interviewed them, returning in a short while with a paper which he translated, and asked Colonel Crosse to take down as being the terms which the strikers demanded.

These were:

(1) Abolition of the 12 Police Permit Regulations.

(2) The usual terms of re-instatement, including pay while on strike.

(3) The gates to remain open up to 12 midnight.

(4) That house servants should finish work at 9 p.m., unless guests were being entertained.

He asked Colonel Crosse if he would like to see the strikers, as they were there, and Colonel Crosse replied in the affirmative. The following points were then brought out: the main point of objection in the Pass Regulations was that of the photograph. The strikes also stated that in the past servants had not been required to have a pass to leave Shameen: this was pointed out to be incorrect. Colonel Crosse said that the question of the closing of the gates was not a matter subject to dispute, the question turning on the use of passes after they were shut. The strike leaders had no clear idea as to the present customary hour of closing the gates.

Colonel Crosse also pointed out that the question of ceasing work at 9 o'clock was one as between employer and employee, and could not be dealt with en masse. Subsequently in the evening Messrs. Ma and Tam informed Colonel Crosse that the strikers had dropped the questions of the hour of ceasing work and the hour of closing the gates.

On the 18th a further interview with Mr. C. C. Wu took place, when, at the request of Messrs. Ma and Tam, M. de la Prade, the Consul-General for France, and Chairman of the French Municipal Council, joined Colonel Crosse as mediator on the side of the Shameen residents Conversation mainly repeated that of the day before, but included complaints as to the unrestrained attitude of the Chinese Press, and refusal to publish an interview given by Colonel Crosse explaining the situation. At this interview Mr. Wu stated that he had not been invited to mediate on behalf of the strikers, whereupon M. de la Prade and Colonel Crosse withdrew.

Offer to the Strikers.

As the result of these interviews, the following offer was conveyed to the strikers by Mr. Tam Lai-ting:

(1) That the new pass regulations due to come into force on August 1 should be cancelled, automatically continuing the old pass regulations, but that the addition of one photograph to the pass thereby required should be made.

(2) Minor alterations to the Traffic Regulations suggested by Mr. Wu should be accepted.

(3) Reinstatement of private servants and employees should be encouraged, but could not be forced.

(4) The case of public employees would be fully investigated, and decided according to the circumstances.

On the morning of the 19th Mr. Tam returned and stated that the addition of the photograph was a crucial difficulty. This was considered at a joint Council meeting, and after discussion, it was decided that the suggestion that the pass with photograph for passing the gates after they were closed should be applied to foreigners and Chinese alike, and should be conveyed to the strikers through the mediators. The mediators having reported that the terms were now acceptable, the Joint Councils decided that the strike leaders should be invited to attend a meeting in Shameen for settlement of the strike.

A meeting was held on Sunday, the 20th, at 11 a.m., when, in addition to the French and British Consul General and Councils, Messrs. Tam Lai-ting and Mr. Ma Chui-chun were present. Three delegates of the strikers attended. They presented a paper, which, they said, stated their terms, which were as follows:

(1) Final abolition of the new Police Permit Regulations, and all other unequal treatment.

(2) All Chinese employees to be reinstated, and the strike not to be used as a pretext to dismiss them.

(3) Pay to be continued to Chinese employees during the strike, and not docked.

(4) Both gates to be open until 11 p.m.; after that time employers to be responsible for procuring passage for their employers.

(5) All work to stop on Shameen at 9 p.m. at the latest, except on dinner party nights.

Concessions Held Out.

The French Consul-General next explained to the Delegates that as a result of the conversation which had taken palce between the mediators of both sides, the Shameen Consuls were prepared to make the following concessions to the employees:

(1) They would cancel the new Police Permit Regulations, known to the Chinese as the twelve New Clauses, thus returning to the old Regulations that after the gates are closed no Chinese may enter or leave Shameen, unless he is in possession of a special police permit.

(2) Equal treatment of foreigners and Chinese should be secured by such permits being required universally. In the case of yearly permits one photograph would be required to be affixed to the permit. No one, however, could be forced to take out such permits. Temporary passes could be issued for one night, and these would not require a photograph. The application of these new conditions would be made simultaneous for foreigners and Chinese alike. The strikers' delegates objected to the photograph, stating that only criminals in China were required to be photographed. The French Consul-General pointed out that he had thousands of photographs of Chinese who required passports, and that he was aware that car drivers in Canton carried licences bearing their photographs. To this statement there was no reply.

The delegates raised the point of temporary passes, and asked that they should be issued by employers, and not by the Councils, to which the Councils replied that such passes must bear the stamp of the Council, but could be issued through employers, provided numbers were strictly limited to, say, one a week. The delegates said that this point must be referred. They then, leaving the point, raised the question of reinstatement, and asked for a guarantee that all would be reinstated. and would receive pay for the period of the strike. The British Consul-General pointed out that he could give no such guarantee, but he would ascertain the wishes of the community and inform the strikers as regards private servants. No question of public employees was raised.

A mass meeting was held in the evening, and resulted in a unanimous vote that all servants should be reinstated, except (as agreed by the delegates) in cases of misbehaviour on leaving.

As regards payment of wages, 72 per cent. were in favour, while 28 per cent. were against. It was agreed that this could only hold good if they returned within reasonable time, i. e., 24 hours after the meeting with the delegates on July 21. This was conveyed to the delegates at a second conference held in the afternoon of the 21st. At that meeting the terms as then standing were laid before the delegates, who had previously, through their mediators, accepted the principle of four temporary passes a month as a maximum. In regard to the workers affected by the 28 per cent. unwilling to pay wages for the period of the strike, the mediators kindly undertook to raise a fund to cover this.

Police Case Apart

Thus the situation as to a settlement was as follows:—

(1) Traffic Regulations would remain, with minor amendments.

(2) The Police Permit Regulations would be cancelled, the principle of the photograph on the pass would be retained, but the concession to apply to Chinese and foreigners alike. (This concession was agreed to at a meeting of the Consular Body before it was suggested to the delegates.)

(3) A limited number of temporary passes would cover emergencies.

(4) The question of reinstatement and pay during the strike of public servants (other than police) would come under this head. The case of the police would be fully investigated, and dealt with according to the circumstances.

The actual terms offered were as follows.

1. Cancellation of new Police Permit Regulations.

2. Passes with photograph, valid for one year, optional, to be applied simultaneously to foreigners and Chinese.

3. Provisional passes, without photograph, to be obtained through employer, limited to four a month, obligatory, after gates closed for night, for both foreigners and Chinese who have no yearly pass.

4. Reinstatement of private employees agreed to by meeting, payment of wages by at least 72 per cent. provided immediate return to work.

1. Return to work at once.

2. No reprisals on Chinese who stayed in Shameen.

To be accepted en bloc within 24 hours.

The Final Split

The delegates raised the question of the reinstatement of the police, and insisted on this point. It was explained that the police could not be allowed to strike, and that police who did so could not be entrusted in the future with the public safety. The Chinese delegates stated that the police should be reinstated because they had left their posts under compulsion. This, it was stated on the other side, was well known. Agreement on this point could not be reached, although the delegates intimated that they would be satisfied with technical reinstatement, i.e. that having been reinstated, they could afterwards be dismissed. The latter course could not be accepted, and the delegates withdrew. Subsequently a letter was received from them rejecting the five terms en bloc, on the ground that these were at variance with their own terms previously presented.

The British and French Consuls interviewed Mr. C. C. Wu on July 22, and pointed out the responsibility of the Canton authorities for the present situation. Mr. Wu suggested that the police should be reinstated on condition that it be recognized that they were not allowed to strike in future. This, however, did not prove acceptable either to the two Consuls or to the Councils.

Peking, July 30.

Prospects of an early settlement of the Shameen strike are hopeful, according to official telegrams, received in Peking to-day, which indicate that public opinion is crystallizing against continuance of the dispute. The attitude of the strikers themselves appears to favour a settlement, notwithstanding the efforts of a small section of agitators who are doing their utmost to prevent the reaching of an agreement.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Agitators Threatening Violent Measures

Canton, July 31.

Since July 29 the Chinese stevedores in Canton have stopped serving British steamers. Unless a settlement of the Shameen strike comes within a day or two, it is understood that the committee in charge of the strike will agitate for an economic boycott against British firms, induce the Chinese labourers at the Taikoo wharf to declare a sympathetic strike, and influence all Chinese seamen to desert British vessels. The committee has also issued a warning against strikers returning to their employers who might have removed their offices from Shameen to the native city. The Canton military authorities have granted the strikers permission to use the Hoichu Theatre as their headquarters. The committee appears to be well organized. It has special sections in charge of general affairs, confidential business, correspondence, statistics and press service, finance, social relations, food relief, solicitation for funds, and publicity. The committee has succeeded in enlisting the help of the theatrical people and school girls to assist its financial campaign among the public for support.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Police Reinstatement the Crux: Employees Generally Said to Be Tired of Fight

Hongkong, Aug. 2.

The managers and compradores of foreign firms are mediating for a settlement of the Shameen strike. The strikers are insisting on complete reinstatement as a sine qua non. Cargo is accumulating in foreign godowns owing to the refusal of the coolies to handle it.

It is believed that the Shameen employees are entirely out of sympathy with the whole strike movement.

The reinstatement of the Chinese policemen (Lukongs) is the most difficult obstacle to a settlement. The residents of Shameen, the Consuls, and the British and French Municipal Councils refuse to revise their decision regarding the Lukongs.

It is said that the foreign firms are suffering a comparatively small loss owing to the dislocation of trade through the strike, the Chinese dealers being the largest sufferers.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Terms of Settlement Refused by Malcontents: Hope Not Abandoned

Peking, Aug. 4.

The terms for the settlement of the Shameen strike, which were supposed to be the result of an exchange of views between the Chinese and foreign authorities in that region, were submitted to a meeting of the strikers on July 30, according to a foreign telegram sent from Shameen on that day. Acceptance of the terms would have meant bringing the strike to an end, but the strikers refused the terms. The strong attitude they adopted was unexpected. It was attributed locally to the belief on the part of the strikers that the foreign authorities were divided in opinion regarding the proposed terms of settlement.

This impression might have been the result of an editorial that had appeared in a Hongkong paper recommending the authorities concerned to reinstate the Shameen police. Hope of a settlement had not been abandoned, however, and mediation was being carried on by certain foreigners and Chinese.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

HUNGHUTZE ACTIVE ON SUNGARI

Attack on River Steamer Effectively Repulsed by Return of Firing

Harbin, July 30.

The river steamer Kwangchang, belonging to the Bank of Tsitsihar, arrived yesterday in Harbin from the upper reaches of the Sungari. It appears that on her outward trip, when 90 versts from Harbin, a band of about 40 hunghutze appeared on the bank of the river and poured volleys of bullets into the steamer. The guard on the steamer replied with their rifles and a small gun and caused the bandits to cease fire. There were no casualties on the steamer.

On her return trip the vessel met a band of hunghutze at the same spot, but, evidently recognizing the steamer as the one that had so effectually routed them before, the robbers did not attack her.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

AGRICULTURE IN CHINA

U. S. Experts to Conduct Explorations in the Northern Provinces

Washington, July 12.

The Department of Agriculture announces that Dr. P. H. Dorsett, Agricultural Explorer for the U.S. Department of Agriculture, and his son, Mr. J. H. Dorsett, Collaborator with the U.S. Department of Agriculture, will sail from San Francisco on the President Wilson on July 22 for Shanghai to conduct agricultural explorations in the provinces of Chihli and Shensi and in Manchuria. They will spend two or three years making intensive studies of agricultural conditions and the principal crops with a view to ascertaining in what way a mutual exchange of seeds and plants can be brought about between China and the United States.—Reuter's American Service.

THE Peking Government has found it necessary to circularize the provincial authorities pointing out that the 8th article of the National Constitution guarantees to every Chinese citizen "the secrecy of letters and correspondence which shall not be violated, except in accordance with law." Therefore the recent practice of censoring mail must be stopped unless martial law has been declared.

COUNTRY WEST OF TIENTSIN ONÈ VAST STRETCH OF WATER

Tientsin in Imminent Danger of Inundation: All the Districts Westward Flooded and No Outlet to Sea

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Peking, July 29.

There have been so many reports in the last month concerning the impending danger to Tientsin that I took the opportunity yesterday of investigating the situation at first hand. For many, many days Peking has received reports that Tientsin's to-morrow meant flood—and flood on a much bigger scale than the visitation of 1917. Yet the heavens have closed for only about a week in the last month, and at the time of writing have seemingly opened another reservoir.

The people in Tientsin, I found, are preparing themselves actively for the encroachment of flood waters over the city. They were making their preparations yesterday amid downpours that held no promise of exhaustion. Many have moved their goods from the basements and ground floors to upper storeys, and a few are building dykes round their houses. The engineers I spoke to were not disposed to share in the general alarm. Yet according to their showing, the height of the Hai Ho, to which an area of over 85,000 square miles (the area of Great Britain) is tributary, had reached a record level, 18.35 feet when I was in Tientsin.

A Vast Accumulation.

That is bad enough in itself, but it is nothing when compared with the height of the waters still to be negotiated to the sea. The volume of the up-country waters is immense, and growing in momentum. The waters at the bridge just outside the Tientsin railway station are no less than eight feet lower than those 12 miles up the river at a point called Yangliuching, which is situated on one of the feeders to the Hai Ho. The other feeders—and they converge on the Hai Ho near Yangliuching from north, south and west—are almost equally swollen with the flood waters of half-a-dozen rivers. This is sufficient to indicate the vast accumulation of water in the hinterland seeking its regular outlet at Tientsin. On top of this, the countryside for hundreds of square miles in the basins of the tributaries is flooded, while the rain continues to fall incessantly, washing clear the rain-soaked earth remaining uncovered by water into the channels. The rains now falling, therefore, bring wholesale floods much nearer than would ordinary rains, much of which is of course absorbed before they develop flood tendencies.

What is being done to prevent what may be a catastrophe to Tientsin? If the authorities had taken action right at the start of the floods, they might have been able, with the aid of an army of coolies, to build a rude canal from the Hsi Ho to the sea as an alternative channel to the Hai Ho. But there was no indication that the rains were to develop into the present floods; and, in addition, it would have been next to impossible, not only to mobilize the vast aggregate of labour required, but to persuade the villagers and farmers that such operations were in their best interests. Now it is suggested that the Hsi Ho should be breached, allowing the flood waters to flow seaward willy-nilly over the intervening country. However, the Civil Governor, Wang Cheng-ping will not allow the plan to be put into execution, saying that he will not arbitrarily flood the villages south of Tientsin for the benefit of Tientsin. The Chinese authorities, instead of breaching the Hsi Ho, are employing thousands of labourers in the task of strengthening the the south bank of the Taching Ho night and day, working frantically to prevent the submerging of their homes. Their nightly vigil may at any time be interrupted by the overflow of the Taching on the south as well as the north. On top of the dyke they look out on a horizon-stretch of water covering fields and villages, in which men were sharing in the common task of agricultural employment four weeks ago. Now most of them are on the south side of the river, working to save the holdings of the farmers on the dry bank. If these heavy rains keep on, it is doubtful whether they will see them much longer; they will disappear from sight as they did in 1917. It is this area that will eventually be the center of the famine belt. In the spring the winter sowing was killed by drought, now the autumn and winter crops are ruined by floods. It is a question whether there will be any crop next spring.

Too Great a Responsibility

In consequence of the Civil Governor's refusal to release the Hsi Ho, a greater and greater strain is put on the Hai Ho, which, by the labours of the Hai Ho Conservancy Board, has already done noble work in trying to drain the excessive rainfall to the ocean. Incidentally, many foreigners whose property is endangered by the floods are not so ready to criticize Wang Cheng-ping as one might suppose. They understand his position in refusing to incur the responsibility of deluging the southern territory with the surplus waters of the Hai Ho feeders. Even if he had ordered the cutting of the dykes, there would have been further obstructions to overcome before the waters could have found their way to the sea. The Tientsin-Pukow line is the first. On the east side of this line, the villagers, no doubt aware of the misery in store for their luckless fellow-provincials in the northwest, are blocking all the culverts under the embankment, and in other ways showing their determination to try to stem any onrush that shows any inclination to sweep over their land.

One is under no illusion as to their action in the event of the order being given that it be purposely flooded. Then there are the outer and inner dykes of the Grand Canal that would keep back for a time any onrushing torrent. At the same time, the release of flood waters from the Hsi Ho to the railway embankments would relieve Tientsin of a good deal of anxiety, but at the expense of much life and property in the inundated area, full accounting for which would undoubtedly be taken at the first opportune moment.

2,000 Villages Inundated.

The Yung Ting Ho, which flows through the country between Peking and Tientsin, is perpetually shifting its course. It has never really had a proper bed; it flows along a shelf with the surrounding country under its malign shadow. When floods come, the river in certain parts of its course simply tips over, leaving the people to wait patiently for a return to normal conditions, when they try to move the river back to its former course. Now it is pursuing its erratic way over the whole countryside, fed by the relentless rain and the drainage from the higher levels.

With the terrified villagers, augmented by coolie labour, working on the dykes throughout the entire Hai Ho system, the outlook for Tientsin in the opinion of many people is alarming. The discharge of the Hai Ho is inevitably increasing, and another grave factor is the presence of considerable bodies of silt which may soon impede the smooth passage of the waters, forcing them over the banks. It is said that one can now go by boat from Paotingfu to Tientsin and that throughout the entire province over 2,000 villages have been inundated.

Reconnoitring by Aeroplane

Peking, Aug. 1.

A party, including famine relief and Chihli River Commission officials, correspondents and a cinematographer, this morning flew over the flooded areas of Peking and Tientsin in an aeroplane placed at their disposal by the Director of Aviation.

The party was piloted to the north ridge of the Hsi Ho, which yesterday rose to the 1917 maximum. Seen perilously near, the top of the dykes and the railways did not appear to be in immediate danger though the water was lying at the foot of the embankments on both sides for many miles. Most of the villages were high and dry but it was evident that the farmers will be hard hit.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

IN ADDITION TO THE MAINSTREAMS SHOWN AROVE THE COUNTRY IS INTERSECTED BY MANY SMALL CREEKS. THE LITTLE DOTS DENOTE MARSHY GROUND. EXISTING CHANNELS TO THE SEA ARE UTTERLY INADEQUATE TO CARRY OFF EXCESS WATER.

River Lower Through Bursting of Hsih-ho Dyke

Tientsin, Aug. 3.

The Hsi-ho dyke burst this morning near Yangliuching, flooding the depression to the South between the Grand Canal and the Hsi Ho. As an immediate result Tientsin's river is a foot lower and it is anticipated that this relief will continue for four days when the depression will be filled. The water is then expected to burst the Grand Canal dykes and flow to the sea.

Heavy rains continue up-country. Tientsin had 2¾ inches of rainfall this morning. — Reuter's Pacific Service.

Tientsin's Increasing Anxiety

Peking, Aug. 5.

Fairly heavy rain during the last two nights and unsettled showery weather to-day are causing increasing anxiety with regard to Tientsin, while the country districts between Peking and Tientsin are suffering severely. The oldest foreign residents of Peking decribe the weather as unprecedented, there having been only a few fine days in six weeks.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

Bridge of Boats Swept Away.

Tientsin, Aug. 5.

A bridge of boats over the Hai Ho was carried off yesterday evening by the force of the current. It is variously estimated that between 10 and 20 coolies working on it were drowned. The boats drifted against the Austrian Bridge, where the authorities destroyed them by burning them.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE Ministry of Agriculture and Commerce at the meeting of the Cabinet on Saturday brought forward the question of the legality of the so-called prize bond issues, contending that these were in reality merely lotteries, says Reuter. The Ministry recommends suppression of these issues without regard to the persons or bodies by whom they are being promoted, in accordance with the Lottery Suppression Mandate issued in 1922. The Cabinet concurred and instructions were given to the Ministries of Finance, Interior and Agriculture and Commerce to make full investigations into the matter with a view to rigid suppression in future.

AEROPLANE INSPECTION OF FLOODS IN CHIHLI PROVINCE

Famine Relief and River Commission Officials' Bird's-eye View of Devastated Districts: Villagers Guarding the Dykes: Crops Completely Ruined

Peking, Aug. 4.

Due to the generosity of the Director-General of Aviation in making a large passenger aeroplane available, and to the no less commendable action of Mr. W. G. Northridge, who undertook to act as pilot (in spite of the fact that later on in the day he inaugurated a passenger service to Peitaiho), a party of ten, including Famine Relief Commission and Chihli River Commission officials, several correspondents and a cinematographer, were this morning given what may accurately be described as an armchair view from the air of the flooded areas between here and Tientsin. Not the whole of the area under water was seen—that would take considerable longer than the two and a half hours which the party spent in the air this morning—but the reconnaisance was wide enough in extent to give a very fair view of the general situation.

The investigators were fortunate in having with them Mr. S. Eliason, of the Chihli River Commission, who made a special trip down from Tientsin last night and brought with him an armful of charts and maps. Others specially interested in the results of the tour were Messrs. W. H. Mallory and F. S. Djang, Executive Secretary and Associate Executive Secretary, respectively, of the China International Famine Relief Commission, Peking.

After a perfect take-off from Nanyuan at 9 o'clock the plane flew over General Feng Yu-hsiang's camps, and followed along the Peking-Mukden railway as far as the outskirts of Tientsin. Turning to the westward, it then followed the Hai Ho up to Yang-lu-ching and returned towards Tientsin down the Tientsin-Pukow railway. Thence it made the journey back to Nanyuan by much the same route that was taken on the trip out.

Precautions Against Breaking of Hai Ho Dykes

Soon after the Peking-Mukden railway had been picked up the break in the dyke at Ho-lu-fa was seen to the westward. Shortly afterwards the plane was passing over the flooded country north of Laofa, where a big depression has been filled up by the water which has flowed through breaks in the Hai Ho dykes made at Tsaichun and elsewhere. Flying sometimes as low down as a hundred feet, the observers had an excellent view of the Hai Ho, which, according to Mr. Eliason, rose yesterday up to the 1917 maximum of 7.9 metres. It seemed to be about twice its normal width and was perilously near to the top of the dykes which are at present keeping it from brimming its banks. Eddies and swirls clearly discernible on the surface of the river here and there marked the swiftness of its flow. Near Yang-lu-ching, on the southern bank of the Hai Ho, groups of men were seen moving about like a colony of ants amongst a long line of little matsheds rigged up as temporary shelters. These were the farmers and villagers from the surrounding country and they were guarding the dykes with sandbags against the encroachment of the flood waters and with firearms against possible attempts on the part of other people to breach the dykes. These are the folk who would suffer inundation at once if the suggestion to breach the dykes of the Hai Ho at certain points near were carried cut. Expert opinion is that if they can manage to fight back the flood waters for the next three weeks they may be able to escape with little damage to their property, but if, on the other hand, the river should burst its bounds, then their fate will be worse than if the dykes had been allowed to be breached when the suggestion was first put forward some time ago. At all events, the people themselves seem quite determined to take a chance on it, however long the odds may be.

Tientsin's Surroundings

The precarious situation of the Red Bridge at Tientsin was clearly seen and it was noted that in this vicinity there were several houses partly under water. In the greater part of the area of several hundred square miles passed over this morning most of the houses seemed to have escaped this fate. This is due to the fact that nearly all the villages in the big river basins, where the threat of floods is a constantly present one, are built up on prominences which have now, in most instances, become islands between which the only possible communication is by means of sampans.

The railway lines seem to be in no immediate danger although for many miles the water is lapping along the foot of the embankments on both sides. One of the most extensive of the flooded areas is the basin of the Ta Ching Ho which, though the aeroplane merely skirted it, appeared like an inland sea. Even an aerial survey of the affected regions would take probably several days, but it was evident this morning that the farmers in the Peking-Tientsin district are going to have a pretty hard time of it this year and most likely next year as well. Owing to drought (a word which sounded strangely in the ears of those who saw the vast inundation this morning) the spring crops were poor; in many cases it is extremely unlikely that the present crop will ever be harvested and it is considered doubtful whether in some of the worst affected areas the water will have drained off sufficiently by the autumn to make possible the planting of the next one.

As regards Tientsin, the situation is still doubtful, but it is thought that if the flood waters do reach the city, they will do so gradually. In some cases, it was stated this morning, people living above the flood levels are making sandbag dykes around their houses, while others living in the lower areas are taking no precautions at all.

Measures for Flood Relief

A committee has been formed by the Ministry of Communications to deal with questions relating to flood relief. It is divided into two sections, one of which will be advisory and the other executive. Mr. Chuan Liang will be Chairman.

Mr. Liu Meng-hang, Governor of the Metropolitan Area, has sent a petition to the President asking for a special department to be formed under his control to attend to measures to prevent flooding in the area.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE KALGAN FLOODS

Labour Relief Scheme Started

Mr. T. Y. Yang, Assistant Engineer of the China International Famine Relief Commission, who was sent to Kalgan with a shipment of grain for administering relief there reports that a local international committee has been formed with the following personnel:—Honorary Chairmen: Mr. Chang Hsi Yuan, Tutung of Charhar, Mr. E. F. Stanton, U. S. Consul-General, Secretaries: Mr. Carl G. Soberbom, (Methodist Mission), Mr. Chang Wen-hsuen, (Bureau of Foreign Affairs); Treasurers: Mr. E. Vincent (Catholic Mission); Mr. Liu Shih Chung, (Charhar Finance Bureau); and Mr. Ingvald Hannevik, (Salvation Army); Mr. Chao Ching (Charhar Educational Bureau). This Committee will be the Kalgan Committee of the Chihli Provincial Committee of the Famine Commission.

Mr. Yang reports that several miles south of Kalgan, there are some villages which were heavily damaged. In order to adopt the labour relief policy of the Commission, Mr. Yang is now investigating the place and recruiting labourers with a view to carry out salvage projects in these damaged villages.

Flood reports recently received by the China International Famine Commission state that Kaoyang, Ihsion and Wangpoo are also flooded. Pao Tao is likewise in danger, as the South Grand Canal has risen.

NORTH CHINA'S ETERNAL DANGER FROM LACK OF PROPER WATER-COURSES

A Situation as if the Humber Were the Only Outlet for All the Rivers of England: Afforestation And New Channels to the Sea

From Our Own Correspondent.

Peking, July 30.

Whether Tientsin is flooded or not, the problem of the Hai Ho system will remain. It is a problem that develops in seriousness with the arrival of every flood season. The writer has not the technical information at hand, but it seems to him, after a cursory study of the conditions, strengthened by several talks with technical men, that the problem can best be visualized by imagining the Humber or some such channel as the solitary outlet for the river system of Great Britain. At any rate, an area equal to that of Great Britain is dependent on the Hai Ho, causing a situation fraught with increasing danger to the economic life of the whole province.

China's Rivers Unique.

Rivers in China are unlike the rivers of most other countries. They have a habit of wandering over the whole countryside, ever seeking fresh fields to devastate. One of the causes is the lack of the attention usually devoted to rivers to keep them pegged; another is the rapidly-increasing amount of siltage down to the rivers at every flood season. The Yung Ting Ho, instead of flowing along a regular course, elects a movable shelf as its bed, as disdainful of the surrounding country as the hanging gardens of Babylon must have been. This is well illustrated by a tile model of the Hai Ho system in the office of the Chihli River Commission on which the Yung Ting seems to bridge rather than cut the Peking-Tientsin area.

Such rivers, of course, have to scour their own channels, but even so it might not be impossible to train it to flow with some regard for stability. At present silt content in time of flood is no less than 15 per cent. As it is now discharging at the rate of 4,000 cubic metres per second, or a fourth of the discharge of the Yellow River in time of flood, the amount of silt now being brought down, must be tremendous.

This extraordinary situation is the result of north China's lack of forests, coupled with the deforestation pursued over the last half century. As Mr. Sowerby has said, we are rapidly approaching desert conditions in north China. Even where woods relieve the bare country, they are being rapidly shorn off the face of the earth by people who have an annual fuel problem to settle. Hence, considerable erosion takes place every year. There is no hold for the earth and the rivers are therefore fed not only by the rains but by the very hillsides.

Forestation Ideals.

The forestation of the Chihli territory on any large scale, however, seems well-nigh impossible. In addition to the rainfall, the trees have to be watered for two years at the rate of 20 gallons a year to ensure their life. Owing to periodical droughts, the work is always meeting with setbacks. For example, in Shansi province, where systematic forestation is being undertaken, last year's seedlings were decimated by the recent drought. It would need an army of coolies to forest the Western Hills alone; and it would need another army of guards to police the Hills after they had been covered. It would be years and years before the whole area could be covered sufficiently, even with this help, to prevent the rapid run-off of the rainfall that now takes place and to tighten the land.

If by some wild chance all this work could be accomplished for the benefit of posterity, it does not follow that floods would thereby be prevented. Forestation has many enthusiasts in China, and China needs forestation badly, but it is not likely that it would solve the problem of the floods in north China, as is sometimes asserted. Floods are abnormal occurrences, and the one from which this province is now suffering would have come, trees or no trees. Forests would have lessened the damage, but that is all. They would have broken the force of the first waters, they would have held the hillsides, but the subsequent floods would have run off as they are doing to-day.

Another Channel Needed.

The problem in north China seems to be concerned with the building of another channel to supplement the work of the Hai Ho. This could either follow the course of the Chin Chung Ho, emptying the flood waters of the Yung Ting Ho and the Pei Ho into the sea about 10 to 15 miles higher up the coast from the mouth of the Hai Ho, or it could be cut from the Hsi Ho south of the Hai Ho. If the latter course were adopted, then Tientsin's permanent safety would be almost assured. As it is, it lives under the perpetual menace of floods, and this year, owing to the immense aggregate of waters still to be drained off, cannot be certain of escaping a thorough wetting until the end of August.

Conservancy works in Chihli would cost millions of dollars. It could be raised only from such a fund as will be available from the surtaxes to be imposed on posts, telegraphs and other services. When the Government approved these charges, it was said that the funds would all go to the flood sufferers. What better relief could be put in hand than the construction of works destined to save them from a repetition of the disaster? The China International Famine Relief Commission and voluntary assistance could look after temporary means of relief. It would be wise policy on the part of the Government to announce its readiness to pool its surtax funds from posts and telegraphs with those it expects from the Customs. Providing the tariff powers assent to the request for permission to impose a surtax on the Customs, the combined funds would furnish the framework of the financial side of either of the conservancy schemes previously mentioned. (If the Yung Ting river is not returned to its proper course, by the way, there would be only one logical scheme, a channel south of Tientsin, and that would be the most beneficial.)

Labour Relief.

It is the policy of the Famine Relief Commission to dispose of their own funds, and any funds entrusted to them, in labour relief. This policy was adopted by the Red Cross during the famine of 1920 and 1921. In the letters to the Diplomatic Corps the point is made clear, as is another point more important to foreigners, namely, that the funds would be entirely under their supervision. Preliminary labour relief in the case of the coming famine will undoubtedly take the form of loans of grain, etc., to local associations. In the last two years, loans up to about two million dollars, the largest individual loan being a quarter of a million, have been advanced to various provincial organizations, and no loss has yet been sustained. In Hunan province they are advancing a loan in the shape of consignments of seed rice, to the account of a local land bureau. In Chihli and other provinces, when the famine comes, they will sink large sums of returnable money in similar advances.

Surtax for Bigger Scheme.

This way of handling relief would not eat into the funds contained in the surtax collections. It would leave them intact for the ambitious scheme of flood prevention works in this province. If the Powers allow the surtax in accordance with the suggestions made to them, both by the Government and the Commission, then the latter would most likely choose the Hai Ho scheme as the one offering the best opportunities for labour relief and for the accomplishment of the most good, and work in cooperation with the Chihli River Commission. If the Powers refuse to countenance the proposal, then there is little hope that it will ever be undertaken, for even ordinary conservancy work in these times is beyond the purse of the Central Government.

KUANGTUNG FLOODS RECEDING

But 3,000 Lives Estimated Lost and Extensive Relief Work Imperative

[illegible] DENT.

Hongkong, July 27.

It is likely that the much-dreaded flood in Canton proper may be averted, as the water inundating the western suburbs has receded considerably. Reports from Wuchow indicate that the water levels have fallen several feet there also. Information from eight of the affected districts in the Canton Delta, including Kohming, Kohyue, Fungcheun, Watnam, Loting, Sunhing, Takbing, and Namhoi, though not complete, of course, show that more than 49,000 mow of rice crops have been destroyed thus far.

Apart from the damage to houses, rough estimates give no less than 3,000 lives as having been lost. In the absence of any official figures along this line and as we have to depend wholly on reports by relief missions returning from the affected areas, a thorough knowledge of the exact loss in this flood will be impossible.

The relief work for the West River sufferers has been done chiefly by the Kuangtung Merchants Volunteer Corps, which is powerful enough to resist seizure of food stuffs by Dr. Sun Yat-sen's mercenaries now unfed and at large in many parts of Kuangtung. The Volunteers despatch guards to all ships carrying supplies to the affected districts. Up to July 26 the Merchants Volunteer Corps had raised among the merchants more than $60,000 for the several expeditions of relief, and the fifth relief fleet was to have left last Sunday for the inner ports along the West River.

The Volunteers have been much encouraged in their relief work by the support, given by the Hongkong Chinese merchants. In addition to the $10,000 remitted to Canton a week ago, the Hongkong Chinese during the week ending July 26 sent up 1,352 bags of rice and another cheque for $10,000. In addition to food stuffs, medicine, and the like, the relief ships usually carry much materials for the repair of damaged dykes. With the Merchants Volunteers, the Nanyang Brothers Tobacco Company are also contributing funds and lending the services of launches and the good offices of their agencies.

FLOOD STILL MENACING HANKOW

Water Over the Bund in the Concessions: Situation Serious in Wuchang

From Our Own Correspondent.

Wuchang, July 26.

Although the Yangtze has ceased to rise for the present, it is feared that it may in a few days, causing further destruction. At present, the streets on the river side of the city are under water. Outside the Hanyang Gate, the "Chopsticks-Street" is under two feet of water. Along this street live the makers of chopsticks, who make their wares by cutting up large bamboo trees which have been floated down the Hsiang River from Hunan. Higher up, where the ground is lower, the water has entered the Wen Ch'ang Gate. In the same part, four hemp warehouses have suffered loss by partial destruction of their stores of raw material.

Above the city, an embankment flanking the river shows several weak places. Last Thursday the Governor made a personal tour of inspection in this part, and gave orders for these weak places to be repaired. Below the city, a long embankment stretches to Chinshan, 30 li (10 miles) down the river. This is reported to be sound enough; but the lowest parts of it are little more than a foot above the water-level, and it is feared that if a wind arose in a certain direction, the waves might be driven over, causing some amount of damage.

On the Hankow side, the river has flooded slightly over the bund pavement on all the concessions, the depth varying from three or four inches on the British Concession to six or seven in the Special Administration District (late German Concession). Lower down still, the Japanese Concession, which has been more seriously threatened, is protected by a temporary barrier of sandbags, reinforced with branches of trees.

Between Hankow and Hanyang the Han is flowing down swiftly, the "dragon water" being swelled by the heavy rains which have fallen up-country. To cross it now in a sampan is a perilous task. Small boats have to work their way close to the bank for a long way upstream, before they can row across, being carried downwards all the time as they make their way across the current. One boat with six or seven people on board was caught in the eddy of a whirlpool, and was unable to escape before it was sucked down, and all were drowned. A house on the bank of the Han in Hankow collapsed and fell into the stream; but fortunately this occurred during the day time, and no lives were lost.

One of the immediate problems facing the Wuchang military authorities, is the fact that many of the soldiers have not been paid for a long time. The worst sufferers in this respect are the men of the Second Mixed Brigade, who have not received any pay for 14 months. Other regiments can claim pay overdue for periods varying from eight or nine months down to three or four. It is calculated that the total amount of money due to the troops in Wuchang is $16,000. Governor Hsiao has sent telegrams both to Marshal Wu Pei-fu in Loyang and to the Central Government, asking for a grant of money at once to relieve the situation.

Dyke Bursts Near Wuchang

Wuchang, July 31.

One of the embankments near Wuchang has given way. It is the embankment which confines the lake on the northwest side of the city. Owing to its breaking, a great many fields have been flooded, in a belt of land which stretches toward Chinshan. Last year, this embankment was repaired at great expense by a native contractor who lives at Chinshan. The work was reported good, and guaranteed for two years. The said contractor has been arrested and taken to the Civil Governor's yamen, where his alleged misdeeds will be strictly inquired into.

Means are being taken by the Chinese authorities to bring some relief to the sufferers from the floods in Hupeh. Last Sunday, Governor Hsiao assembled at his yamên the chiefs of the various departments, and the Chianghan Taoyin, in order to discuss what measures might be taken. The first step was to collect the reports of the county magistrates detailing the amount of damage suffered in their respective districts. Each magistrate is to collect the Seng Shih's or squires of his neighbourhood, and get them to store the available rice for public distribution. Information is to be collected about those who have been the chief sufferers, and assistance is to be given at once to those whose need is immediate. The second step decided upon is to find employment in factories and workshops for those who have been rendered destitute. This is recognized as a project difficult to carry out, and the magistrates in the counties are asked to have an investigation carried out, to discover what poor people can be collected for such employment, and what employment can be found for them.

In reply to protests by the Chinese Emigrants' Association and Chinese Residents' Mutual Support Society in Japan, the Japanese authorities have issued a statement on the question of restricting the entrance of Chinese workmen into Japan. The Japanese Government, in prohibiting the entry of Chinese labourers, says the statement has no other object in view than to prevent the landing of undesirables without money and whose mode of life might give rise to an epidemic of dangerous diseases. If the class of emigrant improves, the Japanese Government will relax its vigilance. For the present, with the exception of loafers and unemployed coolies, who are strictly forbidden to land in Japan, those who wish to be admitted into the country must have a certain amount of money, guarantees of employment and passports.

TIMBER DESTRUCTION CAUSE OF FLOODS

Mr. A. de C. Sowerby's Agitation to Save Eastern Tombs Area Taken up in Parliament

Mr. Sowerby's article on forestry in China which appeared in the July issue of the "China Journal of Science and Arts," and in which he deprecated the destruction of the forests in North China, especially those in the Tung Ling or Eastern Tombs area of Chihli, northeast of Peking, was made the subject of a leader recently in the "Far Eastern Times" in Peking. At the session of Parliament on Saturday, July 18, a resolution was introduced calling attention to the destruction of the forests in the Eastern Tombs which had already taken place, and to the threatened destruction of the forests of the Western Tombs.

The following is a translation of a short article in the "Ching Pao" of July 20:—

"The Imperial Burial Ground of the Tsing Dynasty consists of eastern and western divisions in Chihli Province. There are altogether several hundred square miles of land covered with great forests, the value of which amounts to several hundred millions of dollars. At present there are a number of officers, who, after consulting with the old families of the Tsing Dynasty, tried to sell both the land and forests and convert the money so gained to their own use. The citizens of Chihli, under the leadership of Mr. Chang Chang-ling, have petitioned Parliament and protested against the selling of this valuable property.

Following are the general contents of the petition:—

"'The Eastern and Western Divisions of the Imperial Burial Ground have several hundred miles of forests. It is an historical place. No people are allowed to enter the woods, or to cut down the trees. There is absolutely no reason why this public land should be secretly sold for the selfish ends of a few corrupt officials. When the Tsings first came to China, they kept the Imperial Burial Ground of the Mings for 200 years. No people dared to cut the trees in the Imperial Burial Grounds of the ancient Kings and Emperors and as such were preserved. Besides, the cutting of woods in China has caused China's great sorrow. It is very important for the present Government to put an end to this secret selling. When Premier Chien Nung-hsuan came to office, he wrongly permitted the selling of a few parts of the Tsing's property. All the people of China claimed that selling this property was a great mistake. The selling of Tsing's Imperial Burial Ground at present is certainly a great wrong. This undertaking is a national disgrace. We earnestly send you the above petition and are very anxious that Your Excellency will seriously consider this matter."

"'(Signed) Chang Chong-ling, Paw Yung-yee, Kai Pah-zung, Zi Van-ching, Chang Lu-chun."

Mr. Sowerby has been agitating for the preservation of the Tung Ling forests for many years. It is one of the ironies of fate, or of bad government, that this action should be taken now that the forests have practically been destroyed. Considering the agitation that has been going on to reforest the mountains of North China in order to assist in preventing floods, the non-interference of the Chinese Government in this matter is little short of criminal. It is to be sincerely hoped that this present little movement will not end in mere vaporizations, as so many attempts at reform do in China.

An amusing tale of spirit photography is narrated by the Hankow native press. For some time past Gen. Kow Pee-cheng, Commander of the 2nd Hupeh Brigade, has been informing his friend that he is a descendant of Kow Lai-kung—a famous general of ancient Cathay—and to bring conviction of the truth of his statements he ordered the Zenith Studio to assist him in his attempt to call up the spirit of his long-departed relative. An attempt was made upon the Tortoise Hill at Hanyang, and, after the expenditure of several plates to no purpose, at last a photograph of the spirit of the old gentleman was caught successfully!

PANCHAN LAMA'S FALSE PROPHECY

Rain that Did not Come: Holy Man Unruffled: Local Deities Unfortunately "On a Trip to Heaven"! Promise to Approach Them on Their Return

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Lanchow, Kan., July 16.

"Rain has fallen in abundance" sounds a commonplace item. But this year the anxiety over the drought of early summer was too manifest to be easily forgotten.

In cities and villages, crowds of men and boys with garlands of willow, and banners displayed, to the accompaniment of drums, escorted their gods in sedan chairs to and from various temples, and in procession through the streets. The Governor, followed by his troops, each man with burning incense, went on foot to pray for rain. Taoist priests took up water from the Yellow River. Even the great Panchan Lama, now in town, was invoked to the aid of the people. It is said that the country magistrate telephoned to him for help. He replied that by the 19th of the sixth moon the rain would fall. But that date arrived, and still no rain came. So the magistrate telephoned again for an explanation. This was readily forthcoming. "There are two dragons in Lanchow who control the rainfall. Both of them are absent on a trip to Heaven. They will, however, return, and then the Lama will put the matter before them."

Anyhow, the weather, which was getting uncomfortably hot, broke at last. And when it did so, the rain came in some places with terrific violence. Washouts on the road were common, and I had the pleasure of watching the village street of a place eight miles away become a roaring torrent, while the river of that village was impassable also. In one village about 200 sheep, several bullocks, and even three children were washed away and drowned.

Short-sight Road Building Schemes

All this has a bearing on the proposed motor-roads for the province. Unless really good work is done, the projected routes by Pingliang to link up with the Lunghai railway and the Tsinchow line are foredoomed to failure. There is much more hope of the route northwards, by Ningsia and Mongolia, to join the Kalgan line at Paotou. But can the officials be brought to see this, and to put aside the expression of their political sympathies with Loyang by the building of a direct road thither, in favour of the more practical route?

APPEAL IN SCHERER CASE

Several People Now Declare They Saw Child Hit: Their Evidence Ruled Out

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Mukden, July 29.

The first hearing of the appeal in the Scherer case, the German engineer who was sentenced to seven years imprisonment by the Mukden Chinese Court on June 28 on a charge of causing the death of a Chinese boy, took place yesterday in the Mukden District Court.

The hearing, however, resulted in a further adjournment. The evidence against the accused was again taken, and certain discrepancies in the statements made on the occasion of the trial were noted. That is, certain spectators of the incident who formerly said they did not actually see Scherer strike the boy now assert that they did. The Court of Appeal, therefore, have found it necessary to rule out all but the evidence of the aunt Fang.

The defence will be taken from the accused at the next hearing, and fresh medical evidence, which we are not at liberty now to disclose, will be brought to bear, in favour of the accused.

During his first week or so in the Chinese prison, Scherer was confined in a very narrow cell and met with all the inconveniences to which the ordinary prisoners have to submit, and consequently suffered considerably from the effects of confinement in no degree lightened by the realization of his position. Now, however, after efforts have been made in his behalf, he has been allotted a larger cell and has a bath, attendance from his boy once daily, tobacco and books, and is allowed a little freedom and exercise.

This renewal of acquaintance with the amenities of life has greatly improved his spirit and checked that tendency towards abnormality of mind which was observed approaching.

The sentence of seven years imprisonment which looked so severe from the foreign point of view was the ordinary Chinese sentence for that class of alleged offence, and was not commuted because the trial apparently could not admit of any extenuating circumstances.

The (second) date of the hearing has not yet been fixed but opinion here is much more sanguine as to the results.

THE German Minister has addressed a Note to the Government, requesting that at the trial of cases concerning German subjects at the Shanghai Mixed Court, a neutral assessor should sit with the Magistrate as a safeguard against abuses, reports a Peking telegram to the "Sinwanpao."

KUANGTUNG'S NEW COINAGE

Old Money Outlawed for Payment of Taxes under Threat of Severe Penalties

FROM OUR CHINESE CORRESPONDENT.

Hongkong, July 27.

From August 1 next all payments of taxes and public dues in Canton must be made in the coins of the 13th Year of the Republic, according to an order of Dr. Sun Yat-sen issued a few days ago. Officials accepting taxes in Canton coins earlier than those of the year 1924 will be fined from $50 to $500, and persons tendering outlawed coins will be liable to a fine of $10 to $100.

The reason officially advanced for the outlawing of the old coins is that many of them are of low standard. Some merchants of Canton say they prefer those of earlier date to the new coins issued by Dr. Sun. The latter in order to push the circulation of the new coins has been fining exchange shops $100 each for refusing to negotiate them.

Not all the shops will submit to the fines, however. On the evening of July 22, when several of Dr. Sun's agents attempted to force the Shun Hung Native Bank to accept $200 worth of the new coins for some Hongkong notes, the shop resisted and Dr. Sun's men could not do anything, as the policeman on duty was unwilling to help them, according to the "Chut Sup Yi Hong Sheung Pao."

The new coins of Dr. Sun are now worth about 70 per cent. of the Hongkong currency, and one day last week in Canton people had to offer Canton $131.40 for $100 Hongkong currency. Dr. Sun's Canton Mint has still a large quantity of new coins to be disposed of and, until they are all out on the market, no more coins will be minted. Reports from Szechuan indicate that the people there are refusing further to negotiate coins from Kuangtung on account of their low standard, in spite of repeated assertion on the part of Dr. Sun's agents that their output is of regular standard.

Supporters of Dr. Sun affirm that the large quantity of low grade Canton coins must have come from illicit mints of Japanese origin, while not a few Cantonese believe that the bad coins have been coined locally by persons under protection of the militarists now controlling Kuangtung.

DR. Harold W. Fort, Chancellor of the South Dakota Normal and Industrial College, has been engaged as rural community adviser by the Japanese Government, and is expected to arrive in Tokyo early in October.

WEST CHINA HAS A GOOD REPORT

Steamer that Flies Both French and German Flags: Trade for Plenty of Ships

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Kiatingfu, Sze., July 18.

Steam navigation has opened for this year, by the arrival of Messrs Barry Dodwell's motor boat the Chwanlan. True, there was another small vessel came into port the day before, of unknown origin and flying the French flag at the masthead and the German flag at the stern. We failed to make out her nationality, and no one seemed to known her register. As far as we could see she brought no cargo and took little away with her. The Chwanlan brought foreign stores and cotton and took away silk refuse which is sent to France, and a full passenger list. What appeared most abundant on the ship was the large shipment (not on the manifest) of cigarettes. This, one is led to believe, is the perquisite of the crew and they make good money by the importation of the tobacco.

It is estimated that there will be at least five steamers of different sizes plying on this upper reach of the river this season. The Hsu Tong will likely make a couple of trips.

Water Still Very Low.

We are told that there are some 20 odd ships plying between Chungking and Suifu this season, and plenty of trade for all. And this a good 1,200 miles up the Yangtze from Shanghai.

Officers Training School.

Divisional headquarters here has opened an officers' training school. All last week they were receiving applicants and some 1,200 took the examinations. We have not yet learned the outcome of the test. The General presided in person.

Den Hsi-hou has taken his office of Civil Governor and as far as we are able to learn there seems to be no trouble brewing. True, all parties are not satisfied, nor will they even be in this Province for a good long time at least. One cannot but feel that the only way for peace, permament peace to come this way will be to have some big funerals, or some one to come forth with the strength and conviction to bring some of the offenders to justice. This would mean that there would be some public executions of some of the higher ups. This one fears, will not take place for some long time to come. However it is a safe conjecture that the longer Yang Sen and Den can work in harmony the stronger will be their combination and the weaker will become their opponents.

General Yang Chuen-fang of Luchow has been appointed "Opium suppression Commissioner" for the Province. Now it is the popular report that there is not a general in Szechuan more addicted to the drug than Yang. If this be true, little will be done to suppress opium in this province as long as the duty to suppress it is in the hands of the present officer. He has also, one understands, eleven wives to look after.

Bored with Being Good.

There was a bit of a show up at the base of Mr. Omei the other day. Some of the soldiers, defeated minions of Hsiong Keh-wu, who were taken over by the local General, became tired of the quiet and orderly life as lived by the 8th division and started some trouble in the street. They shot their officer and tried to get out of the city to become bandits. The officers higher up quickly shut the city gates and surrounded the mutineers and the "show" was soon quieted. Some of the soldiers later got out of the city and started for Chiachang, but were checkmated by the quick action of the divisional commander. This seems to be the nearest we can come here in Kiating to anything like unsettled conditions, so well does the local general keep things under control.

Foreign Community.

The local Salt office is having a change of staff. Mr. Normah Ellsworth, who has filled the post here very satisfactorily has been transferred to Peking and his place taken by Mr. Sogola from Peking.

The foreign community at Monkey Mountain, for the summer runs into some 40 families now, and reports of splendid times and summer fun come from the mountain. This is the Kuling of West China and each year there are more families added to the community.

NEW LEPER HOSPITAL FOR SHANTUNG

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Tsinan, Sung., July 29.

When it is remembered that in Shantung alone there are probably 30,000 lepers, the need for a leper hospital in the province is plain. And now that leprosy in its early stages is curable, the scope for such a hospital is a great deal larger than in the days when a leper hospital was little more than a place where the lepers could be segregated.

Building will be started shortly on the new Model Leper Hospital which will be associated with Shantung Christian University. A site has already been secured a short distance to the south of the University Campus at Tsinan. Its cost has been more than covered by a subscription of $2,500 from the Civil Governor of the province, who with other Chinese has shown a very active interest in the furtherance of the scheme. The Hospital will be built at an initial cost of $20,000 by the Mission to Lepers, which will also make an annual grant towards maintenace. The physician-in-charge will be Dr. L. F. Heimburger, Associate Professor of Dermatology, Shantung Christian University, and Director of the out-patient department, University Hospital. The hospital will be planned to accommodate a minimum of 50 patients and a maximum of 200 patients. It is hoped that as a result of the founding of this hospital similar institutions will be established by the Chinese in other parts of North China.

A RED AMBASSADOR

Karakhan Presents Credentials to President Tsao with All Solemnity

Peking, July 31.

Mr. L. M. Karakhan, Soviet Ambassador, presented his credentials to President Tsao Kun this morning at 11 o'clock, with a ceremony just a little more imposing than the procedure followed in the case of a foreign Minister. The President sent two carriages, the Yuan state carriage and another vehicle, to convey the visitors to the Huai Jen Tang, with the Grand Master of Ceremonies, the Assistant Grand Master of Ceremonies and a military escort.

On arrival at the Palace an infantry regiment that was drawn up in waiting gave a military salute. A Chinese band played the Soviet national air as the Party entered the Huai Jen Hall. Shortly afterwards the President entered the party and Mr. Karakhan was then escorted to President Tsao and introduced by the Grand Master of Ceremonies. As he approached the President, followed by his staff, Mr. Karakhan and his staff bowed three times. The President returned the courtesy, while the band played the Chinese National Anthem. This was followed by the presentation of the Russian Ambassador's credentials, which the President handed to Dr. Wellington Koo who was assisting at the ceremony. President Tsao then shook hands with Mr. Karakhan and the latter introduced his staff. That brought the ceremony to a conclusion. There were no speeches, but the President expressed the hope that the relations of the two countries would grow ever more cordial and the Russian Ambassador replied appropriately. —Reuter's Pacific Service.

ADMIRAL Sah Chen-ping, Civil Governor of Fukien, who recently submitted his resignation to the Central Government, has telegraphed to Peking stating that he is willing to comply with the Government's instructions to withdraw his resignation temporarily as he desires to work with the Tuli in affording assistance to flood sufferers, says Reuter. Admiral Sah adds that he does not wish to remain in office long, and trusts that the Government will select someone to relieve him in the near future.

MISSION PREMISES AS OFFICES

Canton Catholic Mission's Right to Let Property to Firms Still Questioned

FROM A CHINESE CORRESPONDENT.

Hongkong, July 30.

The Canton Municipality has taken preliminary steps to question the right of the French Catholic Mission in Canton to erect on its compound office buildings to let for ordinary business purposes. The Canton Mayor, Mr. Sun Fo, son of Dr. Sun Yat-sen, has instructed the Chief of the Department of Deeds Inspection to withdraw approval of the property deeds of this mission until the question is settled.

It is now stated that according to the original concession, the 61 mow of lands leased to the French Government by the Chinese for less than $100 a year could only be used for religious, educational, and charitable purposes. Should Dr. Sun's Government succeed in cancelling the grant, they will be able to get $1,000,000 or more to swell Dr. Sun's war chest, for the value of the lands in question has been appraised for more than $1,000 a cheng, or ten Chinese feet square.

LIFE IN FULL SWING AT PEITAIHO

FROM A CORRESPONDENT.

This much frequented place is as usual full of people of all nationals. Almost every house in the place is let: the only exception being a very few badly constructed houses put up by Chinese speculators.

Life is in full swing. The beaches are crowded, there is a cabaret garden with dancing to any hour, concerts, cinemas and meetings of all kinds galore. We have a Country Club with tennis, dances, teas and other social diversions.

Tennis tournaments and picnics to the mountain and other pplaces of interest with the other attractions combine to make Peitaiho an exceedingly active and busy place. Everybody who comes here does so in order to let go and have a good time, and they do so.

The blackmail case seems to be petering out: the Chinese appear to realize they made a mistake. As the question of extraterritoriality is coming up they are anxious not to show their real hand but to excite no adverse comment. This and many other acts of the Chinese show their inner feeling and give us to know what may be expected if their insistent demand is granted.

The fact of the matter is the Chinese are not yet ready to be trusted with this responsibility. They are not sufficiently advanced in their ideas of liberty and the administration of justice. The time will come at some future date when they will have reached the point where their request can be granted —but that is not yet.

THE POLICE TAX AT MOKANSHAN

Association's Long Controversy with Chekiang Authorities on the New Charge

The Mokanshan community are a peaceful flock neither anxious nor constructed by nature to figure in the diplomatic limelight. No little heartsearching has, therefore, been caused by the controversy into which they have been drawn with the Chêkiang Government over the question of an extra house-tax for extra police protection, the more so that the community, being overwhelmingly missionary, is not rich and the proposed charge was a serious addition to the costs of summer residence on the mountain.

The Bandit Scare.

The tax, it may be recalled, was first announced last year. From time immemorial there has been a guard of soldiers on Mokanshan, at "the Camp" at the foot of the Grand Staircase. In view of the scare of brigands, the Chêkiang authorities put extra police on the mountain last year, who were, we think, to be perpetually in residence and besides affording protection were to manage public services, lighting, road maintenance, etc. The latter have always been kept up by the Association, and whatever may be said for the need of a police guard in summer time, there is certainly no call for one in winter, when the mountain is deserted and the houses shut up, with nothing in them that would attract brigands.

Attempts to make the Association agree to a new house-tax to pay for the police were successfully resisted last year. They were renewed this year bright and early; the Association were informed that Peking had granted the larger part of the money necessary and the Association must put down the rest. Consular aid was invoked and a clear expression of opinion was given that the right of the Chinese to impose the tax on the Association could not be admitted. So, after a vast amount of correspondence, the collection of the tax was waived for this year.

Make Terms.

At the same time it was pointed out to the Association that, if they wanted the police kept on the mountain, not to mention the general unpleasantness of living in a state of friction with the provincial authorities, they would be well advised to come to some agreement with Hangchow. Thereupon the Association drafted an agreement which, to put it mildly, could only be described as most injudicious, going far beyond the point at issue and, generally speaking, giving away interests which were never in question. The weakness of the draft has been strongly represented to the Association by those best qualified to criticize and, although the question is to be discussed at the annual meeting of the Association, which takes place to-day, there should be little danger of the draft agreement going into force. At least if there is, householders should certainly rally round to demand another meeting, as the draft agreement would never go through if all interests concerned in it were properly alive to the position.

Compromise Advisable.

The question is really one in which compromise is both feasible and advisable. For the second year now the Chêkiang authorities have refrained, in response to the representations made to them, from collecting the tax, which certainly suggests that they are open to reason. On the other hand, the disturbed state of China is patent to all, and although one has not heard of any bandits on the Wukong side, there are probably people who feel the happier in residence for the knowledge that the police are there on the mountain to scare them away—especially as one hears that the officer in charge of the police is a most charming man well known to many foreigners.

But the tax as originally suggested was certainly not inconsiderable, and the Chêkiang Government cannot be surprised if, in the conditions generally prevailing in China, foreigners are instinctively suspicious of submitting to any taxation. We cannot help thinking that if the Association proposed to Hangchow that they should pay something, but less than first demanded—the community being in no sense a wealthy one—and that a fixed schedule of payments, neither to be departed from nor regarded as a precedent for other charges, should be laid down, the whole dispute could very easily be settled.

Olo Custom.

At the same time something should be done by the Association to get the interests of non-missionary landowners recognized. According to the old grant on which Mokanshan is held, they ought not to be there. But their presence has never been challenged and they have now on their side the right of "user" and of "olo custom" which no Chinese disputes. The case is of the kind in which, if one side gives way a little, the other is sure to do so. Incidentally, there might be a large saving in the expense of the police by withdrawing them in winter time, when there can surely be no need of them on the mountain.

FOREIGN PROPERTY-OWNER'S RIGHTS

Canton Govt. Arbitrarily Encroaching Upon Land for Street Widening

From a Chinese Correspondent.

Hongkong, July 30.

Foreign firms building houses in Canton are subjected to all municipal regulations pertaining to construction works, according to a recent ruling of the Canton Mayor. The claim of H. M. Consul-General that British subjects are exempt from local laws not according to those of their country was not well accepted in the case of the British-American Tobacco Co., which is building a godown on the Bund.

The Municipal Public Works Department in Canton had to cut some lands from the B.-A.T. property recently for street-widening purposes. The firm applied for compensation through the British Consulate-General. The Municipality would not comply with the request, replying that a foreign firm or property owner should allow the government to have such land as would the Chinese. The B.A.T. Company had to take out permits from the Municipal Public Works Department for their buildings like any other Chinese intending to begin construction work.

FOREIGN TRADE IN THE PHILIPPINES

Considerable Increase During First Half-year of 1924

Manila, July 22.

The foreign trade of the Philippine Islands for the first half of 1924 amounted to $125,265,000, against $108.586,000 for the same period of 1923, according to figures made public by the Bureau of Customs.

The exports during the first six months of this year were $75,912,000 and the imports $49,349,000 leaving a balance in favour of the Islands of approximately $26,562,000. Every month during that period showed a balance in favour of the islands, with the exception of June, which was unfavourable to the extent of about $2,500,000.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

THE YIHYANG MARU CAPTIVES

Further Attempt to Effect Release

Peking, Aug. 1.

The Japanese Vice-Consul from Chungking is leaving Hankow today for Tungjen on his mission to bring about the release of the two officers of the Yihyang Maru. Mr. Chow, the Waichiaopu representative, will follow the Japanese official within the next few days.—Reuter.

OBITUARY

Joseph Conrad

London, Aug. 3.

The death is announced of the well-known novelist, Mr. Joseph Conrad, at the age of 66.—Reuter.

The announcement of Mr. Conrad's death will be received by very many readers with a sense of personal loss, for among his contemporaries there were few writers of more striking and engaging personality and none whose personality made itself felt so distinctly and wonderfully in creative art. All good Conradians will have read and re-read that charming personal narrative "The Mirror of the Sea" wherein Mr. Conrad gives an atmosphere of fine romance to his own life story and dramatizes with delightful, reflective humour the incident of his first literary adventure. As is well known, Mr. Conrad, who was born on December 6, 1857, was of Polish parentage, but he was not destined for the quiet career of a country gentleman upon the family estates. The call of the sea came to him early in life, and it was to the British Mercantile Marine, of whose traditions he had conceived a high opinion, that he turned as young man. Thus, with his allegiance given to the sea and the men of the sea, it followed quite naturally that an imaginative and observant mind should turn to the recording of impressions, that the ship's officer should graduate as novelist. Mr. Conrad has given us a delightful account of his first efforts in literature; how, without ever before having set down a single note with literary intent, he occupied an idle morning in a Pimlico boarding house with sketching the opening chapter of his first novel "Almayer's Folly." The story progressed slowly, bits of it were written in various parts of the world and mostly at sea, and still in an unfinished state was submitted to a solitary but discriminating passenger on one of his voyages. The judgment of Mr. Conrad's first reader was one of emphatic approval, and from that moment the ship's officer was launched upon his career as a world famous novelist. "Almayer's Folly" was published in 1895 and at once attracted attention, especially when it became known that its extraordinarily fine English was the work of a Polish author. Mr. Conrad's command of his chosen literary instrument improved marvellously as years went on, and there appeared a long succession of brilliant novels, all marked with distinction of style and characterisation, and revealing a sagacious and subtle observer of man and things. There is a fine restraint about every line he has written, and it is all marked with deep, sympathetic insight, sometimes touched with a subtle but never bitter irony, and with gleams of quiet humour. His work unquestionably occupies a high place in contemporary English letters. That much of it has that rare quality which gives permanence to literature few will doubt.

For many years prior to his death Mr. Conrad resided in England, having a small estate in Bishopsbourne, Kent, his interest having come to centre almost entirely in English life and letters. During the war, he rendered service as a member of the Mercantile Marine, part of his duty being on a mine-sweeper in the North Sea.

MOTOR-CAR FATALITY

Mr. Robert Sheridan, a clerk in the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank, who was home on leave from the East, was killed in a motor accident at Downpatrick yesterday. His companion, Mr. Irvine, the son of a prominent official of the Football Association, was injured and is in hospital in Belfast.—Reuter.

The China International Famine Relief Committee writes from Peking through its executive secretary, Mr. W. H. Mallory, that in close co-operation with the Chinese Red Cross it is about to launch a campaign for G.$2,000,000 to relieve the present suffering and provide against the rigours of the winter. Mr. M. T. Liang is serving as Chairman of the organization, and Dr. G. Douglass Gray and Mr. J. E. Baker are also officers.

TIBETAN TROOPS GUARDING TACHIENLU

With the Border Commissioner's Departure Fresh Quarrels Break Out: For What Use or Purpose None Can Tell

From Our Own Correspondent.

Tachienlu, Sze., July 14.

Tachienlu is again being defended and patrolled by Tibetan troops. Some days ago a threatened attack was reported along the south road. Some part of General Lan's army, it was said, was only two days from Tachienlu. Immediately detachments from the Chinese and Tibetan army and militia were called in and despatched along the south road to guard the pass which gives access to this border city. The border army is now so seriously depleted that only with the aid of the Tibetan soldiers can the frontier be defended against the approach of General Lan's army. These Tibetan troops now defending the border are practically, like every other soldier in Szechuan, in fact in China, purely mercenary in character and outlook. Those protecting the city, when despatched along the south road to attack the approaching Chinese forces were promised 200 rupees and possession of every Chinese rifle they brought back. This was a great incentive to defend the city, especially if it meant the actual possession of a good rifle. The Tibetans are very keen to get these weapons and some day we may have a large mercenary army on the frontier ready to fight in any direction. In one sense it seems unfortunate that Tibetans should be used by Chinese to defend the border against Chinese. This only goes to show how absolutely and completely chaotic the whole frontier situation has become.

The present situation, as far as we can make it out, is something like this. Sen Chao-lan apparently appointed by the Tuli Yang Sen, is here in the city to make peace. While he does so General Lan takes an unfair advantage and attacks the old frontier army. Under such conditions Sen Chao-lan cannot discuss peace with Sen Yang-tsai, so two nights ago he was preparing to flee from the city. When Sen arrived on the border two weeks ago Chen had already left, travelling to Yunnan, by what road no one seems to know. Whatever peace negotiations have been carried through have been done so with Chen's deputy commissioner, Sen Yang-tsai.

It is exceedingly difficult, in fact impossible, to find out just exactly where we are. Chen Hsia-lin has gone. The border army has retired, at least part of it, to the old boundary of the Marches. General Sen is now in command. Liu I-chiu's forces under General Lan are making a desperate but futile attempt to drive the old border warriers out of the Chien Chang valley. It is now nearly six months since the two armies faced each other in open warfare. During that time roads have been closed, traffic dislocated, trade suspended, farming hindered, and the whole countryside thrown into a state of unrest and fear. Why? Simply because two generals have a personal animosity.

A Perfectly Useless War.

The border army is perhaps the only justifiable army in China. It is here or supposed to be here to maintain peace on the border and to defend the Republic against the approach of the barbarians. It comes or should come directly under the control of the Central Government. It is paid or should be paid out of the Szechuen Salt Gabelle money. It has or should have about 10,000 men. At the present time this never paid, poorly fed, under clothed, fine old border army is fighting for its existence and terrifying the attacking army by its resourcefulness, daring and strategy. The Tibetan militia show no disinclination to join hands with the old frontier troops and hold at bay one of Szechuan's largest Boys Brigades. Our one and only problem here is—how long is it going to last and what is being done to bring the present useless struggle to an end?

Should Sen Chao-lan leave the border without accomplishing, what ostensibly he came to do, then the frontier condition will continue on its own sweet chaotic way. If Sen has failed to arrange any terms of peace then the policy of arbitration and compromise has also failed. The leaders of the opposing forces are now General Lan and General Sen. The former is an old border offices and a Szechuanese and the latter a Hunanese with good judgment, quiet determination, and much military ability. General Sen realizes the hopelessness of the border situation and is quite prepared to fallow a policy of mediation, provided all parties act squarely and fairly. Sen Chao-lan's failure as the Tuli's mediator leaves us exactly where we were six months ago. Telegrams continue to come from Wu Pei-fu and the Central Government recalling Chen Hsia-lin to the border commissionership.

FUNERAL OF GEN. YANG SEN'S MOTHER

Attended by Consular Body: Collisions between Police and Military

From Our Own Correspondent.

Chêngtu, July 15.

This morning large crowds attended the concluding ceremonial of the funeral rites for Gen. Yang Sen's mother at the Chang Chüin Yamên. The Tuli himself appeared with evident traces of suffering on his face, with hair uncut and beard unshaven out of respect to his mother. He shook hands gravely with the foreigners present who came to sympathize. All the members of the Consular Body were present as well as other foreigners and leading officials. The ceremony lasted intermittently from 8 a.m. until 2 p.m. Lavish sacrifices were displayed before the tablet and portrait of the Tuli's late mother.

There have been some rather unfortunate collisions recently between the military police and regular troops. The trouble arose a week ago through soldiers attempting to enter one of the theatres without tickets. In the altercation that ensued between the military police and the regulars, one of the latter was killed. The regular soldiers turned up in strength and the military police fled for barracks, and are still in hiding. The theatres are not very popular now, but it is reported that the situation is calmer.

HANGCHOW MINT AGAIN BUSY

1,000,000 Twenty-cent Pieces to Replace Glut of Inferior Coin

From Our Own Correspondent.

Hangchow Aug. 1.

Serious fires are still a daily occurrence. Insurance companies are badly hit.

As there has been no rain for a month, water in the canals is very low and still falling, while the price of rice continues to rise.

Owing to the glut of inferior 20-cent. pieces, the Mint here is going to make 1,000,000 of this coin of the proper standard. Officials have already been sent to Shanghai to buy the silver.

The Chêkiang Women's United Association, whose membership numbers over 300, has been established now for a year. The next meeting will consider Female Education, and Women's Rights Reports received in diplomatic circles say that the Chinese merchants in Peru have gone on strike because of the general ill treatment of Chinese in that country. After an anti-Chinese demonstration recently, the natives plundered several Chinese shops. According to this report the American and Cuban legations interceded with the result that four leaders of the movement were executed. After that the Chinese resumed business.

KUANGSI BANDITS' CAPTIVE'S

Mr. Carne and His Comrades' Account of Their Durance in Brigand Strongholds

The Rev. Edgar H. Carne, who was captured with three other Wuchow missionaries, Messrs. Rex. Ray, R. A. Jaffray, and Harry G. Miller, while attempting to rescue the twenty foreigners under siege in Kueilin, and held for ransom in a robber camp for six weeks, arrived in Shanghai during the week-end, and left on Monday night, with Mrs. Carne, for Hankow. With him was the Rev. W. H. Oldfield, who was under fire in the besieged city of Kueilin for 77 days, and conducted negotiations for his release, and also the Rev. H. G. Miller, who was captured at the same time, but released after four days by the bandits in order to obtain the ransom money.

Mr. Carne is suffering from a severe attack of malarial fever, the malady which almost caused his death while in the bandit camp, but it is believed that it is safe for him to go to Hankow. As do the others concerned in this perilous adventure, Mr. Carne minimizes his own anxieties and discomforts, and emphasizes the unusual opportunity of extending his evangelistic work among a class of people whom he could not ordinary hope to number in his congregation.

The Attack on the Roanoke.

Although this relief expedition which started out in the hospital motor boat Roanoke travelled with the official consent of the authorities and with an escort of 80 soldiers, when the bandits opened fire on the boat on the afternoon of May 25 the soldiers fled and the bandits boarded the boat, carried off everything, including the hats of the prisoners and rushed them up into the mountains, marching in single file. When night fell lanterns and torches were brought and the march continued until two o'clock in the morning, through streams and along stony paths where they had to cling with hands and feet to the grass and creepers to keep from falling into the ravines below. Here Mr. Jaffray and Mr. Miller were left behind and Mr. Carne and Mr. Ray continued over ridges and into valleys until after brief rests at the end of the next day they reached one of the robber strongholds and were allowed to wash and eat rice. An auction was held that night of the personal belongings taken off the boat, Dr. Miller's bathrobe bringing $1.00 and a pair of white drill trousers 60 cents.

They were not allowed to stay here, however, but pushed on over rough roads to still another stronghold where they found Mr. Miller again. The latter left under guard the next morning to arrange for the payment of the ranson and Mr. Carne and Mr. Ray were left with only "A Tsat" a Chinese servant from the Missionary Home, Wuchow, who refused to leave them although he was not held for ransom. He later proved not only very useful in securing food but in connexion with negotiations for release. After three days in this main camp they transferred again, and indeed the nervousness of the bandits over possible surprise and capture made them keep their unfortunate prisoners almost constantly on the move. During one march Mr. Ray sat down by the road refusing to move and his guard left him, thinking he was unable to move, whereupon Mr. Ray made the most of the opportunity and managed to reach Chaoping the next day. His guard had his gun taken from him and was turned out of the band in disgrace. This led to Mr. Carne's being more closely guarded and at no time was there a chance for him to get away.

Mr. Carne reported many amusing incidents in the camp, one bandit's ignorance of the uses of a fork and his endeavour to use it as it as a comb, the popularity of the Big Ben alarm clock looted from the boat, which was set for every two hours, and its back used as a mirror. Another robber tied on nose glasses with a strip of blue cloth, his own nose being too flat keep them on, and expected to be able to read the foreign Bible because he had foreign glasses. Mr. Miller told of the benevolent bandit who after brushing his teeth (with talcum powder!) kindly offered to lend his brush to his captive Another broke Mr. Jaffray's glasses but kept the gold nosepiece to make a stylish gold tooth which could be slipped on over the original tooth, a new fad in the country side.

Mr. Carne's Tea Money.

Mr. Carne became very ill with chills and fever and had no care and no proper food. Just after the crisis was successfully passed, however, his faithful A Tsat appeared with a letter from Mr. Oldfield saying that the ransom money had been brought in, and that a chair was being sent in for him. The mountain was so steep that the chairbearers could not come up but waited about 1,000 feet below while Mr. Carne clung to two bamboo poles which were held by a man walking in front and another behind and so with with frequent stops for rest he got to the chair. After about four hours he came to a village where Mr. Oldfield met him. After eating the midday meal the bandit chief bade them farefell, and presented Mr. Carne with $1.20 for "tea money" as he said. Mr. Carne said that, weak as he was, he almost spoiled the solemnity of the occasion by laughing outright, but managed to preserve proper dignity, and they were soon on their way to freedom. After an hour by road and two by small boats they reached Chaoping wher efriends were waiting for them.

Only Eager to Return.

A photograph taken of Mr. Carne at that time shows the hardships through which he had passed, a rough beard, his clothing torn and filthy and his toes sticking through his socks. None of the missionaries will listen to sympathy, however. "Our wives had the hardest time of it," they say," they were the ones who showed real bravery for they had all the suspense of waiting and none of the excitement." As soon as the consular officials will allow they hope to go back to their former stations, for as Mr. Oldfield put it. "If we waited for conditions to quiet down and become absolutely normal we might never accomplish anything." Mrs. Miller, Mrs. Oldfield and Mrs. Carne, who are also in Shanghai are very calm and plucky about the whole thing, thankful to be released from the terrible strain of the past months, but looking forward to going on with their work in the same locality as soon as permission is granted.

THE CIGARETTE SURTAX

Now Adopted in Hunan: Szechuan Urged to Drop It

From Our Own Correspondent.

Peking, July 30.

The idea of a cigarette surtax, originating in the minds of the Chekiang authorities, seems to be spreading throughout the Yangtze Valley. The latest recruit is Hunan province, where I understand a 20 per cent. levy has been approved by the provincial assembly and is expected to be put in operation very shortly.

In regard to the adoption of a similar measure by Szechuan province, the Cabinet has wired General Yang Shen urging its immediate cancellation. It is said that the Governor is aquiescing in the suggestion, and seeking for other means to raise sufficent revenue to defray his military expenses.

JAPANESE ORDERS FOR WAR MATERIAL

Great Activity in British Factories

London, Aug. 4.

The "Westminster Gazette" notes extraordinary activity in Kentish war material factories in connexion with orders for the Japanese Government, for whom Messrs. Vickers, Ld., are making 140,000 machine-guns, and Messrs. Scruttons, Ld., of Gravesend, are executing a large order for a special type of tractor lorry.—Reuter.

THE RUSSO-JAPANESE CONFERENCE

Probable Re-opening This Week: Mr. Yoshizawa's Return to Peking

Peking, Aug. 3.

Mr. Yoshizawa, Japanese Minister to Peking, who has for some time past been on a visit to Tokyo, returned to his post here at 10 o'clock this morning. Interviewed by a representative of the Eastern News Agency, the Japanese Minister made a statement as follows:—

The Russo-Japanese Conference will probably be re-opened either on the 5th or the 6th instant subject to arrangements with M. Karakhan. The policy of the present Cabinet of Japan towards Soviet Russia, is, in my opinion, not of a firmer nature than that adopted by its predecessor but it appears that the prospect of the forthcoming negotiations is not so bright, though it is rather premature to harbour any pessimistic view in this respect. So far as I am concerned. I am not yet in position to forecast the prospect of the negotiations until I have had interviews with M. Karakhan. While in Mukden on my way to Peking, I had a brief interview lasting only 20 minutes with Marshal Chang Tso-lin, on account of his toothache. The question of raising the status of the Japanese Legation in Peking to Embassy is now under consideration by the Tokyo Government.

Peking, Aug. 4.

The first sitting of the Russo-Japanese conference since the arrival here of Mr. Yoshizawa, Japanese Minister in Peking, was held at the offices of M. Karakhan to-day, lasting from 4.30 p.m. to 7.30 p.m. In the course of the sitting, Mr. Yoshizawa submitted to the Soviet Envoy a proposition by the Tokyo Government for the settlement of problems pending between the two countries. It is expected that the delegates of the two countries will continue their sitting to-morrow afternoon at 4 o'clock at the Japanese Legation.—Eastern News Agency.

Rights in Saghalien Still a Subject of Controversy: Conference Adjourned

Peking, Aug. 6.

All the other less important problems having been discussed at the preceding meetings of the Japanese and Soviet delegates, the discussion at to-day's meeting was centred upon the question of rights in North Saghalien, which is regarded as the most important of all issues pending at present between Japan and Soviet Russia.

Despite the fact that M. Karakhan to-day assumed a very strong attitude and seemed not to comply with Japan's request, the situation has not yet come to such a pass that the Russo-Japanese Conference has been bought to a deadlock. It is generally observed that there still remains room enough for the two parties to step nearer to each other so that an agreement may be reached after all.

The parley will not be held to-morrow, for M. Karakhan is expected to attend the reception to be given by President Tsao Kun in honour of the Ambassador and staff of the Soviet Embassy. It is understood that the next meeting will be held on the afternoon of the 8th instant.

Rumours of a Secret Treaty Entirely Baseless

London, July 31.

The Paris correspondent of the "Morning Post" says that well-informed circles believe that a secret Russo-Japanese treaty of the highest importance is on the point of signature, even if not already signed. It is asserted that Japan will furnish heavy artillery and hand over her surplus warships to Russia, while Russia will cede all oil rights in Northern Saghalien. It is further asserted that it was chiefly owing to Japanese influence that the Russo-Chinese agreements have recently been signed.—Reuter.

Flat Contradiction by Japan

Tokyo, Aug. 1.

"Utterly false" is the official comment on the report of the Paris correspondent of the London "Morning Post" o fa secret Russo-Japanese Treaty. Official circles express the opinion that such reports are being circulated systematically for ulterior reasons.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

London, Aug. 4.

In the House of Commons to-day the Prime Minister, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, said that so far as the Government were aware, the reports of the existence of a secret treaty between Japan and Soviet Russia were unfounded.—Reuter.

MANDARIN COATS AND LOOTED FINERY

Shansi's Old Clothes Mart: Getting Ready to Milk the Tourist

From Our Own Correspondent.

Kiangchow, Shan, July 24.

The "olo clo'" trade is one of the big lines of commerce in inland China. Shansi merchants have been called the Jews of China. When a group of traders are seen gloating over huge bales of silk and satin garments, onlookers may discern a cast of countenance and eagle eye strangely akin to familiar types of "ole 'clo" men of the West.

During the great opium smoking years prior to 1910 and after the great famine, Shansi pawnshops were crammed with treasures which in due course as unredeemed pledges came on to the market in a steady stream. The traders in old clothes at that time offered round sums for the contents of 50 in 100 divisions in the pawnshop shelves, and carried off their lucky windfalls to fairs in the various districts where such goods were fashionable or saleable.

After 1900 the foreign market having developed a taste for "looted" embroideries, Shansi gradually awoke to the possibilities of commodities which had been of very modest value before and not only pawnshop widows contributed to the supply of the ever increasing demands of Peking and the Coast. Now this supply is exhausted but the Shansi fairs are more than ever gorgeous with embroideries, brocades, furs, etc. These are, however, newly imported from Peking and the coast, and the explanation of the qualities and prices is bandits' loot.

Soldiers or robbers in other provinces look to Peking for a market. At times even loot for which blood has been shed and lives risked has to be sacrificed for significant sums to an innkeeper or a trader when bad times overtake the possessor and so now bargains are coming back into the interior instead of being sent away for higher prices as in former years.

The long hoped for rain came on July 22 the day before "Great Heat," after which date farmers said calamity would be assured. All's well now, and the ploughman is busy. There is hope for the cotton and all other crops.

JAPAN'S ECONOMIC CRISIS

Tokio, Aug. 5.

Addressing a gubernatorial conference, Viscount Kato, the Prime Minister, drew attention to the present crisis in Japan. He declared that the question whether Japan won or lost the international economic struggle depended on the Government's ability to strengthen its administrative and economic organs and to impress on the people the gravity of the situation.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

According to Article 3 of the Sino-German Agreement and Article 12 of the Sino-Russian Agreement, both Germany and the Union of the Soviet Republics have renounced extraterritorial rights in China. The Stamp Revenue Office at Shanghai, it is reported, has accordingly received an order from the Ministry of Finance to see that in future German and Russian merchants, whether residing in foreign settlements or not, affix stamps to all documents, "any breach of which must be punished."

SENATE OR COMMON LODGING HOUSE

Wuchang's Fine Provincial Assembly Hall Fallen on Evil Days

From Our Own Correspondent.

Wuchang, July 26.

An article in the native press describes how in the Provincial Assembly Hall, owing to the carelessness of members, a great deal of the internal furniture has been either spoiled or lost. The Assembly Hall is a big red brick structure, standing under the Serpent Hill close to the mouth of Chang Chih-tung's tunnel. It is surrounded by a park and enclosed by high railings, and in front of it is a large open space known as the Yuan Ma Ch'ang, or parade-ground, which is a favourite resort of peddlars and hucksters.

In the assembly hall, a great number of rooms have been specially prepared for the residence of members who come from a distance, and need to reside in the city while the Assembly is in session. These rooms were elaborately furnished, and a large kitchen was also put into the building where the members might have their food cooked. Ten years ago all was brand new, and in apple pie order. But a good many of the honourable members, not being content with the use of a common kitchen, had cooking stoves installed in their own rooms. To cook their food, they naturally borrowed from the kitchen cooking utensils of all kinds, to the use of which they were, of course, entitled. But somehow or other, these cooking utensils never found their way back to the public kitchen. No doubt a good many of them were worn out in the service of their proper owners. But it is rumoured that others were seen in other service, in various eating-shops throughout the city. How they got there is not known.

Saves Hotel Expenses.

From time to time, members of the assembly have friends from the country up in town—it may be members of their own families, or acquaintances who come up on business. It was a very natural thing for them to ask such friends to stay with them in their private apartments. It is nice to have one's friends near to one, and incidentally, the arrangement would save a lot of hotel expenses. Besides, if one happens to have a lawsuit on hand. it looks much better to be residing in the Provincial Assembly Hall than in some common inn.

But country cousins, unfortunately, have not always the best of manners. There must have been a good deal of spittings and dirty water and other refuse thrown through the windows on to the balconies. Paint and whitewash got dirtied, and a good many articles beside kitchen utensils have vanished into empty space.

So the internal appearance of our fine Assembly Hall presents now a very different aspect from what it did ten years ago. But no doubt the members who are responsible can easily put it right. All they have to do is to bring in a bill that a certain sum of the public moneys shall be set aside for the renovating and refurnishing of the assembly hall, and the thing is done. A very proper use of public money, too!

U. S. EXCLUSION ACT

Mr. Hanihara Hopeful of Revival of Discussion

Tokyo, Aug. 3.

Mr. Hanihara, the Japanese Ambassador to the United States, returned from America this morning. In an interview he declared that he had not been recalled but that he had returned to discuss the situation with the Government. He refused to discuss the question of immigration until after his report to Baron Shidehara, the Foreign Minister, but he expressed the hope that the election would change the attitude of Congress towards exclusion. Mr. Hanihara said that the question would not be quickly settled and expressed the opinion that it might be taken up again after the American election.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

A PUBLIC SPIRITED RAILWAY

What the S.M.R. Has Brought to Manchuria: New President on Its Public Policy

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Mukden, July 28.

President B. Yasuhiro, with Director Baron Okra and two private secretaries, in course of a tour along the South Manchuria Railway Lines, arrived at Mukden on Saturday 26th. The President made a round of calls upon the Chinese dignitaries and Consuls-general, and entertained the foreign community at dinner in the Town Hall in the evening. He took advantage of the representative character of the assembly to disclose some interesting facts concerning the position of the Company in the following speech:—

Gentlemen,—I feel deeply gratified and honoured that so many of you have resonded to my invitation to be present here this evening. I regard your presence as a mark of your good will and courtesy shown to me.

I might say that 15 years have elapsed since the establishment of the South Manchuria Railway Company, and these years have seen many changes in the presonnels of the Company's Presidency, but these changes, I am glad to say, have brought no alteration whatever to the fundamental policy of the South Manchuria Railway Company.

Policy Ever the Same.

It may be mentioned that, although each President has expressed the Company's policy in his own different words, the fundamental policy of the Company, I declare, has remained unchanged, and in short, our policy is not to look after our own interest only, but to share the profit accruing from our workings with the general public living in and out of the S. M. R. towns, with due respect to the fact that ours is a railway Company carrying on its work in the Chinese territory. The only exception in this connexion is the dividend paid to the Company's shareholders. It is in this spirit that the South Manchuria Railway Company have invested in Manchuria a sum which, now reaches to an enormous figure, that is Yen. 540,000,000. You may be aware that, viewed from a purely business point, our Company is not a money-making enterprise at all; and what has been achieved by these investments in the opening up of Manchuria I think, it is too self-evident a fact for me to show in figures as the fact itself tells its tale in every direction.

Heavy Liabilities.

I assure you, gentlemen, that come what may, we shall abide by the same policy through thick and thin. But here is a fact to which I should like to draw your attention, that is, our local administrative expenditure has reached such a stage that it now requires over Yen 10,000,000 a year; due to the remarkable development made in the South Manchuria Railway Towns. While this is a stern reality, our railway revenues, which are a source to meet our above appropriation, do not increase in proportion to the steady rise of the above expenditure.

It is a great question, indeed, how far our Company can bear the strain of this enomous duty imposed on it and maintain the present dividend to the Company's shareholders.

In my personal opinion, our first consideration for the execution of the Company's important policy under these circumstances is to secure a perfect understanding and sympathy with the Chinese authorities, relying upon the direct and indirect aid and assistance from both Japanese and foreigners living in Manchuria. In other words, the rise and fall of the South Manchuria Railway Company will exercise a far-reaching effect on the status quo of Manchuria. In this spirit I ask you, representing as I do the South Manchuria Railway Company, to extend your helping hands and assist the Company in the great work of opening up the country.

Now let me raise my glass to drink to your health and to the realization of a true international confidence and co-operation in Manchuria.

What the S.M.R. Has Done.

Mr. H. Porter, the British Consul-General, then rose and on behalf of the foreign community present, replied as follows:—

Mr. President,—Allow me on behalf of the foreign Community in Mukden to extend to you our very cordial welcome on this your first visit to Mukden since taking up your important appointment as President of the S. M. R. I would also take this opportunity of thanking you for the generous hospitality which you have shown us to-night.

Mr. Yasuhiro has alluded to the fundamental policy of the Railway Administration which remained unchanged through all the changes of Presidents and personnels. It is, I am sure, with feelings of deep appreciation that the foreign community here realizes the great debt which it owes to the spirit of fair-mindedness and consideration towards their interests which have always been manifested by the Company. It is indeed difficult to imagine what would be the conditions in Manchuria to-day but for the conveniences to trade and travel which have been provided by this public spirited enterprise. When we travel we do so, in every direction but one by this S. M. R. which also provides luxurious hotels for one accommodation, while the municipal enterprise, the schools, the public gardens and other amenithies must be an incalculable boon to the Japanese Communities in the railway settlements. It would be hard to find anywhere in the world an enterprise combining in itself so many and such varied activities, which, nicely handled and administered by the best brains Japan has at her service, has proved an object lesson in the art of communal development and the spread of modern civilization by railway.

Mr. Yasuhiro has stated that the Company is not a money-making concern. Is it not, however producing dividends of a far more valuable kind than mere monetary profit? To have confined the enterprise into one of mere money making would have been to lose one of the finest opportunities ever offered for far reaching schemes of development which, while not immediately profitable, will in the long run not fail to justify themselves and the aims of their promoters.

Gentlemen, I ask you to join me in drinking to the health of Mr. Yasuhiro, President of the S. M. R. and to the continued success and hospitality of the great enterprise over which he presides.

On Sunday night Marshal Chang Tso-lin extended his hospitality to the new President accompanied by Mr. Funatsu, the Japanese Consul-General.

This concludes the preliminary tour of the President who will now returned to Dairen.

HOLIDAY CROWDS AT CHEFOO

Bigger Demand for Accommodation than Ever this Year: Visit of U. S. Asiatic Fleet

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Chefoo, July 31.

Chefoo is now at the height of its summer season and the town is full of visitors. The presence of the U. S. Asiatic Fleet of course accounts to a large extent for the influx, but apart from the families of naval officers there is a good sprinkling of visitors from Shanghai, Tientsin and other towns.

The new Broadway Hotel which was opened to visitors this season is already full, and there is a bigger demand for accommodation than the management can cope with. All hotels are booked up and one frequently encounters visitors searching the town for a room and even, in desperation, applying to householders.

At the present moment there are upwards of 30 vessels of war anchored in the bay. They form a most imposing sight. In addition to the usual ships the Fleet is this year augumented by a squadron of seaplanes. These, as you can imagine, are of great interest to the native population the majority of whom have never before seen an aeroplane. The bund becomes crowded with spectators every time the planes are in flight.

Dr. Schurman, the U.S. Minister, paid a visit to the port, arriving here in company of Admiral Anderson who had been in Peking. A reception was held on board the U.S.S. Huron which was very well attended by both residents and naval people. In the evening a dance was held at the Chefoo Club.

The visit of the fleet naturally adds much in the way of entertainment to Chefoo. The Navy Y.M.C.A. is putting up its usual good cinema pictures, concerts and smokers whilst three bands are available for playing dance music at the clubs and the Broadway Hotel. The heat rather takes the pleasure off the latter form of entertainment at times, but of course Chefoo is not allowed to complain on that account in view of the excellent climate it enjoys as compared with other ports. Despite the existence of numerous bars the general conduct of the sailors when ashore is good. This is, of course, in the main due to an excellent system of patrol work by the Fleet police.

Up to the present we have not suffered from any great heat although there have been several decidedly warm days.

MARSHAL Wu Pei-fu has telegraphically instructed Gen. Sun Chuan-fang to prevent at all costs Gen. Lu Yung-hsiang from gathering in the remnants of the mercenaries of Wang Yung-chuan and Tsang Chih-ping in Fukien who have strayed into Chêkiang. Gen. Lu has been steadily increasing his armed forces for some months past and no doubt prefers partly trained men to raw countrymen.

HUNT FOR THE FIRST MAN IN ASIA

Preparation for Mr. Roy Chapman Andrew's Next Venture: Jesuit Priests' Find

Within a few days Mr. Roy Chapman Andrews, leader of the Third Asiatic Expedition which last year discovered fossilized eggs of the ancient dinosaur, will leave for Urga, Mongolia, to arrange with Mongolian authorities for passports permitting the start of a fourth and greater expedition on April 15 of next year.

No one can predict what such an expedition will find. But Mr. Andrews and his associates have very definitely decided what they will try to find. They are preparing for the most interesting hunt in the world—a hunt for the first man.

Two Jesuit priests quietly slipped into Peking last winter, and as quietly slipped out again. These priests, in Mr. Andrews' opinion, had made one of the most notable scientific discoveries in many a year, though the news of it is even now little known. They had found a "kitchen midden" in Mongolia— a prehistoric dump heap—containing stone implements proving beyond question that a Stone Age man lived in Asia.

"First Man" In Asia?

For many years Mr. Roy Chapman Andrews and his associates had held the theory that not only the first animal life, but man himself, probably had come from Asia. The Third Asiatic Expedition, sponsored by the American Museum of Natural History, showed the merit of this theory as regards general animal life. Mr. Andrews points to the priests' discovery as evidence that the fourth expediton is thoroughly justified in specializing on a hunt for evidences of early man, whose existence in Mongolia is no longer open to speculation.

Already preparations for the hunt are going forward rapidly. On the Urga trip, Mr. Andrews will not only make sure that Mongolian officials will not interfere with the work, but he will likewise arrange for some of the 200 camels which, loaded with tons of supplies, are to be sent from Kalgan about December 1 toward a point 1,000 miles in the interior of Mongolia.

Four of the specially built motor-cars for the trip are due from America soon. Among the features of these machines are balloon size tires with walls three or four times as thick as the regular balloon type. This is because the large size is wanted, not for its cushioning effect, but for its ability to keep on top of shifting sand; flexible walls are not desired, and a high air pressure will be maintained.

Special cooling devices for the motor will be employed, including reversable fans which are of great value in conserving the radiators' water when the cars are travelling with a following wind.

There will be eight of these cars in all, and they will be occupied by 40 men including some of the best minds of the scientific world. Among those to take the trip are: Walter Granger, chief palaeontologist; Charles P. Berkey, chief geologist; Federick K. Morris, geologist, James P. Chapin, ornithologist; Clifford H. People, assistant in zoology; J. B. Shackleford, photographer; S. Bayard Colgate, chief of motor transport; Ralph Chaney, botanist; Albert F. Johnson, palaeontologist, and George Olson, assistant.

In all his preparations concerning both equipment and personnel Mr. Andrews is solely guided by the principle of leaving nothing to chance. Adventure has no place in a scientific expedition, says he; therefore equipment must be adequate. No one can foresee exactly what will be found, he continues; therefore experts of many sorts of should be present.

Man Was There.

"We know that man has been in Mongolia during the period in which we are interested," says the expedition chief. "The problem is to find out somethng about him. Perhaps we shall hunt five years without finding a trace—but in that case we hope to have found something else of interest.

"This expedition will not work on periods as far back as the dinosaurs. We want to sift the evidence of a period about a million to a million and a half years ago; a period when the 'missing link' between the root stock and present-day man must have lived."

It will be no easy task to find fossilized remains of such a creature as man—a creature with comparatively small and fragile framework, and at the same time with craft enough to keep out of the quicksands and quagmires which trapped, killed, and later fossilized such animals as the dinosaur.. But the scientists hold that somewhere in Mongolia man's remains must exist, and the problem is to find them.

Stone Basins Have No Outlet.

Under all Mongolia is a huge granite floor, which at various points dips into basins without inlet or outlet. Similar basins exist in America, save that they have outlets and fossilized remains which may once have been there have been scoured out long years ago. Here the basins are closed; whatever was once there is still there. These basins provide the ground for exploration.

"Investigation indicates that Mongolia must have been an ideal place for the development of man," declares Mr. Andrews. "At the period under consideration it apparently was a savannahlike country, neither tropical nor heavily forested; a place affording a chance for a healthful struggle for existence. Man could live with comfort, but not too great comfort; he could hunt the wooly rhinoceros and the giant ostrich, develop his stone implements and weapons, and work out his racial history.

"European investigations for years back have indicated influxes of men from outside. It is our theory that these outsiders came from Asia, and everything we learn now seems to justify us in this view.

"Asia is virgin territory. We believe it is tremendously rich in scientific material. The approaching expedition intends to leave nothing within its power undone to uncover material relating to man. Our trip is, after all is said, a mighty good gamble from all indications and we are confident we may expect something valuable — even though it may be the unexpected!"

Where the trail will lead no one can tell at this time. In the bitter cold of winter and under a glaring desert sun the search will go on, seeking unceasingly to add fresh chapters to the story of mankind.

MANILA'S MEMORIAL TO JOSE RIZAL

Stadium to Be Constructed at a Cost of $500,000: a Drive for Funds

Manila, July 23.

A campaign to raise $500,000 (U. S. Currency) for the construction of a stadium in the City of Manila to be known as the "Jose Rizal Memorial Stadium" was given official sanction to-day when Governor-General Wood issued a proclamation setting the period from August 10 to September 30 within which a campaign for the raising of the sum of $250,000 needed for the beginning of the projected structure may be conducted.

It is planned to complete a protion of the stadium in time for the Far East Championship games which take place in Manila in May, 1925. The completed structure is to be a permanent home for athletic contests and all other forms of public outdoor meetings.

The Governor-General urges all the people throughout the Philippines to assist in this "most worthy undertaking."

The stadium is to be a memorial to Jose Rizal, the national hero, who was executed in 1896 by the Spaniards.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

JAPAN'S DUTY ON GUNS

British Firms' Strong Objection

London, Aug. 1.

A meeting of Birmingham gun-makers expressed the opinion that the new Japanese tariff of 100 per cent. ad valorem with regard to the gun trade was prohibitive. The meeting welcomed the offer of Mr. P. J. H. Hannon, Conservative member for Birmingham (Moseley), in conjunction with Mr. Neville Chamberlain, Conservative member for Birmingham (Ladywood), and other local members of Parliament to seek an interview with the Government on this subject.

Mr. Hannon believed that if the case were presented properly, Japan would be ready to make some concessions.—Reuter.

OPIUM REVIVAL IN CHEKIANG

Deplorable Return of Growing in Province Hitherto of Good Record

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Taichow, Chê., July 24.

No one who has the highest interests of China at heart can regard with equanimity the encouragement that once more is being given to poppy cultivation, and consumption of the deadly drug, opium.

The people of India are beginning to recognize the perils they incur by its use. They have formed an "All India Society for the Suppression of the Opium Traffic," and it is said to have Hindu, Mohammedan and Christian members. How one rejoiced at the strenuous efforts made by the Chinese to suppress the drug during the early years of this present century.

I well remember being allowed the privilege of attending a large enthusiastic meeting of Chinese professional and business men in Hongkong, about 18 years ago. They met to form an "Anti-Opium Society." It was an entirely Chinese movement, and they all meant to do something to help forward so noble a cause. What an enormous amount of opium and pipes, etc., were publicly destroyed. Only a few weeks ago I saw a large quantity of opium being burnt in the yard of the chief gaol in Shanghai native city.

To-day we find in this district it is being actually guarded by Chinese troops as it goes on its way to some rich distributor. In the southern districts of Taichow such as Wongngaen and Wengling I believe its consumption is being openly encouraged, and is rapidly increasing.

At Dzehku there are several opium dens, and I am told that even youths of 16 are allowed to patronize them. The knowledge of these things is public property. Opium comes into the district by way of Zihdong and Shongmeng and is guarded by local soldiers as it passes along the canals to the dealer. Confucius said "A gentleman regards what is right, a vulgar person what will pay." Are we to conclude that an increasing large number of Chinese are becoming more and more "vulgar," and care nothing for the degradation of their countrymen so long as they are able to add to their own banking account?

Robbers and Pirates Again.

There seems to be a recrudescence of robbery and piracy down in the southern district. For some years there has been a great improvement in this respect. The old lawless spirit seems to be reawakening. Probably the quiet law abiding life has got on the nerves of some of them. They need more excitement, and consequently take quite kindly and naturally once more to the life of pillaging and robbery. Innoffensive citizens had better cease from night travelling, as local roughs, especially between Sugyiao and Moh-z, are holding up such traffic on the pretext of searching the boats, but really that they may lay hands on whatever valuable they discover.

Trading junks too are being constantly held up by pirates along the coast. Patrol boats lie safely at Haimen, perhaps patiently waiting for the day when the pirates, emboldened by many successes, will venture into the harbour and attack them.

When up in the northern district I found the faction of which I wrote some weeks ago is still unsettled. Eight or nine men have been killed in connexion with it, and there appears to be little prospect of reconciliation taking place between the contending parties.

Rice Crop.

The early crop, known as the sixth months' rice crop, promises well, and is ripe for harvesting.

MR. T. Kawamura, late President of the South Manchurian Railway Co., contemplates making a tour of Europe and America, leaving Japan on August 19.

THE WORLD FLIGHTS

Maclaren Unable to Proceed Owing to Lack of Spares: Flight Abandoned

New York, July 31.

Repeated efforts to obtain information regarding Squadron-Leader Maclaren by wireless since the airman reached Petropavlovsk on July 24 have failed. It is believed that he has been delayed by wind and fog, and may be unable to land at the store post at Nazan and be forced to continue flight to Atka Island.—Reuter American Service.

Tokio, Aug. 1.

Squadron-Leader Maclaren is still at Petropavlovsk. No details have been received, but it is believed that he is weather-bound.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

New York, Aug. 4.

Squadron-Leader Maclaren has abandoned his world flight.

An earlier wireless despatch mentioned that Squadron-Leader Maclaren had been involved in an accident near Nikolski, Komandorski Island, but nobody was hurt, and that the airman intended to proceed to Attu.

Later.

Squadron-Leader Maclaren has wirelessed that the abandonment of his flight was necessary; because no spares were obtainable to repair the damage to the plane, which fell near Nikolski on Saturday, just as he was completing his flight from Petropavlovsk. He added that the wings, floats and tail were all smashed, though the hull and engine were salvaged and taken on board the Canadian trawler Thiepval.—Reuter.

How Maclaren was Beaten.

New York, Aug. 6.

Details of Squadron-Leader Maclaren's accident which compelled him to abandon his world flight are contained in a wireless message from the trawler Thiepval, on which Squadron-Leader Maclaren and his companions are on their way to America. Squadron-Leader Maclaren, after leaving Petropavlovsk, encountered a very dense fog en route to Behring Island. He was forced to fly low over the water in order to see his way.

The plane was travelling at 100 miles an hour and 100 feet above the ocean and their visibility was only 100 yards. The pilot was blinded by the fog. Nevertheless, he managed to swerve in order to avoid by two feet an island which suddenly loomed up and disappeared in a few seconds. After that the fog was solid and his visibility was nil. There was danger of crashing into the cliffs of Behring Island. Therefore, they decided on a forced landing.

The machine hit the ocean along a swell. The top wings were shattered and wrenched off, the fabric of the lower part of the wings was torn off and other serious damage was sustained.—Reuter's American Service.

Lieut. Wade's Forced Descent Midway Between Orkneys and Iceland.

London, Aug. 2.

The American world-fliers have left Kirkwall for Iceland.

Later.

The American world-fliers, Captain Smith and Lieut. Wade, today returned to Kirkwall. They lost their companion, Lieut. Nelson, in a fog 25 miles from the Orkneys.

Later.

The third American world-flier, Lieut. Nelson, has returned to Kirkwall.

Later.

The report of Lieutenant Nelson's return to Kirkwall is incorrect. He has arrived at Horna Fiord in Iceland.—Reuter.

New York, Aug. 3.

Lieutenant Nelson covered the 500 miles between Kirkwall and Horna Fiord in 8 hours 19 minutes. He lost his companions in a fog shortly after leaving Kirkwall. The others, finding the fog impenetrable, returned, but Lieut. Nelson went on thinking that his comrades were above him. An hour later he sighted Fair Isle and was then able to ascertain his position. He next sighted one of the patrol ships, from which he was able to confirm his course.—Reuter's American Service.

Kirkwall, Aug. 3.

The American world-fliers, Captain Smith and Lieutenant Wade, started again for Iceland this morning in ideal weather.—Reuter.

Kirkwall, Aug. 3.

The American aviator, Lieut. Wade, descended 115 miles off the Orkneys to-day.—Reuter.

Horna Fiord, Aug. 3.

Capt. Lowell Smith and Lieut. Wade encountered rainstorms, squall and fog. The former has arrived. The latter descended to the sea midway between Horna Fiord and Scapa Flow and was taken in tow by a trawler.—Reuter.

Rejkjavik, Aug. 3.

Lieut. Wade was found with his machine, the engine of which was only slightly damaged. The machine will be able to make a fresh start in a very short time.—Reuter.

London, Aug. 4.

It is reported from Rejkjavik that Lieutenant Wade will probably return to Kirkwall for a new start.—Reuter.

New York, Aug. 4.

Lieutenant Wade's descent to the sea was due to the connecting rod of the oil pump breaking, while the wings of his plane were severely damaged in the descent. The airmen drifted in rough seas for four hours before they were picked up by a British trawler. Another serious mishap occurred when the cruiser, Richmond, was endeavouring to hoist the plane on board. The tackle broke, resulting in a heavy steel boom falling on and breaking the propeller and piercing a pontoon. The latest report says that Lieutenant Wade is temporarily and perhaps finally out of the race.—Reuter's American Service.

As Reuter now informs us Captain Smith and Lieut. Nelson with their aides, Lieuts. Arnold and Ogden, have arrived at Horna Fiord, it may be interesting to note that, with but two exceptions, the most dangerous portion of their journey is now over. But, and it is a big word, these two stretches from Iceland to Cape Farewell, Greenland, then on to Newfoundland, are of great length and through fog and ice and sleety snow. Horna Fiord is situated 15 degrees West and 64 degrees North, while Cape Farewell is four degrees farther south and a full 30 to the west. The flight by air direct to the latter point is no less than 700 miles over a sea full of floating icebergs and with no shipping, no human soul within hundreds of miles, save a destroyer or two, to give help if need be. But what can a destroyer do in fog so thick that a pilot, with thousands of hours of flying to his credit, could not surmount and had to return to the Orkneys? Of what possible value could a smoke column be in determining position. Once the trio make Newfoundland they are near to home and four days more should see them in Boston and New York. From New York to Seattle, "nothing to it."

It is expected that the two machines will await their mate and the party, complete, once more at Horna Fiord, will be able to continue, Lieuts. Wade and Harding joining in the jump-off for the New England States. It will be recalled that this is the first difficulty that the latter have had; they were the first to strike water at Shanghai and with Lieut. Nelson's machine the first to leave. Major Martin struck a mountain side in the Bering, while Captain Smith had trouble at Kagoshima and later near Haiphong, and Lieut. Nelson stated in Shanghai that if he had been an hour more in the air his exhaust would have burned out.

London, Aug. 4.

Lieut. Wade's machine was abandoned after capsizing in a heavy sea.

The Italian airman, Signor Locatelli, arrived to-day at Hull from Amsterdam. He proposes to extend his flight round the world.—Reuter.

Reykjavik, Aug. 5.

The two American airmen arrived here from Horna Fjord to-day after a flight in a heavy gale.—Reuter.

New York, Aug. 5.

A Danish Government steamer which is carrying supplies for the American world-fliers has encountered the worst ice conditions off Greenland for many years. She is stuck fast 15 miles off the shore, but it is expected that the airmen will overcome the difficulties.—Reuter's American Service.

New York, Aug. 6.

Lieutenant Wade and his companion are now definitely out of the American world flight.—Reuter.

Washington, Aug. 7.

The Army Air Service has ordered the fliers to remain at Reykjavik until weather conditions assure a reasonably safe passage to Greenland.—Reuter's American Service.

MACLAREN'S FLIGHT REVIEWED

A Gallant Effort Carried Out Against Repeated Misfortune: The Last Struggle with Snows and Storms of the Arctic

Squadron-Leader Maclaren, accompanied by Flying Officer Plenderleith and Sgt. R. Andrews, having flown roughly 12,500 miles, half the distance round the world, in less than 150 hours, a mileage thousands of miles greater than 99½ per cent. of the world's population ever expect to travel on land or sea, has at last been compelled to abandon his struggle against nature and the elements.

Combating the tropics, the rigours of the mountains of Burma, the expanses between the widely separated landing fields of the Orient and the cold and fogs of the first portions of the Kamchatka coast, the party continued on their dismal journey from Petropavlosk through the Bering Sea, to a forced landing midst the blinding sleet, snow and fog. The plane was a wreck, wings smashed beyond repair, the fabrics split into the individual threads of original linen, while the fuselage, bent and broken beyond recognition (Doisy's Bréguet at Kiangwan by comparison sound) prevented the slightest chance of repair. Rescued, the intrepid adventurers are now aboard the trawler Thiepval, on their slower journey to Vancouver B.C., and Seattle, Washington, whence they return to London viâ North America and the palatial Atlantic steamship services.

The Common Heritage.

It seems the misfortune of the round-the-world flyers to come to some misadventure before arriving at their destination, Maclaren lost the one plane near Akyab, the Portuguese made their final landing miles from Macáo, Captain Doisy, the virile Frenchman who astounded the world with his dash and spirit, came to a sudden halt on the best landing field between India and Japan, Kiangwan, while of the four American fliers, two of them are out of it entirely—Major Martin crashing within a few miles of where Maclaren came to his untimely stop, and Lieut. Wade met a similar fate, just a few laps from home.

It is rather a tragedy that the two who paid each other such splendid compliments and wishes for continued success (Maclaren and Wade) should both have crashed after wonderful and heroic endeavours to encircle the globe by the aerial route. It will be recalled that the former when he heard of the American destroyer rushing his new plane to him from Tokio, called on the assembly to cheer their rival's flag, and Wade, in receipt of the same news, speaking at the Shanghai Club within but a few hours of Maclaren's cheer, closed his informal remarks with, "Cheerio, Maclaren."

Into the Frozen North.

Maclaren, it will be recalled, left Shanghai on July 5, to arrive at Tokio three days later, where he was entertained by Royalty. From the capital of Japan he proceeded north, having been joined by Sgt. Andrews who had remained in Shanghai, being ill, but returned to Kasumigaura, owing to cooling troubles. Off again he was twice forced to land in one day. From July 16, when he departed from Hitcup Island in northern Japan, until three days later, no word of the fliers was heard and fears were entertained for their lives, but on the same day when Mrs. Maclaren greeted the Americans in England, news came out that he and his comrades had been found in a small bay, weather-bound. July 24 found him at Paramushiro, with that portion of the journey before him, which the Americans believed to be the worst of the flight, and which they stated would be much worse than when they, three planes together, had made it.

Undaunted, the valiant three, Maclaren, Plenderleith and Andrews, prepared to continue on their most hazardous lap. Arriving at Petropavlovsk no word came out for a whole week and the world, but for the fact that Major Martin, lost for 10 days, had come out safe, would have given them up.

August 1 found them. August 4 cables reported the fatal crash. What a struggle it was for three men, their combined efforts so puny, as to be almost futile in mortal combat with the perils of the northern oceans, but they laboured and fought to the bitter end—snow storm, sleet and ice, too strong for man-made machinery to think to overcome. It was a noble effort and failure cannot impair the glory that is Major Maclaren's.

A Single-handed Attempt.

When Major Stuart Maclaren, British around-the-world flier, nears American territory in the north Pacific ocean he will have completed about half of his trip around the globe, wrote an American exchange. When he arrived in Tokio he had flown 10,770 miles, while 12,484 miles remained.

When Squ.-Ldr. Maclaren started his eastward flight round the world in England on March 25, accompanied by a pilot and a mechanician—Flying Officer W. N. Plenderleith and Sergeant R. Andrews—he undertook the venture on his own responsibility. The British air service gave him permission and his undertaking attracted widespread attention because it formed an informal race with American and other fliers attempting to girdle the globe.

Several times Maclaren had been halted by mishaps.

He started from Calshot, England, at 12.10 p.m., on March 25, and the same day was compelled by a fog to land at Havre. He reached Rome on March 28. Two days later he was forced to descend on the island of Corfu, his plane being slightly damaged.

On April 16 he arrived at Athens and took on a new motor from England. On April 19 he left Cairo for Bagdad.

Proceeding through Persia he reached India on April 23.

Engine Damaged.

On April 26 he met further delay, his engine being damaged in a landing at Parlu, India. He was delayed there several days. By May 16 he had reached Calcutta and on May 31 arrived at Akyab, Burma. His machine having suffered further damage, he replaced it with a spare aeroplane taken to him from Japan, where it had been left against such an emergency. The new machine was taken to Burma by American destroyers, a circumstance which caused Maclaren to cable: "Hats off to the Stars and Stripes for real sportsmanship."

Maclaren left Akyab for Rangoon on May 24 but suffered further damage in starting.

When Squ.-Ldr. Maclaren set out from England it was with two companions on an around-the-world route laid out over 23,254 miles.

It was estimated that this could be covered in 292 flying hours.

Although Maclaren hoped to reach London by June 28, he was delayed several times before he reached the east coast of Asia.

Before starting he arranged to have a second reserve plane and motor awaiting him in Canada. He enlisted the help of the Asiatic Petroleum Company, the Vickers interests and D. Napier & Co., which firms furnished him out with machines, engines, fuel and oil.

Eastward Route Chosen.

While the American world fliers who set out shortly before Maclaren's departure chose the westward route, the Englishmen chose the eastward, which had been mapped out by the late Sir Ross Smith.

The British route divides itself into five sections.

1. Calshot to Karachi, 4890½ miles.
2. Karachi to Tokio, 5879½ miles.
3. Tokio to Vancouver, 5417½ miles.
4. Vancouver to Ottawa, 2127 miles.
5. Ottawa to London, 4939½ miles.

The first section is the accepted route to India, and it was first flown by Squ.-Ldr. Maclaren, himself, in 1918.

As far as possible each difficult place along the whole route was tabulated in advance, and every aerodrome and water landing. The earlier stages have unit bases of the Royal Air Force but the route from India onward is one to throw an aviator largely on his own resources, lying through Indo-China to Hongkong and Shanghai and then with a 500-mile jump by sea to Japan.

North of Japan the route was laid out through the territory flown over by the American world flight party heading west and south—viâ the Kurile islands, Kamchatka, the Aleutian chain and Alaska to Vancouver, B. C., a stretch of 5417½ miles, foggy and uninhabited.

Stores Left by Trawler.

The Canadian trawler Thiepval laid stores for Maclaren in the Kurile region.

The dangers in this region include not only rocky islets, fog and storms, but slow moving birds, one of which could easily foul a propeller.

The Canadian air force prepared from the beginning to welcome Maclaren at Vancouver with all possible help for the long flight across Canada. The itinerary was laid out to include a seven-day halt at Montreal and the taking on of an engine with a higher compression ratio, giving more power from the same fuel consumption and thus increasing the flight radius for the Atlantic. The alterations arranged for the machine in Canada included the installation of an additional petrol tank and a wireless apparatus of limited radius.

St. Johns, Newfoundland, was selected as the jumping off place for the Atlantic flight, the route lying to the Azores, 1350 miles away—the longest stage of all. The average daily stage contemplated in the beginning was 300 to 500 miles.

The way from the Azores home was to lead through Madrid, Bordeaux and Paris to London.

Maclaren differing from most long distance airmen, preferred an amphibian machine—that is, a flying boat with a land undercarriage, which can be withdrawn above the keel line. This makes possible easy water landings, as we saw in Shanghai.

ANTI-WHITE CAMPAIGN IN HARBIN

Harbin, Aug. 5.

The police to-day searched the private apartments of Bishop Nestor, seeking illegal documents. Nothing was found beyond copies of a "White" newspaper, "Sviatelo Russ," the publication of which had been previously authorized by the police. Nevertheless the editor of the newspaper, M. Krivosheev, was arrested.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

BEAUTIFUL TSINGTAO

With a Few Suggestions How to Make It Still More Beautiful

From a Correspondent.

Tsingtao the beautiful is the name given to the city on Kiaochou Bay and it deserves the name, it is beautiful. The city is clean, but for how long only fate and the Chinese know, and the Chinese say "maskee."

The day was beautiful when we arrived and next morning after a cool night's sleep we strolled to the beach inhaling the clean fresh air from the sea. On speaking to a resident we said that the air was fine but we thought the nights were rather damp. The resident seemed about to strangled and we thought we had said something akin to lesse-majeste, but with a feeling that came from the most innermost part of the heart, he said; "Damp! Yes it is damp, but if you had been here for the past three weeks you would have found that it was dam—ph wet. Rain there was and then more rain."

Wonk Wonk.

There are two matters that are causing considerable agitation among the foreign residents at the present time. One is the wonks that roam the streets all night. In Manila they have roosters that crow all night and prevent sleep, but these can be silenced and aid the feeding of the inner man; in Tsingtao the wonks, for whose existence no one has as yet ever found a reason, howl from eleven at night until daylight. These dogs, and the residents believe there are more dogs in Tsingtao to the square foot than at any other place in the world, seem to belong to nobody and congregate in the foreign residential part of the city. Protest has been made to the consular body and to the authorities but in vain. There is a law that all dogs shall be muzzled and licensed; but the dogs and the police both treat the law with supreme contempt. The dogs take great delight in dodging the articles thrown at them by the infuriated sleepless and according to Mr. Ganahl, Taipan of the Robert Dollar Company, they are even organized in bands with a leader and each band attends strictly to the locality assigned, never infringing on the other bands, territories.

The Embryo Bugler.

The other nuisance, which begins just as the dogs leave off howling, are the buglers of the fleet of Admiral Wen. These musicians (?) start tootling just at daybreak, and of all agonizing, sleep-disturbing nerve-racking noises that ever came from an instrument of torture these buglers take first prize. It seems that the admiral has a considerable number of would-be musicians who are given a bugle and told to get out and learn, but not close to the residence of the admiral. They congregate on the beach, about 20 of them, and just as the poor taipan is getting a slight rest after the session with the dogs he is awakened by the sound of something that is a cross between a band saw cutting through a hard knot and a syren on a fire engine. Sleep is then out of the question.

The foreign population have entered protests to the British and American consulates and an appeal has been sent to both the Governor and the Admiral, but so far as in the case of the dogs, nothing has been done.

One resident stated that the only solution would be to use the execution grounds, and have a public execution of both dogs and buglers.

Regretted Changes.

There have been rumours that the present governor was about to be sent to another field of endeavour and last Saturday it came officially that he was to be placed in charge as Director of Construction of the connexion link of the Hankow—Canton Railway, which is to be started soon.

The transfer of Mr. Si, the purchasing agent of the Kiaochou-Tsinan Railway to Peking has been very much regretted by the foreign residents as Mr. Si, in the time he has been in Tsingtao has demonstrated that he is a thorough modern business man and placed his department on a thorough business basis. Another change that was regreted was the transfer of the Chief Engineer to the Hankow-Canton Railway.

At the present time there are more than 400 vacant houses and in the Japanese section over half the houses are vacant and rapidly falling into a state of decay.

The party who ran the infamous International Club at Tientsin has opened a gambling club on one of the main streets. In the few days it has been running there have already been allegations of faked wheels and apparatus. The foreigners are very much put out that this club has been permitted to open and if allowed to run it will create such a scandal that will tend to ruin the resort for summer visitors.

Hospitality Repaid.

The people are very hospitable and the visitor like the prophet of old when leaving can honestly say with a fervent feeling; "I was a stranger and ye took me in." They really do and all that is required in return is that you leave all you have even to the last copper, as why have any money when you have a return ticket. The foreign business man, however, will go out of his way to see that you have an enjoyable time.

It is worth while to feel the cool fresh sea breeze and even to see the clean sea water and get a drink of water that does not require to be boiled and strained. We will go again but will take more money.

PROPOSED MOTOR-ROAD IN KUANGTUNG

Supplement to Sunning Railway: Capital of $500,000 to be Raised in Small Shares

Canton, July 31.

The Sunwui district of Kuangtung, of which Kongmoon is an important and open port, will soon have a motor road, many miles long. Half a million dollars is being raised for the enterprise. The contract for building the road will be let in three sections. The first will run from Sunwui City to Peikai by way of Kongmoon, the second from Sunwui to Taiwongshi, passing through several towns, and the third from Owwan to Samchuen. The capital for the road will be raised in small shares of five dollars each, and it is expected that overseas Chinese from Sunwui and inhabitants of towns and villages to be benefited by the road will subscribe. A feature of the financial scheme is that parcels of land needed for the road may be paid for in shares, while shares may also be obtained by supplying labour.

The proposed road will supplement the Sunning Railroad, which connects Kongmoon and Toyshan City and other towns beyond.

In addition to the proposed motor road, the Sunning Railroad Company is taking steps to open Tungkoo for a trade port. The initial capital of $100,000 for this enterprise has been fully subscribed by the company, but another $1,000,000, it is estimated, will be required.—Reuter's Pacific Service.

JAPAN'S LUXURY TARIFF

Detrimental Effect on British Trade

London, Aug. 5.

In the House of Commons to-day at question time, Mr. Sydney Webb, the President of the Board of Trade, said that he was aware that many contracts for forward delivery of British manufactured goods had been cancelled by Japanese buyers as a result of the new Japanese luxury tariff. He said that British representations had already elicited a concession and the Government were endeavouring to obtain a further mitigation of the adverse effects due to the introduction of the new duties at short notice.—Reuter.

One of the latest commercial uses of the aeroplane is that of sowing seed, successfully demonstrated in the suburban territory of Miami, Florida, recently, when 640 acres of land were sown to carpet grass in 20 minutes. For this area, it was said, two men hand-seeders would required 30 days.

DARING OUTRAGE ON HAN RIVER

Attack on Launch: River Robbers' $30,000 Booty

From Our Own Correspondent.

Wuchang, July 31.

A few days ago, a native launch on the Han River was robbed in a way which strongly reminds one of the methods used by the pirates last year on the coasting vessels off the east coast and in the West River.

The launch, the Yuin Chiang, was running from Tienmen down to Hankow on the 24th instant. At a small place called Luchiahang, three men bought tickets and came on board as passengers. Lower down, at Hohwaan (Lotus Flower Temple) these three men suddenly produced pistols, which they fired to terrify the other passengers, and then making down below they compelled the engineer to stop the engine. They had chosen a place where a bed of high reeds lines the river bank; and at their call, out of these reeds appeared two small boats, with about 10 men on board. These confederates, jumping on to the launch, drew pistols and threatened all who showed any resistence. The assistant engineer was shot through the cheek, and several of his teeth were knocked out.

The passengers were naturally cowed by the noise and confusion, and the robbers proceeded to clean out everything of value from the boat. Dollars, cash notes, ornaments and anything else of worth were all seized. Mere copper coins were thrown into the water as not being worth carrying away. The total booty is said to have amounted to over $30,000. No bodily harm was done to any of the passengers; but some soldiers or police who were in uniform were evidently an object of attack. One of the police, who was a native of Tienmen, was shot dead, and the rest threw themselves into the water to escape. Having collected their spoils into the two boats, the robbers made their escape.

It appears that the robbers were local men. Their accent is said to have been of the local dialect, Tienmen or Mienyang. Moreover, they wore straw hats with a broad brim in front pulled down over the face, as if they feared recognition. The proprietors of the launch of course reported the affair to the yamên as soon as they learned of the incident, and investigation has been promised.

Lawlessness on the Han River.

The above affair is one of the most daring outrages that has been perpetrated recently. But travelling on the Han has been unsafe for a long time, and small native boats are frequently the victims of these local robbers. Generally the attack is made by night, when the boats are anchored; and for this reason the raid always is made by night, when the boats are anchored; and for this reason they always prefer to anchor in groups, so that they may assist one another in case of attack. Two or three months ago, a representative of Messrs. Butterfield & Swire was robbed when travelling in his launch on the upper reaches of the Han above Anlufu. He lost his watch, fountain pen and type writer besides all the cash he carried; and his interpreter and engineer were also robbed of nearly all that they possessed.

A half successful attempt has just been made to capture in Hankow two robbers who have been wanted for some time. Their names are Wang Chin-piao and Wang Hsin-yu. Last March, they were active in the region of Huangkung. Their most notable feat was robbing the house of a wealthy man named Li, and relieving him of 8,000 strings of cash. An attempt to apprehend them failed. A few days ago it was reported that these two were in hiding in Hankow. They were located on a boat in the river, belonging to a Honan company. A small detachment of river police were sent to arrest them. Wang Chi-yu was captured; but unfortunately Wang Chi-piao has got wind of the danger beforehand and made good his escape.

Daytime Ghost.

A ghost story of some interest appears in the native press. A certain large house in Hankow near the Maloo has been standing empty for some time, because it had the reputation of being haunted by a "fox fairy." This year, the house has been taken by a man called Chen. For some time, nothing unusual was noticed; but after a while, the members of his family declared that they frequently saw a young man, dressed in black, wandering about. He was sometimes seen in the daytime, but more often by night. Mr. Chen, not feeling at ease, called in some Taoist priests, who burned incense and performed certain incantations. Since then, the apparition has not been seen.

WENCHOW'S TRADE HELD UP BY BAD ACCESS

Customs' Recommendations for Much Needed Improvement and How to Find the Money

From Our Own Correspondent.

Wenchow, Chê., Aug. 2.

The rapidly increasing trade of Wenchow makes more and more evident the inadequate and undignified approaches to the city from the river. The sloping jetty at the North Gate, the five-turn approach into the city, the inadequate and insanitary condition of the river-front demand immediate attention. At times the North Gate entrance—incidentally also the fish market—is so full of cargo that it is with difficulty that the pedestrian can make his way from the city to post-office, customs house or steamer.

The Customs authorities have suggested to the local officials that some structural improvements should be made and have suggested (1) The improving of the North Gate jetty (2) The making of a broad straight approach from the jetty into the city. (3) The improvement of the river front by more adequate bunding. These suggestions have been discussed by the District Council and considerable interest evidenced.

The chief question was how to raise the necessary funds. The Customs authorities made certain suggestions, the chief of which was a charge of 5 per cent. of the duty exacted on imports and exports and offered to collect this at a charge of 5 per cent. of the sum collected for expenses. A special Committee was appointed by the District Council to consider the whole matter and report. This Committee has made the following suggestions to the Council.

1.—The acquiring of private property, the work of building wharfs, and and the improving of the river front shall be undertaken by the Executive Committee. The Committee shall make suggestions which must be brought to the Council for sanction. In the matter of construction of the Customs' godown and bunding the river front the Executive Committee shall co-operate with the Commissioner of Customs.

2.—In the purchasing of private property the Executive shall estimate the value in accordance with the "Regulations for the acquiring of Private Property."

3.—Competitive estimates for the construction work shall be obtained and brought to the Council for consideration.

4.—The work shall commence when the collection of the proposed dues is carried out.

5.—The collection of the dues shall be delegated to the Customs authorities and an allowance of 5 per cent. of the total collected be allowed for salaries and expenses.

6.—A charge shall be made on imported goods only. All exports shall be exempt.

7.—The money so collected shall not be used for any other purpose than city improvements

When the Customs' report for the year 1923 is taken into consideration it is evident that after allowing for the usual fluctuations in trade, a sum of at least 50,000 Haikwan taels could be obtained in five years, and in Wenchow great improvements could be made with such a sum, provided, of course, the money is spent on the improvements.

Several Harbin sportsmen who went up the river to the Custom House the other day report a remarkable "fisherman's" story, says the "Harbin Daily News." According to them one spot up the river was literally crowded with big fish, so much that it was difficult to row through the place. While passing this school of fish, one big fellow suddenly flopped straight into the boat. He was subsequently weighed and found to be 13 pounds. This is reported to be the second case of this sort on the Sungari this summer.

Ten-thousand tons of ammunition being carried in a single ship is rather a rare achievement, but this is what a Russian transport which anchored off Colombo, has done. The vessel, which is the Transbalt, has been lying in that position since last evening, says the "Ceylon Observer" of the 18th ultimo. All shore communications with her have been cut off and she is, being watched. The Transbalt is a vessel of 11,397 tons and is one of the biggest ships owned by the Government Baltic Co. She was formerly called the Riga and then re-named the Belgravia, but since the Baltic Government came to own her she has been called the Transbalt. She is registered in Petrograd, flies the Russian flag and is on her way to Vladivostok.

21 MEN ARRESTED IN CONNEXION WITH MURDER OF A DETECTIVE

Exciting Work by French Police During Week-end: Strong Suspicion of Southern Political Intrigue in the First Crime: A Prisoner's Desperate Bolt for Liberty

The French Police, after days of skilful and patient detective work, made a batch of sensational arrests over the week-end in connexion with the murder of a Chinese detective at the corner of Route Saigon, in the Rue du Consulat, on July 27 last. An amazing story of political intrigue lies behind the affair, bearing out the suggestions contained in our columns some days ago that recruiting on a large scale is being carried on in Shanghai on behalf of the Cantonese armies.

The circumstances of the murder of the Chinese detective were as follows: At about eight o'clock on the night of July 27 the unhappy man heard shots outside of a barber's shop. He hurried to the scene, and saw a man with a smoking revolver. He rushed upon him to effect his arrest, but the assassin turned round and shot him through the face, killing him instantly. This man then made good his escape, followed by the individual at whom he originally shot. The latter failed to make any report on the matter to the police and was not seen again, until he, together with his assailant, was arrested with the other men during the week-end.

Recruiting for the South.

The man at whom the shots were fired whilst he was coming from the barber's shop gives his name as Zung Kong-kong, alias Zung Seng, and claims to be a general commanding the 4th Infantry Brigade of Kiangsi, stationed at Canton and attached to Dr. Sun Yat-sen. He adds that he was sent here to recruit men and obtain weapons for his regiment.

His story then becomes somewhat involved. He states that another person, one Ou Seng-ching, an ex-general in the Cantonese army also under arrest, was in Shanghai before his arrival for the same purpose as himself. This man, he says, was a frequent visitor of his, and they held conversations concerning the murder of one Yu Ho-new, a bandit chief who was shot in Yunnan Road, Shanghai, last March. He refuses to detail these conversations and will not state how they were concerned with this particular murder. On the other hand he states that "they reached an amicable settlement,"—whatever that may mean. He goes on to say further that he and Ou Song-ching arranged for yet another man to buy 200 revolvers and obtain recruits for Canton.

Regarding the actual shooting, he states that after a conversation with Ou Song-ching on July 27, he left him, and went to a barber's shop. Then Sou Seng-sung, so he alleges, followed him with three or four companions, and they all waited for him to come out. When he did so two shots were fired at him, and missed, and then the detective came on the scene, and was killed. Who fired the shots he was unable to state. This is as far his story goes.

Of the 21 men arrested, four were caught by the Settlement police in Yangtszepoo and handed over to the French authorities. The others were all arrested in the French Concession, and are mostly men recruited by the generals or their agents for the Canton army.

A Dash for Freedom.

One of the arrested men made a desperate bid for freedom during the general interrogation of all the prisoners on Sunday morning, in the office of the Intelligence Bureau. He was handcuffed to one of his companions; suddenly he was seen to give a wrench and to snap the cuffs. He darted quickly out of the door and down the Avenue Joffre. At once Detectives du Rocher and Gioulis were after him and fired at him twice, though without wounding him. They brought him back after a ten minutes' chase, however.

ANTI-FOREIGN MOVE IN THE Y. M. C. A.

Last Week's Conference: Divided Feelings: A Movement to Be Resisted

The National Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association met last week at its annual meeting at the Shanghai College, Yangtszepoo. This committee directs Y.M.C.A. work in 47 cities and in 201 students' centuries throughout China.

Among the most important problems facing the Y.M.C.A. is the work among students, particularly those in Government schools, many of whom are interested in the movement. The question which most acutely faced the committee was the extent to which they could spread out in new centres, developing new organizations and coming into contact with new groups of students. Their secretary who was charged with popular education, Mr. James Yen, had been released to do that work exclusively, but the National Committee would continue its efforts in that direction, co-operating with the various organizations interested in it.

Opium also was a serious problem to be dealt with. The National Committee expects to devote itself unstintedly to the suppression of the habit during the next few years. Three of its best secretaries, Mr. M. T. Tchou, Dr. H. C. E. Liu and Dr. Philip Chen, were allocated to this work. A campaign against opium will be conducted from all Y. M. C. A. centres.

With regard to the anti-Christian movement which seems to be developing among students, an official of the organization said that they would fight it with light, not heat. They would educate the people to realize the uselessness of anti-Christian and anti-foreign movements and the usefulness of working for the betterment of conditions in China. In this connexion, it might be expected that literature will be sent broadcast throughout the country.

Two vacancies in the National Committee were filled by Dr. C. T. Wang and General Feng Yu-hsiang. Mr. Wen Shih-tsen, Commissioner of Foreign Affairs at Nanking was one of the most important members of the Committee to attend. Dr. John Y. Lee, Rev. Z. T. Kaung and Professor Caho of Honan contributed to the discussion. The General Secretary of the Committee, Mr. David Yui was absent on sick leave.

NATIONAL DAY OF SWITZERLAND

Celebrations by Swiss Community

Last Friday was Switzerland's national day, when the union of the Republic's 21 cantons which was begun in 1291, was celebrated in the usual fashion. Last Friday morning Major J. L. Isler, the Swiss Consul-General, held a recepton at the Consulate and entertained about 60 of his follow-countrymen.

Among the guests were Messrs. Herensperger, R. Plattner, F. Schwyzer, T. Troller, A. Baer, T. Housser, J. Merlan, W. Bleak, Hegner and J. A. Robbsner and many others.

The afternoon was given over to sports and celebrations at the Swiss Club, when the Swiss community with wives and families turned out in full force.

There were games for the children on the Club's playgrounds and later in the afternoon games for grown ups. Major Isler made a short speech and the Swiss hymn "Oh mein Heimatland" was sung. Prizes were distributed by Mme. G. Heusser. A cold supper at 7.45 p.m. was followed by a musical entertainment.

MINGHONG'S MONTE CARLO CLOSED

Where Industrious Citizens of Shanghai Studied the Laws of Profit and Loss

The fashionable world of Shanghai has, we understand, been deprived of another source of innocent amusement, already sadly depleted now that the cabarets have to close at the ridiculous hour of 2 a.m. It is reported that the Minghong Monte Carlo has closed its doors—whether voluntarily or under compulsion of Chinese officials who find themselves ashamed to take the money we do not know. If the news is correct it will be a sad blow to many, and not least to members of the eminent and other deserving bodies of public men who have now and again been seen at Minghong, doubtless there for the purpose of studying interesting social matters at first hand.

Minghong seems to have had a fairly successful run since the opening of the establishment was announced by the Chinese reporter who was so impressed by "the heavy tread" and the top hats of the foreigners who first appeared there. Patrons have been numerous, and the traditionally generous policy of free motor-cars and free champagne has tended towards the usual prosperous results, prosperous from a managerial point of view. We have heard of no one having broken the bank, but of many patrons broken in the attempt to accomplish this laudable ambition. One foreigner, one hears, might have gone very near success had he realized how nicely fortune was treating him. After a fair run of success at the wheel, he suddenly realized that he had been playing with $5 chips and not, as he had supposed, discs of a modest 50 cent. denomination. He at once reduced his unit to 50 cents and from that moment began to lose. The question is, had he doubled his stake might not the establishment have closed down earlier?

There have been adventures by the wayside, some of them disastrous to the persons concerned. The story goes that a recent visitor to the wheel had a credit balance of between $5,000 and $6,000 when he cashed in his cheques and sensibly called for a car. Whether the news was passed outside by an observant Chinese no one knows, but the report is that the car had not proceeded any great distance along the road to Shanghai before it was held up by a gang of Chinese, who compelled the foreigner to hand over his winnings. The police at this end have heard nothing of the matter, it seems, and this rather discounts the story, for surely no foreigner would submit to such outrageous treatment without making a fuss.

If Minghong is closed, patrons may compose themselves in the full confidence that some other opportunity of earning a little money in their spare time will surely and speedily be provided. For the wheel is irrepressible, and no one has ever yet been able to put a spoke in it.

WEDDINGS

Hocking-Eickmeyer

A very pretty home wedding was celebrated on Saturday afternoon at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Clark, 64 Route Doumer, when Miss Ada R. Eickmeyer, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. C. F. William Eickmeyer of Dayton, Ohio, and Mr. Samuel Hocking, son of Mrs. William Hallow of Detroit, Michigan, were married. Dr. D. Willard Lyon performed the ceremony and Mr. J. B. Sawyer was present as U. S. consular representative. The house was effectively decorated for the occasion in green and pink, the archway into the living room where the ceremony was performed being a lacework of feathery bamboo, while palms and pink posies banked fireplaces and mantelpieces.

The bride, who was given away by Mr. Lawrence K. Hall, wore a very stylish and becoming gown of white satin, artistically draped, the trimming caught on the left hip with a pearl ornament. A cape effect of silk lace fell from the shoulders, sweeping round to the left side where it was gathered into the gore of the skirit. The long veil was fastened into a cap shape with orange blossoms and the bridal bouquet was water lilies with maiden hair ferns, tied with long ribbands. The maid of honour, Miss Catharine G. Smith, wore lavender satin cut on the simple lines of the moment, with circular flounces, and carried pink carnations. Little Miss Emogene Clark, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Clark, made a picturesque flower girl in fluffy green organdie, trimmed with chiffon buds in pastel shades. She carried a gold basket of pink carnations from which she scattered pink flower petals in the path of the bride.

The bridegroom was attended by Mr. Edgar S. Wise as best man. Immediately preceding the ceremony Mrs. George C. Kerr sang "O Promise Me," "I Love You Truly," and other love lyrics, Mrs. Harvey V. Stokely playing her accompaniments and also the Wedding March. A delightful reception followed which was attended by more than a hundred friends of the popular young couple. Mesdames Kempton, S. E. Taylor, and Clark assisted in receiving. Miss Eickmeyer was for some years in the office of the National Committee of the Y.M.C.A., while Mr. Hocking is professor of sociology at Futan University, Kiangwan, where they will be at home after September 1. After the reception Mr. and Mrs. Hocking left on their honeymoon trip to Kuling, the bride wearing a modish white voile trimmed with black lace and embroidery and a white hat.

Ulf-Hansen—Kousnetzova

On Wednesday at the Russian Church, and afterwards at the Danish Conculate, the marriage took place of Mr. Uwe Ulf-Hansen, son of Mr. Ulf-Hansen, K.C., of Copenhagen, Denmark, and Miss Zlatta Alexandrovna Kousnetzova, daughter of Mr. A. N. Kousnetzova, of Ekaterinburg. Mr. Hansen is a member of the staff of Messrs. Geo. McBain, and both he and his bride are well-known and popular among a large circle of friends in Shanghai.

The ceremony at the Church, which was choral, was performed by the Russian Archemandrite, the Rev. Fr. Makary, and the Danish Vice-Consul (Mr. H. Heigel) presided at the official ceremony, of which Gen. Borodin and Capt. Smolin were the witnesses.

The bride was charmingly attired in white Liberty, covered with georgette and daintily trimmed with fleurs d'orange, a pretty festoon of these also adorning her veil. She carried a beautiful bouquet of white carnations, with trailing white ribbons. Following the ceremony, a reception was held at 11 Rue Chapsal, which is to be the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Hansen, and here they received the congratulations and best wishes of a host of friends.

ARMED ROBBER FOILED

Arrested as Result of Chinese Woman's Prompt Action

An armed robber caused some excitement along Avenue Edward VII on Sunday forenoon. His plan of raiding an exchange shop in the usual manner was spoiled by an enterprising Chinese lady who made good use of a police whistle, at the sound of which the would-be robber bolted. As the shop was in the vicinity of the French police station, the alarm was heard and promptly answered, with the result that the robber was soon racing along the Avenue, pursued by a police cyclist. Darting into a side street, he was held up by another constable and, showing fight, was brought into a reasonable frame of mind by a blow with the butt end of a carbine. The incident appropriately concluded with a procession to the police station.

THE Chapei Electricity & Waterworks Co., Ld., held its inaugural meeting on Monday afternoon at the Benevolent Society's building in Tatung Road. Shareholders present numbered 193, and shares representated 112,738. Mr. Shen Lien-fang, the Chairman of the Promoting Committee, presided. He read a report which stated that up to date, the amount of capital paid in by shareholders was $1,311,940, exceeding by one-fourth the capital required. The company's Regulations, consisting of 36 articles in six sections were passed with some slight amendments. Eleven directors and five supervisors were elected.

AKALI PILGRIMS IN SHANGHAI

Received on the Foreshore by Hundreds of Sikh Residents: Imposing Procession

No small excitement was caused on Sunday when over 500 Sikhs met on the Bund to greet 11 pilgrims of the Akali religious movement who arrived in Shanghai from Vancouver on the Empress of Australia.

At about 3.55 p.m. a large but orderly gathering appeared in front of the "North-China Daily News" building, bearing several banners of black and yellow, on one of which the inscription read: "Shahdi Jatha (Martyr Band) from Canada Going to Jaito, Nabha (India)." The company formed up into two parallel lines and one of the party, mounting on a stool, began an address which was greeted with loud cheers. There were also present many Indian women and children, all dressed in black garments and with their heads enshrouded in black cowls. Black turbans were also the order of the day.

On the arrival of the tender the party again broke out into loud cheers and a bugle was sounded. The pilgrims presently appeared, one of them who occupied a central position of the little procession which left the Customs jetty, bearing on his head what appeared to be a small stool on which rested the sacred book. This was covered with red and blue covering and fanned by a man behind with what resembled a fly switch used by Chinese riders. The pilgrims were met by one of the Shanghai party who commenced a chant, while the remainder answered in responses. The pilgrims were then greeted by the Indian women, who placed garlands of red and yellow flowers around their necks and proceeded to chant an Indian dirge. The sacred book was then placed in a motor-car and was covered with a very beautiful gold and crimson covering, while its bearer accompanied it inside the car, still continuing the process of fanning. A Chinese band lent by Gen. H. Feng-ling, then headed the procession, which was immediately followed by the sacred book.

The procession then made its way along Foochow Road, Thibet Road, Haining Road, and North Szechuen Road to the Sikh temple. It was a long and weary tramp, especially on a hot afternoon. The procession moved very slowly and made many halts at each of which loud cheers were given, each man holding up his right hand. This much amused the large number of Chinese spectators, who lined the streets all the way. The band set up the strains of the "Yanks are Coming" and on reaching the Sikh temple the procession was greeted by a display of rockets. The procession disappeared within while the sacred bok was deposited in a safe place. The temple already contains two sacred books, so that the one which featured in the procession was now dispensed with, having evidently served its purpose.

One imagines a Sikh temple as having a dim and mystical appearance, but this temple is quite simple in design. It resembles more an Evangelican meeting house. At the far end there is an altar over which hangs a rich canopy. Here were placed the two sacred books covered with black and gold covers. The service, too, was of a simple nature. Two addresses were given, after which a short penitential prayer was intoned. Several poems of praise of at least 20 pages each were then sung, followed by a curious chant accompanied by drums, cymbals and all kinds of music. A short address followed from one of the pilgrims.

The movement is primarily, so it is claimed, a religious movement, but also takes the form of a protest against the dismissal from office of Rapduman Singh, Indian Governor Nabha. The followers also claim that the Indian Government have unfairly interfered with their religion and have imprisoned many of its adherents. Their policy, however, is one of passive resistance and they still claim to be loyal subjects, though all to the last man are, so they would have us believe, prepared to die for their cause.

RICSHA COOLIES' PETITION

Reduction of the Number of Licensed Ricshas in the Interests of "Big Owners"

The Chinese press says that rickshamen appear to be greatly alarmed at the decision of the Municipal Council to reduce the number of public ricshas from 15,000 to 10,000. The coolies have drawn up a very long petition, copies of which have been submitted to different guilds established by their countrymen at Shanghai, setting forth the alleged high-handed and cruel manner in which they have been treated by the large ricsha owners. "This treatment culminated in a strike in September and October, 1922. After settling the dispute, no definite rules were fixed for equitable enjoyment of all rights by the men, so the oppressive methods adopted by big owners were soon revived. Since January 1, 1924, the Council decided to put no limit to the number of ricshas on public hire, to the infinite relief of the ricshamen. Small owners have been enabled to compete with the big proprietors on the same terms. A company asked the Council to restrict the number of ricsha licences in February, 1924, but its request was turned down, for which all ricshamen felt very grateful to the Council. Now, only a few months have elapsed, and the Council is again listening to the big owners who favour reduction of the number from 15,000 to 10,000, to the great consternation of all ricshamen and small owners."

Their petition here submits a number of demands for better treatment of the pullers.

The petitioners ask the guilds to retransmit their complaint to the Municipal Council.

KIDNAPPERS OUTWITTED

Robbers Who Lost $1,000 Through Resourceful Captive's Escape

A circumstantial story of abduction, one or many which have recently appeared in the Chinese press, was published on Monday. It related that on Friday last a wealthy Ningpo merchant residing in Santai Road, in the northern district, received a letter purporting to come from a friend which induced him to visit a house in Tsingtao Road. Here he was received by robbers, who demanded payment of $5,000 and threatened to take the merchant's life if the money were not forthcoming. This demand, together with instructions as to how the money was to be handed over, was despatched to the merchant's family, members of which fell into such alarm that they were afraid to communicate with the police. They got together $1,000 and intended to take it to the place named, but were surprised on Sunday morning when the merchant himself returned home at an early hour. He reported that he had escaped while his captors were asleep, jumping from a window. The story concludes with the statement that the police were informed and that an Inspector went to the house in Tsingtao Road only to find that the robber gang had vanished. No such report was made to the Municipal Police, but the matter is now being inquired into.

The sequal to another story of kidnapping, also published on Monday says that the victim, another Ningpo man of wealth, has had his place of captivity changed and is now incarcerated on Child Island, Tsungming.

FUNERAL OF LATE MR. CECIL HOLLIDAY

The remains of the late Mr. Cecil Holliday were interred at Bubbling Well Cemetery last Friday afternoon in the presence of many of the friends and business colleagues by whom he had been so much respected during his long residence in Shanghai. In the morning, at 8.30, a choral Requiem Mass was held at St. Joseph's Church and was conducted by the Rev. Fr. D. F. McDonald, S.J., there being a very numerous congregation. There remained only the last simple ceremony at the graveside, and this also was conducted by the Rev. Fr. McDonald. Among those who attended were Mr. Barton, H.M. Consul-General, Mr. H. P. Wilkinson, Mr. L. W. C. Lorden, Mr. John Prentice, Mr. C. M. Bain, Mr. E. F. Mackay, Mr. J. H. Lampert, Mr. T. E. Trueman, Mr. R. C. Farbridge, Mr. D. Stewart, Mr. Richardson, Mr. C. M. G. Burnie, Mr. P. W. O. Liddell, Mr. Gilbert Peet, Mr. Smallbones, Mr. W. R. Walter, Mr. Penfold, Mr. Lockyer, Mr. S. S. Sellick and Mr. E. Q. Cooper. Mr. R. C. Phillippo was chief mourner, and the pall bearers were Sir Edward Pearce and Messrs. A. W. Burkill, C. R. Burkill, Calder Marshall, C. H. Arnhold and C. W. Porter.

The grave was banked with evergreens and flowers, and very many beautiful wreaths were sent.

NATIVE CITY POLICE REFORMS

Reckless Chauffeurs Beware: Finger Print System Adopted

The genesis of a Criminal Investigation Department for the native City is hinted at in the Chinese press.

It states that the District Court of Procuration has adopted a system of taking and recording the finger prints of all prisoners. An understanding, it is understood, has been reached with the Municipal Police of the Settlement to exchange duplicate copies of the records of finger prints with photos, and to render mutual assistance whenever possible.

Another commendable action taken by the Court is its decision to cancel the licence of any chauffeur who shall have caused any fatal or serious accident by reckless driving, and forbid him to become a chauffeur again. In order to make the penalty effective, the Settlement authorities have been approached and it is anticipated will fall into line with the City Court in meting out similar punishment to all offending chauffeurs wherever such accidents may occur.

Post-mortem examinations, hitherto conducted by ignorant persons, often dishonest and usually belonging to the undertaker class, will be made by a competent coroner.

AMERICAN IMMIGRANT RESTRICTIONS

Visa Requirements for Chinese Students

The American Consulate-General is in receipt of a telegraphic instruction from the Department of State, dated August 2, 1924, which states in effect as follows:

The new immigration act is explicit in requiring approval by the Secretary of Labour of educational institutions in the United States to be attended by Chinese students.

Such approvals must be obtained in advance in each case until the list of approved institutions can be prepared and forwarded.

Owing to the necessity of consulting the institutions, an approved list is not yet prepared.

In the meantime, endeavours should be made to prevent whenever possible, the departure of Chinese students for whom prior approval of institutions has not been obtained.

The Department's telegram was received in response to several urgent telegrams from this Consulate-General, requesting information as to the requirements to enable Chinese students to sail for the United States.

CHINESE RECEPTION TO ADMIRAL McVAY

On Monday afternoon at the Bureau of Foreign Affairs, Mr. Hsu Yuan, the Chinese Commissioner, gave a reception in honour of the American Admiral of the Yangtze flotilla, Admiral McVay. A large number of Chinese and American guests attended in the new home of the Chinese official, just across Siccawei Creek, which one arrives at by motoring along Route Ghisi.

Among those present were:—Admiral McVay, Captain Hinrichs, Executive of the U. S. S. Isabel, Captain James, U. S. S. Piegon, Gen. Ho Feng-lin, Gen. Wong, Mr. Fu Siao-en, Mr. Tong Shao-yi, Mr. Shen, City Magistrate, Mr. Yen, Director S. N. Railway, Mr. Chang and representatives of the Chinese Navy. Other foreigners in the guest list included Mr. Cunningham, the U. S. Consul-General, Mr. S. Fessenden, Chairman S. M. C., Mr. V. G. Lyman, American representative on the Council, Mr. J. P. Davis, U. S. Executive Consul, Mr. W. Morris, Mr. J. B. Powell, and Mr. N. F. Allman. Mr. Williams, son of Dean Williams of the University of Missouri, visiting Shanghai, attended, as did the majority of the American Consular staff and Admiral McVay's staff and other officers.

THE CHINA BASEBALL COMMISSION

Organized for the Promotion of Baseball in China, among Chinese Principally

This organization was created a year ago, by H. B. Gallop and F. P. Bills, with the object of developing the game of Baseball among the Chinese, first in Shanghai, and if sufficient interest is aroused here, to extend the Commission's activities for the promotion of the game, to all parts of China.

Up to the present time in Shanghai, the Chinese have no real opportunity to familiarize themselves with baseball, as played by their American friends, as the game has been confined solely to the Race Course.

Messrs. Gallop and Bills, have had the opportunity to observe that the Chinese may possibly take up the game with enthusiasm if they are given proper facilities and opportunities to become acquainted with the game. Baseball is prevalent to some extent in local Chinese schools and colleges but not carried on too enthusiastically. By an organized effort to stir up keen interest it is believed the Chinese may eventually take up the game with the same spirit and enthusiasm that prevails in America and Japan.

With this in view the first real step taken by the Commission was the creation of the Pioneer Baseball Field, situated in the French Settlement at the corner of Rue De 1' Observatoire and Rue Amiral Bayle. The matter of securing land large enough for a baseball field conveniently located proves to be no easy accomplishment in Shanghai. The Commission, however, were most fortunate in securing the present site for this new field, which is conveniently situated and easily accessible. Rue Amiral Bayle being a continuation of Mohawk Road permits one to start at the Race Club at the corner of Mohawk Bubbling Well Roads, and proceed down Mohawk Road into Amiral Bayle direct to the field. It is about a 10 minute ricksha ride by this way to the field. The field is easily reached by tramcar. Getting off at the corner of Rue Amiral Bayle and Avenue Joffre one may proceed down Bayle to the field, taking about six minutes by walking or two or three minutes by ricsha, or getting off at the corner of Avenue Dubail and Rue De l'Observatoire one may proceed down Rue de l'Observatoire to the field, taking about two or three minutes walking time.

The field will be fed by omnibuses on game days, one line running from the Bund and Edward VII up Edward VII and to the field. Another line will probably run from the corner of either Mohawk Road and Bubbling Well Road or Mohawk Road and Avenue Edward VII to the field.

The Pioneer Basehall Field compares favourably with any of the major league parks at home. The diamond is one ofth e finest to be found anywhere Baseball is played. The shortest point to the foul lines is 300 feet from home plate, making the actual playing area of the field larger than the Polo Grounds in New York. The entire field is encircled by stands, and about 5,000 persons can be comfortably seated. The field will be ready about the end of August or early September.

In additibn to the Pioneer Baseball Field, the Committee plan to open four more fields in Shanghai, one in Jessfield, Kiangwan, Hongkew and Yangtszepoo. These latter fields will be more in the nature of play grounds, where equipment for playing baseball will be supplied those who care to make use of same. They will not be built on the elaborate scale of the pioneer Baseball Field. To encourage the Chinese to play, without causing them any great expense, equipment of all kinds, excepting suits and shoes, will be at their disposal on the Pioneer Baseball Field, as well as on the other four contemplated. Arrangements for coaching and providing instructors will be made, and this department will probably be headed by Harry Kingman. The game will be developed on an amateur basis.

Mr. Bills is now in the states, endeavouring to obtain recognition and support of the project from the American Baseball Commission. The personal of the Commission will be enlarged after Mr. Bills returns from the states in September. Two well known local Chinese newspapers have agreed to join the Commission, and probably, as the activities of the Commission are enlarged, the personal will be increased. The project is not a commercial venture.

The Shanghai Amateur Baseball Club, is in no way connected with the China Baseball Commission, or the Pioneer Baseball Field, in spite of the fact that the personnel of the Commission includes two of their well known members. In order to devote their undivided attention to the activities of the Commission Messrs. Gallop and Bills may find it necessary to relieve thmeselves of any active connexion with the Baseball Club in 1925, if not before.

The baseball diamond, depicted above, by far the best ever constructed outside the confines of North America, is the result of the enterprise of Messrs. H. B. Gallop and F. Bills, who propose instructing Chinese in the national game of America. Erected in Rue de l'Observatoire the enclosure stands are capable of seating 5,000 spectators.

A lengthy telegram was despatched by M.P.'s from Shanghai to M. Painlevé, Speaker of the Chamber of Deputies, and M. Herriot, the French Premier, protesting against the French demand for payment of the Boxer Indemnity in gold francs. This message was drafted weeks ago, says the Chinese press. Both the Peking and Tientsin telegraph offices refused to accept it.

A meeting was held at the Bureau of Foreign Affairs on Tuesday to discuss the disposal of the Russian ships and reptriation of Russian refugees. A letter from Mr. Chao Chin-ching, a merchant, emphasized the absolute necessity of repatriating the Russian refugees at an early date. Mr. Chao thought it practical to sell the Russian ships and use the proceeds from their sale to defray the expenses of sending away the Russians. Others thought that some other workable plan to raise adequate funds should be evolved.

MISSIONARY AND SCHOLAR

The Late Dr. Hopkyn Rees's Distinguished Career

Dr. Hopkyn Rees who passed away so suddenly in London, on August 4, was one of the most distinguished foreigners who ever came to China. He will remain an authority on Chinese language and literature and his long and eventful residence in China as a missionary has played a prominent part in the founding of several educational institutions for the study of the Chinese language.

Born at Ceomavan in Glamorganshire in 1859 he came out here at institutions for the study of Chinese, the early age of 24 for the London Missionary Society, having previously studied at Bala College and for a short time held a pastorate in Wales. At the outset of his missionary career he was in 1883 appointed to Peking, and with Dr. Sewell Macfarlane brought about the opening of a new station at Chichou, Chihli, in 1887. He was in charge of the mission in Tientsin from 1901 to 1903 and took part in the settlement of the negotiations over the Boxer trouble, for which he received the Decoration of the Blue Button from the Empress. Later when transferred to Peing he was one of the founders of the Language School, and was a member of the board of Revisers of the Old Testament Scriptures in Mandarin. His connexion with the Christian Literature Society brought him to Shanghai where he followed Dr. Timothy Richard in the office of general secretary. Whilst in Shanghai he served on the Education committee of the Municipal Council and was organizer and tutor in the British Chamber of Commerce Language School in Shanghai. He received the degree of D. D. from the University of Washington, U. S. A., and subsequently from the University of Wales. He was also during his residence in Shanghai a director of the "North-China Daily News."

Dr. Rees who was an unusually accomplished Sinologue, was at one time an intimate friend of President Yuan Shih-k'ai. He was for a time a tutor to the president's son. On his return in 1919 he was taken seriously ill and was not allowed by reason of his health to return to China. He therefore accepted the Professorship of Chinese in the School of Oriental Languages at the University of London, but hoped to return to Shanghai when his health became better. This year he was elected Chairman of the London Missionary Society and also Chairman of the Welsh Congregational Union, but his health suffered greatly in consequence of the strain and extra duties thus imposed upon him. He was first taken seriously ill early in May following the spring meeting of the Congregational Union in which he had taken a prominant part and had undertaken a great deal of public speaking. Previously he had shown signs of overwork while at the School of Oriental Languages, but these latter duties proved altogether too strenuous. On July 1 a cable was received in Shanghai to say that he was sinking, but he rallied considerably, so that on August 1 a further cable spoke of him as being "wonderfully better." This was followed almost at once by a cable announcing his death.

Dr. Rees leaves behind him a widow, one son, and six daughters. His devoted missionary service and association with pioneers of the mission field such as Gilmour in the opening of the interior will long be remembered, both at home and abroad.

MAJOR Brooke, formerly British Military Attaché in Peking, has been appointed Assistant General Manager of the Pekin Syndicate. Major Brooke is now in England. He retired from military service on reaching Home recently.

THE ANTI-NARCOTIC MOVEMENT

Chinese Attack on Renewed Use of Drugs and Enforced Planting of Opium

At the meeting of the Chinese People's Anti-Narcotic Association, held on Tuesday afternoon in the Chinese General Chamber of Commerce on North Honan Road, representatives were present from the Kiangsu Educational Ass'n, the National Ass'n for advancing Education in China, the Chinese General Chamber of Commerce, the National Committee of the Y.M.C.A., the National Christian Council, and the China Medical Ass'n. Dr. P. W. Kuo, President of the Southeastern University, acted as Chairman of the meeting and was elected Chairman of the temporary committee of seven, formed to make arrangements for a mass meeting to be held in the same place on August 21, to which all interested organizations will be invited, including military and diplomatic representatives, merchants, and citizens.

The membership of this Association will include organizations and individuals interested in the anti-narcotic campaign. In view of the fact that trade in narcotics is becoming more flagrant every day and because it is well known that military officials are forcing the planting of poppies it is proposed to educate public opinion against this abuse and to use this aroused sentiment to secure pledges from civil and military authorities to put down this unlawful traffic. Similar associations will probably be formed in all the provinces and it is hoped that it will be possible to awaken the people at large to the dangers of the increasing use of drugs so that they will bring sufficient pressure to bear upon the officials to obtain the enforcement of the existing laws.

The National Students' Union, now meeting in Shanghai, has also taken action against narcotics and it is hoped to secure their cooperation in this work. The question of sending a delegate to the Geneva Conference on Narcotics was discussed at this meeting but action was deferred until after the mass meeting on August 24. An encouraging fact is that 11 local organizations, hearing of the formation of this association, have already on their own initiative asked to join.

A GREEK MERCHANT'S DEATH

Suicide at the Mortuary Door

Shortly after 5 o'clock on Tuesday morning the police at Hongkew received information that the dead body of a man had been found lying on the pavement at the corner of Range and Fearon Roads. Officers who were sent to investigate found the body of a foreigner, apparently about 60 years of age, with a bullet wound in the head, and it was apparent that death had taken place some two hours previously. Near the body was a Mauser pistol loaded in four chambers. The strange feature of the case was the tragedy had occurred almost directly at the door of the public mortuary, and an unusual motive for suicide was disclosed in a note afterwards found in one of the deceased's pockets. Written in French were the words:

"To those who offer obstacles to my departure to my country I offer my corpse."

The note was signed Phillipides, and detectives spent the rest of the day in investigating the history of the deceased. This proved to be a matter of some difficulty, owing to uncertainty as to his nationality. He was believed to be a Greek, born in Cyprus, in which case the British authorities would have jurisdiction in the case, Cyprus being a British possession, but there was other information that the deceased was a French protégé.

Later inquiries show that the deceased, Christos Phillipides, was a Greek subject, 66 years of age, who had for some time past resided in East Yalu Road. It is understood that at one time he had a flourishing business at Chungking, but latterly had lost money.

COMPANY MEETING

SMALL INVESTORS, LD.

Resolution to Liquidate Lost by Big Majority

An extraordinary general meeting of the Small Investors, Ld., was held in the General Chamber of Commerce Room, No. 17 the Bund, last Friday afternoon for the purpose of considering a formal resolution to wind up voluntarily the company's affairs. The resolution was put to the meeting, however, and lost by a large majority, there being but one vote in favour over and above those of proposer and seconder. An additional resolution reducing the Board of Directors to not less than three and not more than five, with the object of making the Board more workable, was put to the meeting and passed by an overwhelming majority.

Mr. G. H. Wright, Chairman, presided and was supported by Messrs. B. W. Gale, Chun Bing-him (directors) and J. C. Burgess (secretary). The votes represented amounted to 59,560.

The Chairman, before asking the secretary to read the notice convening the meeting, took the opportunity to apologise to those shareholders who had gone round to the Chamber's old room at Yuen Ming Yuen Road in mistake.

The Secretary then read the notice.

The Chairman said:

Gentlemen.—No-one regrets more than I do that it should be necessary to call a meeting this afternoon to decide whether or not this company should continue to carry on business, or whether on the other hand it should go into voluntary liquidation. The reason why this step has been considered advisable is set forth in the printed circular of which you have all had a copy. Whilst of course, your Board could have carried on the company's business, they have felt, having regard to the circumstances referred to in the circular, it was their duty to take the opinion of the shareholders as to whether or not, having regard to all the information they can obtain this afternoon, they would wish to continue or go into liquidation. I cannot tell you very much more which will be of use to you in coming to a determination in addition to what has been disclosed in this circular. You will remember that the company was incorporated in the latter part of November, and that it was incorporated to take over the business known as the Small Investors, which was carried on by Mr. Douglas Fleming. According to the balance sheet and figures furnished by your company's auditors at the time of the incorporation, apparently Mr. Douglas Fleming made a great success of the Small Investors. I believe the figures show that he made a profit during the year of over a lakh of taels. I have no doubt at all that the original shareholders believed with more capital this company would at least make as much if not more. As you know a very marked stagnation in the stock and share market set in in the spring of this year. I believe this is very largely attributable to the heavy depreciation of raw rubber. This company, as well as the Small Investors, its predeccessor, has always taken a very large interest in rubber, and I believe I am right when I say this marked depreciation in the price of raw rubber had an effect not only on Langkat stock but on the stock market in general. Now you will probably agree with me that rubber shares, and Langkat shares at any rate, for the first six months of this year formed a major part of the stock and share operations of this market. But owing to this very pronounced stagnation, almost a collapse in the share market, particularly of rubber stocks, Langkat stocks depreciated about 50 per cent. by the time of the June Settlement. This had a very serious effect not only on this company, but I think I am right in saying on all local operators in stocks and shares. I do not pretend, myself, to be versed in share business in Shanghai or anywhere else, and I doubt whether any opinion I can give as to the future prospects of the company are of much value. Apart from this, my connexion with the company as far as its active business is concerned has been very brief. I joined the Board in the latter part of February, to take the place of Mr. Master when he went Home on leave. You will remember Mr. Fleming had a serious accident in the first week in April. He was the company's managing director This meant that the directors had to take matters very much into their own hands, and they decided to conserve their resources to meet the June Settlement and also to carry on business on very conservative lines. Apart from this there was very little business done here in the months of April, May and June. Mr. Fleming you will very probably recall was appointed managing-director of the company from its inception. In fact I understand it was one of the terms of the incorporation that he be appointed managing-director for a term of five years. Accordingly the Board under the incorporation of the company entered into a formal agreement with Mr. Fleming for his appointment as managing-director and gave him full discretion as to his operations in stocks and shares. This they were fully entitled to do as it is expressly provided for in the ordinance, and the Board gave him such power as they thought fit. Therefore, gentlemen, the Board really in fact delegated their powers to Mr. Fleming as managing-director. Now I do not think it can be said that either he or this Board could have foreseen what I may term the June débacle; in fact things were going very promisingly indeed in the beginning of the year, until suddenly, for no apparent reason except the slump in the price of rubber this stagnation set in. Had it not been for this the company's position at the June Settlement would have been very satisfactory. We should have received nearly three lakhs of taels in, in excess of our payments, so that if our customers, or clients, had carried out their obligations and met their contracts for the June Settlement we should be in a very satisfactory position to-day. As disclosed in the circular, you know this was not the case and a great many of our clients, unfortunately, did not meet their obligations resulting, as was stated in the circular, in the company having to meet a loss of Tls. 200,000. Now it has seemed to your Board the best way of obtaining your wishes as to the future is by putting before you just a formal resolution to wind up the company voluntarily. So if that resolution is not accepted it will mean you wish the board to carry on the company.

With regard to the future possibly a few figures I can give you may be of assistance to you in trying to arrive at some conclusion, These figures are based largely on information, or rather, on the opinion, of those connected or concerned with the management of the company.

Take the running or overhead expenses. There is no doubt they have been too heavy, and so far as we can ascertain from the auditors they have been in the neighbourhood of Tls. 4,500 per month. It is estimated that if you decide the company shall continue, the running expenses can be brought down to round about Tls. 2,000 per month. That, of course, is a very drastic reduction.

As regards the possible profit which the company may or may not earn, it is estimated on a conservative basis that the company should, throughout a year, make a daily average profit of round about Tls. 100. That would yield a return to the company on its present paid-up capital of about 4 per cent.

Well gentlemen, that is all I have to say, and if there is any information I can give, or any questions I can answer I shall be pleased to do so after putting the resolution. I therefore beg to propose:—

"That the company be wound up voluntarily."

Mr. Gale seconded.

The Chairman allowed a few minutes to pass in silence. No questions were asked and no-one had anything to say. The resolution was then put to the meeting.

One vote in favour only was recorded, and the resolution was lost by an overwhelming majority.

The Chairman then intimated that notice had been given of an additional resolution for reducing the board of directors. Mr. Harrop was the author of the resolution and he understood that its objects were two, the first being the saving of expense, and the second and more important reason, the reducing of the Board to a more workable size. It was believed that with a business like their's a small body of directors was much better than a large body.

Mr. E. G. Tate, in the absence through sickness of Mr. Harrop, then proposed.

"That the Board of Directors be composed of not less than three and not more than four."

Mr. W. A. Ogden seconded and the resolution was carried by a large majority.

This concluded the business of the meeting.

The Chinese Stock Exchange held its fifth semi-annual Meeting on Sunday at which the shareholders, representing 23,479 shares, expressed satisfaction at the handsome profit made. A dividend of $3.80 per share has been declared.

The fifth semi-annual meeting of the Shanghai Gold Exchange, Ld., was held on Sunday afternoon. Mr. Shih Shan-yi, Chief Director, presided, and shareholders representing 55,817 shares attended. The working accounts covering the first six months of this year, ending June 30, show a gross profit of $355,564.38, and after deducting expenses and a part of the capital outlay, the net profit amounted to $180,861.35. A dividend of $2 per share was declared. A steady improvement in business was noticeable. Compared with the business done during the four preceding semi-annual periods, the result of this half-yearly working showed increases of 74. 36. 52 and 24 per cent., respectively.

A letter sent to Comm. G. de' Rossi, Italian Consul-General, by Mr. Fessenden, Chairman of the Council, and published in the Municipal Gazette on July 3, appears to have roused the Shanghai members of the Kuomingtang party to a great state of indignation, culminating in a special meeting on July 31. The letter referred to the lawless doings of the wilder elements in China, and the attempts to stir up trouble against the Peking Government. No mention of the Kuomingtang was made whatsoever, but they appear to have found the cap a good fit, and took the letter as a slight on themselves. Feeling ran high at the meeting and a resolution was put proposing that the order of the party prohibiting anti-foreign movements be deleted. After a considerable amount of verbiage, however, it was decided that the step was too grave to take and the motion was defeated.

Disbandment of Italian Company.—On the recommendation of the Commandant and in terms of the following correspondence, it has been decided to disband the Italian Co., S. V. C.:—

Shanghai, July 16, 1924.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that, principally owing to the departure from Shanghai of many members of the Italian community in the past few months, it has become very difficult to secure a sufficient number of able men to insure the regular functioning of the Italian Volunteer Company, and that, therefore, I have come, with regret, to the decision to temporarily dissolve the above said Company.

But although the number of men available, who are very willing to serve, is not sufficient at the present time, I do hope that, with the changing of circumstances, I will be soon able to reorganize the unit on such a base as to insure its efficiency, and this being the case, I will rely, as usual, upon your valuable co-operation.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
G. de'Rossi,
Consul-General for Italy.

The Chairman,
Municipal Council.

Council Chamber,
Shanghai, July 24, 1924.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter of July 16, in which you inform the Council that you have come, with regret, to the decision to temporarily dissolve the Italian Company of the S.V.C. because of the difficulty in maintaining the strength of the Company owing to the departure from Shanghai of so many members of the Italian Community.

In reply I have the honour to state that the Council, whilst sharing to the full the regret expressed by you at the proposed disbandment, feels that there is no other alternative under the existing circumstances than reluctantly to acquiesce in your decision.

Subject, therefore, to your concurrence it is proposed to notify the disbandment of the Italian Company officially in the next issue of the Municipal Gazette, and I am desired to take this opportunity to convey to you the Council's grateful appreciation of the valuable assistance so generously and continuously rendered by you in relation to the Italian Company from its inception to its regretted disbandment.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
E. S. B. Rowe,
Acting Secretary.

SOUTHERN RHODESIA

SOUTHERN Rhodesia which was inaugurated as the youngest self governing Colony of the British Empire on October 1, 1923, and which had previously for 33 years been ably administered by the British South Africa Company possesses one of the finest climates in the world with long hours of sunshine, breezy temperate days and cool nights. For those who wish to take up farming or ranching in order to make the most they can of their capital, energy and technical knowledge, or for those who wish to retire from strenuous business or professional life and make a home, Rhodesia offers many advantages unequalled elsewhere. The business, social, sporting, educational and medical facilities bear favourable comparison with those of other countries. Native labour is plentiful and when properly managed is cheap and efficient. Taxation is light. Good land in healthy surroundings and amidst fine scenery is plentiful and not expensive.

Full information is obtainable on application to The Secretary, Southern Rhodesia Settlers' Board (attached to the Government of Southern Rhodesia), P. O. Box 372, Salisbury. S., Rhodesia.

The giving of advice to prospective settlers will be facilitated if applicants will advise the Board in detail of their circumstances and the amount of capital they would be prepared to invest in a suitable venture.

The price came yesterday at 34⅜d. ready and 34 1/16d. forward, against 34⅜d. ready and 34⅛d. forward a week ago, showing declines of ⅛d. and ⅛d. on the respective prices. China sold, as also did speculators, whilst India and the Continent have been reported as buyers.

Bars in stock 2,622, including Silver Yen 10 lakhs. Stocks of sycee and dollars amount to Tls. 392 lakhs and $433 lakhs, against Tls. 391 lakhs and $428½ lakhs last week, and Tls. 236¼ lakhs and $295 lakhs on August 7, 1923.

Exchange.

Exchange left off last week with the official quotation for T.T. at 3/3⅛d., where it remained until Tuesday, when it opened at T.T. 3/3⅛d. At this levelit stayed until Thursday, when in the course of the forenoon a weakness developed and it dropped a farthing to T.T. 3/3d., our present official quotation.

Yesterday morning the market opened quiet and steady, with sellers of T.T. at 3/3 1/16d. Aug., 3/3⅛d. Sept., 3/3 1/16d. October. Gold $ T.T. 72⅞ Aug., 73 Sept., 73⅛ October. We closed for the tiffin interval firm, with sterling sellers T.T. 3/3⅛d. August, 3/3 1/16d. Sept., 3/3⅛d. Oct. and 3/3 1/16d. December. The gold dollar market has also firmed up and there are sellers at T.T. 73⅜ Aug., 73½ Sept. and 73⅝ October.

THE SILVER MARKET

Reporting from London on July 2, Messrs. Samuel Montagu & Co. state:—

The market continues quiet and therefore easily swayed by the amount of buying or selling on balance. Any tendency, however, to advance very far is checked by a disposition on the part of speculators to sell with some freedom. On the other hand, China has not been such a source of weakness during the last day or so as it had been during the previous fortnight, neither is America at the moment a free seller. The Indian bazaars have done very little in this market, and do not appear at all active. On the 27th ultimo, for the first time since June 16, 1922, the cash price was fixed at a discount compared with the two months' quotation.

The United States refinery production of silver during the calendar year 1923 is finally estimated by the U.S. Mint Bureau as 73,335,170 ounces, which is 17,095,122 ounces above the 1922 returns and 1,625,905 ounces below the record production of 1915.

Reporting from London on July 3, Messrs. Mocatta & Goldsmid state:—

The fluctuations in the price of silver have been very small during the past week, the quotation having only varied between 34⅛d. and 34 1/16d., the latter being to-day's price. The chief buying has been for the Continent, though at this level Indian bears have shown some disposition to cover their sales. On the other hand, China has been more of a seller than a buyer and America has sold moderately in this market. The tendency at present is rather uncertain, but the present level appears to attract sufficient buyers to absorb the amounts offering and we think it is likely to be about maintained. For the first time since June, 1922, the forward quotation has, during the last few days, been at premium over spot and these conditions seem likely to continue so long as so much of the buying is for forward delivery.

THE GOLD MARKET

Reporting from London on July 2, Messrs. Samuel Montagu & Co. state:—

The Bank of England gold reserve against its note issue on the 25th ultimo amounted to £126,437,570, as compared with £126,406,390 on the previous Wednesday.

There has been practically no demand on Indian account for the substantial supplies of gold available this week.

The Southern Rhoesian gold output for May was 53,816 ounces, as compared with 54,865 oz. for April, and 54,737 oz. for May, 1923.

The final estimate of the United States Mint Bureau gives the refinery production of gold in the United States for the calendar year 1923 as $51,734,000. This figure represents an increase of $2,884,900 over that returned for 1922, but is $49,301,700 below the record production of 1915, namely $101,035,700.

In the review of economic statistics issued by the Harvard Economic Service, of Cambridge, Mass., U.S.A., Mr. Joseph Kitchin estimates that the yield of the Transvaal in 1924 will be £40,000,000 to £41,000,000, and that it will fall to £29,000,000 by 1930, mainly in the later years. He estimates that the output of the rest of the world will be £36,000,000 or £37,000,000 for 1924, rising to £45,000,000 in 1920, so that his forecast is that the world total will be about £77,000,000 in 1924 and each of the succeeding three years, and that it will then decline to, say, £74,000,000 in 1930. The actual figures are expected to vary from these estimates by anything up to 5 per cent., and the total production for the five years 1921-1925 is estimated at £360,000,000.

CHEFOO TRADE QUIET

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Chefoo, July 31.

From a business point of view, Chefoo is more or less unchanged. The pongee season has not yet arrived and business in that line is, of course, naturally quiet. Orders have, nevertheless, been received and a little business placed, chiefly with London and Australia. There has been for some time past a great demand from the latter market for low grade 30 yards goods. About two years ago this class of pongee was made in very large quantities. It was found that there was no market for the goods and as a result large stocks accumulated. These were held until this year, when the price was reduced by about 50 per cent. in an endeavour to clear the stocks of somewhere about 20,000 to 30,000 pieces. Stocks are now entirely cleared, Australia having bought the majority, whilst America has been slightly interested. No further business can be done at recent prices.

The situation in the hairnet market is unchanged and there is absolutely no business being done. The demand from the United States has fallen off entirely, except for a few inquiries for extra small sized nets for bobbed hair. No immediate revival is anticipated.

SHANGHAI MARKET REPORT

A General Dullness: Holidays and Floods Associated with the Slack Season

Aug. 9.

The week has been very dull all round. The present is recognized every year as the off-season and as it happens to coincide with various semi-religious festivals of the Chinese, many of the dealers avail themselves of the opportunity to get away when there is little chance of missing business, so that things have been very quiet indeed.

Piece Goods

So far as the indent firms are concerned, trade has been absolutely lifeless throughout the week. Not only are the dealers away, but Manchester remains very firm and exchange is unfavourable.

Cotton, Yarn, etc.

China Cotton.—Although there is plenty of excitement and speculation regarding American cotton, there is little doing in the local variety. The mills are not buying anything and for several days there have been no spot quotations, the last being on July 25—Shanghai, Tls. 45 to Tls. 46; Hankow, Tls. 44.50 to Tls. 45. Thursday afternoon's closing quotations on the Chinese Cotton Goods Exchange were:—August, 49.70; September, 44.35; October, 42.60; November, 41.85; December, 41.35; January, 41.15.

Yarn.—The spark of life which recently appeared in the market has not yet faded and a moderate amount of business continues to be done. The latest quotations are:—

Produce

All markets continue lifeless. A few inquiries are coming forward for new season's cargo, but at prices very much out of line with the ideas of local dealers, who are unwilling to consider any business except at exorbitant rates. This attitude is the result of the difficulty in estimating the damage done to crops in the flooded areas. It is expected that the crop situation will be obscure for some weeks to come.

THE DEPRESSION IN SILVER

Salt Lake City, Aug. 7.

Three-quarters of the world's silver producers are represented at a conference convened here for the purpose of organizing in order to end the depression in silver, and to expand the market.

The committee to-day adopted tentative plans for the perfection of an organization to act in conjunction with the Government.—Reuter.

Local Stock Exchange business has continued quiet throughout the week, with prices steady excepting in "Rubbers," which are decidedly firmer with upward tendency as a result of the marked improvement in the price of the raw material, and shares are almost impossible to obtain in any appreciable quantities at Buyers' quotations. The market prices per lb. of raw rubber, received by cables to-day are London 1/11d. buyers; 1/11¾d. sellers, Singapore 46¼ spot buyers, firm with upward tendency.

London quotations indicate a steady to firmer market, and the following are the latest quotations cabled to us by our London Agents:—

CORRESPONDENCE

PRIMACY OF PETER

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Your correspondent "Barnabas" is mistaken if he thinks the writer of this is anything but a poor layman (even if he wears coloured spectacles only at this time of the year).

The answers and quotations given in his letters are only such as any Catholic schoolboy (or girl) could give "Barnabas."

As regards celibacy. It is evident that celibacy is only meant for the selected few, not for everybody, as it is not all who can reach this ideal (or any other ideal) state. Christ said "He that can take let him take it," which is not a command to all to take it. St. Paul wrote, "I would that all men were even as myself." But he knows well, as the context shows that all men are not as he and he called marriage "a great sacrament" Eph. V 32. But to those who desire to give themselves undivided to God's service (i.e. as His priests) he explains, "He that is without a wife is solicitous for the things that belong to the Lord: how he may please God." If "Barnabas" cannot understand that this is a clear indication that for a priest a life of celibacy is a more ideal one than one in matrimony, then it cannot be helped. That celibacy is also for lay people a more ideal state than matrimony is not denied but is outside the scope of Mr. Rowland's remarks under discussion: "Rome believes in a celibate ministry."

Regarding the Primacy of Peter "John" says that, "Quite evidently Peter received no power that was not equally bestowed on the others" But.....

(1) Peter alone was named the Rock upon which Christ would build His Church;

(2) Peter alone was given the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven;

(3) Peter alone was told to "feed" Christ's lambs (the laity) and Christ's sheep (the clergy) in fact he was given the pastorate of His entire flock.

(4) Peter alone was told to confirm his brethren in their faith. "John's" refutation of point (1) "For other foundation can no man lay than is laid which is Jesus Christ," 1 Cor. III 11, apparently means that the Church which Christ would build on the Rock (Peter) was without Himself as its foundation. Does "John" mean that Christ deceived Peter? Or what does he mean? "John" has not refuted one single word of the writer's letters July 22 and 28 and how could he, otherwise than by proving that Christ's words were untrue; which he cannot prove.

"John" shows a tendency towards quibbling and theological hair-splitting which the writer does not feel inclined to counter.

Much heartburning would be avoided if people could only think in straight, clear, logical lines.

I am, etc.,
PAUL.

MAN—THE ARBITER OF HIS FATE

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—During the morning I have been telephoned to by no less than four people (who know that I write under the pen-name of "Scrutator" in the "N.-C. Daily News") for information regarding the gentleman in Victoria, B.C., referred to in my article on "Man—the Arbiter of His Fate" in this morning's issue.

He is Mr. Charles Ferris (P. O. Box 326, Victoria, B.C.), who is a teacher of the Art of Indefinite Living. He is an Englishman, and a very powerful personality. His plan is to take students through a course of lessons—the teaching being partly physical, mental, philosophical, metaphysical and spiritual. His teaching transcends human conceptions generally. Until he is reasonably sure, however, that a person is bent on securing this knowledge by work and practice, and is mentally and physically equipped to realize such transcendental teaching he will not receive him as a pupil.

The following cutting from the "Scientific American" will show how a certain school of thought is accomplishing the "impossible" in the direction indicated.

I am, etc.,
"SCRUTATOR."

CAN LIFE BE PROLONGED?

Men of unquestioned scientific standing agree that the essential tissues of the body are potentially immortal, and that, barring accidents, we ought never to die! This is the newest evidence that Science has to offer; and it is evidence, not theory. Experiments which point to this conclusion have been successfully carried out for a number of years, and we now have the final proof:

A skilful surgeon has been able to keep alive by artificial means a bit of tissue for a longer time than the natural span of life of the animal itself. The remarkable thing is that the tissue is no longer subject to the influence of time, and there is no doubt that if properly cared for it will live indefinitely—for ever, if you would have it so. The surgeon is Dr. Alexis Carrol, of the Rockefeller Institute, New York, and his experiment is with a bit of connective tissue of the heart of an embryo chick, which he has kept alive for eight years. This experiment alone may not be conclusive, but in connexion with the work of other scientists its meaning becames clear. Not only is it possible to cultivate artificially the growing life cells of an embryo chick, but this has also been done with cells from various parts of the human body, nerve cells, muscle cells, epithelia cells from various locations in the body, kidney cells, and connective tissue cells. "We may fairly say, I believe," says Prof. Raymond Pearl, of John Hopkins, Baltimore, "that the potential immortality of all the essential cellular elements of the body either has been carried far enough to make the probability very great that properly conducted experiments would demonstrate the continuance of life to any indefinite extent."

Couched in the cautious language of the scientist, the statement is none the less significant.

The remarkable development recently brought about has been the observation that the culture is no longer subject to the influence of time. There is no apparent "ageing" of the individual cells, and under uniform conditions the tissues continue a uniform rate of growth. Matter of fact as it sounds, it is a venture out into the sea of darkness as dramatic as, but perhaps more far-reaching than, the voyage of Columbus. Our bodies are potentially immortal, All these years, while we have observed old age creep upon a man and finally lay him low, and have said, "It is inevitable—it is the fate of all," we have been wrong. The change in cell structure which accompanies old age is not the cause of old age, but the result. What, then, is the span of human life? Four score years and ten? Actually the average is less than that. So far the probability that a man would die of disease has been so great that there was little chance of his living the maximum of years. Considerable progress has been made in the fight on disease, but we have been so busy with that fight that little has been done in a scientific way to push back the hundred year mark which seems to have been the limit.

Perhaps the day is not far when most of us may reasonably expect a hundred years of life. And if a hundred, why not a thousand?

P.S.—Which all goes to prove that man is Mind, and that the imagination is the wonder-worker of the world—for everything exists as ideation before it becomes fact. Even the cold type the reader is reading did not become realized (made real) until the idea sprang into the imagination of the first typecaster. It was at one time the "impossible."

SCRUTATOR.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Like, I am sure, very many others I have been deeply interested in the article that appeared in your columns on Thursday last on "The Omnipotent Gland," and in that which followed in your issue of to-day "Man—the Arbiter of His Destiny." One of the difficulties that confronts men like myself—who have no scientific training and little knowledge of "ologies" in general and biology in particular, is in regard to concentrating thought so as correctly to apprehend precisely whither the scientists are directing us. Colonel Barnado's lecture I found difficult understandingly to follow, but "Scrutator's" article was, to me, much more informing and will, I believe, make a stronger appeal to the popular mind.

There appear to be two schools of thought claiming the allegiance of those who think that man, corporeally, can live for ever. One takes the material view that we can mechanically replace obsolete or diseased parts of the body just as we can repair a watch. The other holds that the mind can exercise a direct and absolute power over the body and can order it itself to replace obsolete or diseased parts. No doubt I have expressed myself very inadequately, but if, as I hope, others better informed and with greater facility of expression use your hospitable columns to enlighten those of us who are blindly yearning for intangible better things," a good—nay I venture to say a great and noble—object will have been attained. What we are all, consciously or sub-consciously, striving after is real knowledge, and if a discussion were started, with the two articles that have appeared in your columns as a basis, nothing but good can result.

Some time ago I met a friend who had been subject for some time to the influence of a man who taught that the indefinite prolongation of life could be effected by a mental process, and that the aid of the surgeon was unnecessary. Unfortunately I omitted to inquire who this man was, and it occurred to me, when reading "Scrutator's" article, that the person he indicated as an exponent of the Art of Living might be able to assist me and others towards a study of the new philosophy. Could you supply the name and address of the person indicated? If so, the writer would be profoundly grateful, and so, no doubt, would be others who are, like him, groping in the outer darkness towards a dimly revealed light.

I am, etc.,
EARNEST.

Shanghai, Aug. 1, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

DEAR SIR,—In your valuable paper you always inform your readers of the latest scientific investigations and you did thus in the article on the "Omnipotent Gland" which was followed by an article signed by "Scrutator." The importance of inner gland secretion and its possibility of being influenced by mental activities is certainly enormous and as I mentioned in my lecture "Psychology and Disease" delivered before the Quest Society on January 28, 1924 (a very full report of which appeared in your paper of January 30) the cure and even prevention of disease is based on our mental activities, i.e., on our psychic force. Obviously the teaching of the Art of Indefinite Living by a man in Victoria B.C. is also based on psychic force, viz., is a kind of auto-suggestion which, as is known to every physician who has worked with contemporary scientific psychotherapeutic methods, is of the most valuable importance in the cure of all kind of diseases; occasionally it might even succeed in changing the character of a man, e.g., a drunked could be changed into a teetotaler who could not bear even the smell of alcohol; a nervous and anxious man into a firm and steady being, etc.

But it must be kept in mind that the psychotherapeutic treatment may be of great use, but can also be sometimes of the greatest irreparable harm if conducted by a man who has not the full knowledge of mental and nervous diseases and such a man can be only a trained doctor. I think it my duty to warn the public not to put too much trust in the Art of Indefinite Living.

That someone might master his mind with the idea of emptying pockets is the least danger; they must realize that instead of longevity they might perhaps acquire an incurable disease.

I am etc.,
A. BARY M.D.

Shanghai, Aug. 4, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—"Scrutator" should know that directing people's attention to the force of which he is speaking, will only result in arousing the curiosity of the crowd.

This material knowledge, though not of a high order, has nevertheless the potency of fire; and children must not be allowed to play with that element. Far better they should continue to play with the shells in the sands of times. Thus, they will not harm themselves nor destroy others.

—The merely curious, can be passed by, as they are neither here nor there, but the attempt to steal the fruit of such knowledge by the selfish determined, without the will of carrying them through will only land them in an asylum.

Woe betide humanity if pearls of such knowledge be thrown to the multitude. The fully determined selfish egoist, utilizing this force for the selfish self, will only be enabled with redoubled energy to destroy and devour.

Such knowledge is only for the being that has realized that it is only a cell in the definite organism of the All-pervading, and is laboriously learning to develop and culture its consciousness in harmony with all other cells, for the ever onward path of its own growth and evolution in conjunction with the growth and evolution of all that has form in this infinite variety of life's manifestation.

Poor deluded mass of cells,—the human body, sprang from what? thinking itself the I am, and arrogantly attempting to usurp powers which will ultimately rend it. It is "crying for wool but will only get bristles." The heart of a chick embryo, will remain the heart of a chick even if keep till the end of the world. So with the individual whose sole aim is the prolongation of physical existence for the gratification of the lower self. By virtue of the very powers invoked and provoked, such an individual will not rise in the scale of evolution higher than the lowly forms of existence whose consciousness is only to feed and propogate.

The Ego yearning for the welfare of all; the heart that bleeds for the suffering of all, does not long for the prolongation of the life of its physical body, neither does it care for the promised pleasures. Such a one through suffering and the abnegation of the self, through absolute restriction and guiding of the senses, it beholds and receives the power gained by knowledge of directing the mind in a constant stream of sustained thought on the umblical cord that connects all existence with the one existence.

I am, etc.,
SANAT.

THE GARTER MOTTO

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—To settle an argument I should be obliged if you could tell me which of the English Kings made use of the Old French expression: "Honi soit qui mal y pense" and which authority I could consult for the information.

Thanking you,
I am, etc.,
N.V.B.

Shanghai, July 31, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—With reference to N. V. B.'s inquiry, it was King Edward III, father of the famous Black Prince, who made use of the old saying: "Honi soit qui mal y pense."

The occasion was a ball at which the King picked up a garter and restored it to the lady who owned it. One of the courtiers standing by apparently uttered a remark that it was not kingly (or modest) to do so. The King, over hearing, retorted with the above saying.

The authority from which I make the preceding statement is not, while writing, very clear to me. I believe the Oxford and Cambridge History of England or one of the school lesson books is the source of my information.

Anyway, Edward III was a gallant knight and gentleman; the ladies of his time were coy, modest and obedient to their parents' wishes. (I suppose they slept early as well). I know comparisons are odious but I wonder if your readers also read "The Decadent Age" by "Plain Smith" in your issue of to-day?

Enclosing my card and apologizing for mixing up two subjects in this letter,

SIR,—Replying to N.V.B.'s inquiry in to-day's issue of your paper as to which King of England made use of the old saying "Honi soit qui maly pense, I give the following account of the Institution of the Order of the Garter which shows the King to have been Edward III, and in the year 1348.

"Joan, the beautiful Countess of Salisbury, while dancing with the King at a Court ball accidentally let fall a blue garter from her left leg. The King gallantly came to the rescue, and diverting the attention of the guests from the lady he bound the blue ribbon round his own knee saying as he did so: 'Honi soit qui maly pense' and adding, 'I will bring it about that the proudest noble in the realm shall think it an honour to wear this band.'"

This incident determined him to abandon his plan of forming an order of the "Round Table" and he formed instead the Order of the Garter which was dedicated to the protection of Saint George.

This account I think can be regarded as authentic as it is from the "Annals of Windsor" by Tighe and Davies.

RUSSIA UNDER THE REDS

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—Several letters been written during the last days on the Russian question, most of them by people who either are communists themselves or who do not want to believe it is as bad as it is in U.S.S.R.

There is, for instance, "Shanghailander" who evidently finds a typist's salary of eight roubles plus supplies, of which she can make no use having no household, a normal state of things. That some typists in the Foreign Trade Bureau receive 20 roubles, I pointed out as an exception. In such place as "Vneshtorg," that is Foreign Trade Bureau, much money is in circulation and it is therefore no wonder a typist can get this, for Vladivostok conditions, princely salary. But in all other government institutions the salary is 8-30 roubles. Would you let your daughter or sister work for such pay, "Shanghailander?" I believe not. But you think of course: they are only Russian girls, belonging to an inferior race. Your letter is witty, people can afford to be witty speaking of things they have not experienced themselves.

The letter of "Two Neutral Friends of Russia" is not witty, but it is true every word of it and gives a real picture of life in U.S.S.R.

As to the letter with the title "Saviours of Russia" written by Mr. Perlin, who thinks he has the right of insulting soldiers many of whom have been under arms since 1914, it struck me mostly by its advice to the refugees to go "home" and work helping to build the future of Russia.

I will here try to give a few examples illustrating the conditions for this "building of new life." I am going to speak only of the Maritime Province as it is the part of Russia I have seen since 1920.

Vladivostok and the surrounding towns and villages have been under the reign of the Reds only since 1922.

Its large shipbuilding factory employed a large number of people. When I left in February all the departments but one were closed, even the power station which gave light to a great part of the town. All private power stations were closed too and the municipality had the monopoly of giving light to the whole town. The result of all this, besides a lot of people getting out of work, was that the whole town did not see the lighting of street lamps any more. Every house-owner was obliged to fix a lamp before his house, but as electric light was to be found only in some houses, this little lamp (kerosene) was of not much use.

There is in Vladivostok a rice mill. It is large and excellently equipped. For some years it had not been working because of the difficulty in procuring rice. Since 1920 the Bank of Chosen has supported the Koreans of the Maritime Province in the cultivation of rice in 1923 the crops amounted to five million poods. The owners of the beforesaid mill started negotiations with the authorities concerning the resuming of work. They offered the most favourable conditions to the government, but did not succeed and the mill is not working.

One of the chief incomes of the Maritime Province is its fisheries. In 1923 there was a specially rich catch of herring. But it was of little use, for salt was dear. The strange thing was that private foreign firms had offered salt at 48 copecks wholesale price per pood, while the State's wholesale price was 1.20 for Russian salt from the Crimea. Many fishers suffered heavy losses, were not able to pay their taxes and their nets were confiscated. The Japanese came with refrigerators on their ships, bought fish for a song and departed, very pleased with the business.

Before the Reds arrived in 1922 the port of Vladivostok was of great importance owing to its connexion with Harbin. But soon the many restrictions and heavy taxes made the vessels avoid this harbour and they went to Dairen instead. Who gained again? The Japanese.

But do not think, there is nothing positive in U.S.S.R.! Near Vladivostok is a match factory belonging to the State. But the matches are of such quality that you must be glad if every tenth one of them gives light.

And then—last, but not least! There is a Vodka factory. It sounds incredible, but it is true. The Bolsheviks who have preached so much against brandy have started a state factory for this product. And it is said to prosper.

Now let us return to the refugees. I am sure every one of them would prefer to go home and do his old business instead of living on charity and be looked upon as outcasts here in China. The refuge question is a very hard one to solve for Russia is not the fit place for them at present and neither is Shanghai or China in general. They cannot find suitable work here where there is such a competition, but could not there in the whole world be found place enough for them where could find work? Czecho-Slovakia alone provides for 3,000 Russian students and gives them the possibility of completing their studies. I am sure the time will come when Russia, not U.S.S.R., will show hospitality to a greater number of foreigners who will go there attracted by her enormous riches.

Thanking you for the space in your paper,

I am, etc.,
A LOVER OF RUSSIA.

THE BOLSHEVIK TERROR

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

Sir,—I notice that according to "Rosta" Mr. Karakhan in his note of July 22, 1924, to Dr. Wellington Koo regarding the transfer of the Russian ships at Shanghai ends up as follows:

"I may assure Your Excellency that should the Chinese Government disarm and intern this band, (600 armed men and officers refugee Cossacks), the Soviet Government would not object to the men and officers of whom this band consists being deported into Soviet territory."

The "Times" in its issue of June 24 reports the desecration of the abode of the Dominican nuns and the banishment for ten years with imprisonment in Northern Siberia of these nuns, merely because they had committed the crime of imparting religious instruction to Roman Catholic children.

Considering the conditions reported to exist in Russia, one shudders to think of the possible fate of the White Russians whom it is desired to deport. It might interest your readers if the enclosed article were re-published.

I am, etc.,
A CHRISTIAN.

Shanghai July 31, 1924.

SOVIET PERSECUTION OF NUNS.

From Our Correspondent.

Riga, June 20.

The Bolshevist authorities have condemned the Dominican Mother Superior Abrikosova and about ten other Roman Catholics, most of them Dominican nuns, to banishment for ten years with imprisonment in Northern Siberia for imparting to Roman Catholic children private religious instruction. The Bolshevist laws prohibit either public or private religious teaching to children.

When "The Times" on November 26 last first reported the desecration of the abode of these nuns by Ogpu agents and their arrest, the Bolshevists officially and emphatically denied the truth of the statements, which denial they later on repeated. Now after seven months' imprisonment the nuns have been condemned, but the Bolshevist Press does not report the affair. These nuns merely share the fate of hundreds and thousands of other persons, clergy, laymen, and women, against whom the Terror has again assumed large proportions. The stream of exiles, formerly sent largely to Archangel, has recently been diverted to Northern Siberia, where some are allowed limited freedom and others are placed in solitary confinement.

Conditions in Russian towns have gone back to conditions in 1919, and citizens who a year ago flaunted finery in the streets or merely clothed themselves decently now again fear to wear collars lest they betray their non-proletarian origin.

MANAGEMENT OF RUBBER ESTATES

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

Sir,—Many holders of Shanghai rubber companies living in the outports, must have greatly appreciated the various articles recently published in the "North-China Daily News" regarding the present rubber situation. Your dear old courteous paper is the only source that most of us living in the outports, holding rubber shares, look for information regarding rubber matters.

The writer has held rubber shares in Shanghai Companies since the formation of the first Kalumpong Rubber Company, and needless to say he is not one of those who have made money out of the investment. A firm conviction, however, remains that rubber, like all other raw materials, will some day find its proper level. It is being more extensively used each year, and new channels will be found quite apart from the increasing demand of the motor vehicular traffic—which has great possibilities—houseflooring, and soles for shoes. In connexion with the use of crepe soles I should like to say I had recently my first experience and found it very satisfactory, but the cost viz $8. surely showed a large difference in the price the rubber producer actually received.

I am quite unable to understand the reason why Shanghai rubber Companies are quoted at such a ridiculously low price on the Stock Exchange. An examination of every company listed shows that the intrinsic value is far higher than the quotations suggest. Take the following companies which have a par value of Tls. 10.00, the following rates are recently reported, Shai Malays Tls. 1½, Chempedaks Tls. 4, Karans Tls. 2½, Padangs Tls. 2½, Karans last year paid a dividend of Tls. 0.60 per share, and although Padangs had an exceedingly high cost of production last year, and have not paid a dividend for some years, yet both these companies have a large reserve, and to offer but one quarter of their original par value seems an absurd quotation. The same "offers" extend to most other Shanghai rubber companies, and this, bear in mind, is after the companies have already been reconstructed and the capital cut down by half.

Is the explanation for the low rates due to the public having lost confidence in the management of rubber companies, and if so can shareholders do nothing to obtain a change? Your issue of July 4 contains an article showing how improvements may be made in the standardizing of accounts. I have a strong impression that in view of the very high cost of production in some Shanghai companies, the condition of management existing at the estate itself also requires reorganizing. Thanking you,

I am, etc.,
H. G. STEPHENS.

ON "EXTRALITY"

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

Sir,—I think it may be safely affirmed that the great majority of American missionaries and Mission Boards take no part in the agitation for the abolition of extraterritoriality. For instance, in the last number received (July 24) of the "Missionary Herald," the official missionary publication of the Congregational churches in the United States, there is an interesting editorial on the subject. A small minority,—28—of members of the North China Mission, averse to being placed in a position which may seem to give colour to the charge that at any sign of trouble the missionary runs up his nation's flag, calls for a gunboat or a detachment of soldiers and falls back on his government for support, have publicly declared their earnest desire that no form of military pressure be exerted to protect them or their property, and that in the event of their capture or death at the hands of lawless persons no money be paid for their relief and no indemnity exacted. The editor comments as follows:—

"We sympathize with this attitude and desire; many of us join in the feeling that force is not a good weapon by which to carry Christianity into a non-Christian land; also we do not want special privileges or protection for the Christian missionary. It must be noted, however, that in the eyes of the United States Government the missionaries are simply citizens of the country from which they come; they are not being accorded any special privileges or being defended in their missionary work. The Government can make no discrimination; it must treat all citizens alike. It has secured through treaties certain rights and privileges which it now claims and maintains for all its citizens; it cannot look with approval on any individual or group of individuals disavowing these rights or declining to conform to the regulations which duly-appointed Government officials prescribe for American citizens in China. It cannot guard one family, one house, one district, and not another because its guarding is not desired in the latter case. If fatalities or injuries should occur through its withdrawal of protection from some, the result would be weakening of protection for all the rest, the lowering of United States prestige, and general confusion as to the rights of extraterritoriality.

"As citizens of the United States, American missionaries, like all other Americans in China, must recognize and conform to the procedure which the Government has promulgated for its people there. One need not be always clamouring for soldiers or flying the flag of protection at any sign of disorder; he may make very clear that his real reliance for protection and for his work are in God rather than in man. At the same time, as a citizen of the United States, he is under obligation to conform to the rules and regulations which this nation has prescribed to meet his case. If he is not willing to do that, he should abandon his United States citizenship, become a citizen of China, and get freed from all obligations to the country from which he came. Such, we understand, is the attitude which the United States holds in the matter; and such, we believe, is the attitude which our missionaries in China will feel themselves compelled to take, and to which they can adjust themselves without disloyalty to their convictions and without self-misrepresentation to the people of China whom they are trying to help."

This statement clearly define's the proper attitude, from the point of view of the State which should be taken by American missionaries.

CONGESTION IN THE HUANGPU

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

Sir,—An article which is given a prominent place on the front page of your issue dated July 31 and is headed "The Congested State of the Huangpu," reads somewhat strangely.

This article, which you state is "contributed," mentions "our correspondence columns" and "our readers" as though it were your article or written by your staff. It authoritatively states that the Huangpu is regulated as well as is humanly possible, and uses the expression "We take it upon ourselves" when giving some information regarding the inspection of launch laodahs.

This letter is obviously written by or for someone who feels some responsibility for the very lax state of affairs that exists in the harbour and at the jetties, and it does much to confirm the impression expressed by your last week's correspondent, "Ulysses," when he said that it seemed to be "nobody's business" to attend to the affairs mentioned. Perhaps he should have said that nobody wants the business.

I was very impressed by the clear way that "Ulysses" noted the principal defects in our harbour traffic administration, and, with many years of experience on the river, I endorse all that he said as being true and not exaggerated.

On any night one can see boats and junks plying on the river without lights, or worse still, with a light placed in the cabin so that it will not blow out, but ready to produce at the last moment, or, in case of collision to show that the steamlaunch laodah is to blame.

It is quite common to see a half dozen lightless native boats between Lay Road and the Customs Jetty.

It is not difficult for a "layman" to understand that any craft that has no light may be arrested by the Harbour Police. Such vessels are a menace to life and property, and if the Chinese Government forbid the enforcing of lights on such craft you will be doing a good turn to the many people who have to move about on the water in this harbour if you give publicity to the matter.

With reference to the unlit buoy; the laodah showed no inefficiency in avoiding an unlit buoy on a dark night. The inefficiency lies with the authorities who permit a buoy which is in the fairway to be unlit.

Regarding the "contributor's" remarks regarding jetties; I consider that the authorities are to blame for the present state of affairs. They should take the trouble to regulate the traffic so that there is always a clear berth for a launch to go alongside the Customs Jetty, Nanking Road Jetty, Wayside Jetty, and Lay Road Jetty. Launches not actually discharging or taking on passengers should be made to lie in tiers above or below the clear berth, until they are called for. This requires organization and control, and is obviously the duty of the Harbour authorities.

The Customs Jetty during the daytime is a glaring example of lack of control. Ferry launches of all sizes and shapes crowd to the jetty, and passengers have to clamber at the risk of their lives over half a dozen craft, some of which are not even tied up, and no attempt is made to regulate this traffic.

Each ferry launch should be made to come alongside the pontoon and then leave and make room for the next one. This again would require the organization and control that is so apparenlty lacking.

Your contributor has such an utterly wrong idea of London and Hongkong that I make no comment on his remarks regarding those ports. His attitude and limitations are clearly indicated by his remarks regarding the lady and the Chinese feet.

You cannot do a better thing, Sir, than to invite correspondence on this subject from the people who have to make use of the ferry launches, or have to move about on the river by day and night.

They know the risks that they have to run, and although they are "laymen" (whatever that means in this instance) many of them could suggest remedies that your "contributor" does not think of.

I am, etc.,
M. M.

Shanghai, Aug. 1, 1924.

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

Sir,—A recent article which appeared in your paper under the headine of "The Congested State of the Huangpu" has doubtless caused some amusement to members of the profession which is met concerned in the existing law state of control of native craft in this river, I write entirely from the point of view of an officer commanding a steam vessel frequently entering the port of Shanghai; in the article in question, which, apparently has been written by an enthusiastic tourist or a person "doing" China in a more leisurely manner and who has been given the opportunity to collect a certain amount of information on the subject, more or less incorrect and therefore highly misleading. Let me assure the writer of the "contributed" article that there are junks in the Huangpu River and on any calm day round about slack water he can observe scores of these craft aimlessly drifting through the shipping of our congested harbour, their laodahs well knowing and taking advantage of the fact that they have the right of way and that in the event of their junk being damaged or sunk by collision with a steam vessel under weigh, the latter is solely to blame; the master of a steam vessel apparently may suffer imprisonment, fine or instant dismissal from his employment, but the possibly half-witted, half-clothed coolie in charge of the junk may continue his course generally in mid-channel—a menace to all.

One of the most disgraceful examples of lack of control is the manner in which timber rafts are allowed to drift down river broadside on to the tide, frequently two or three of these rafts are encountered drifting down in line abreast completely blocking one side of the fairway, the coolie in charge being quite helpless and unable to control his unwieldly craft even supposing he considered it necessary to do so. The Harbour Authorities are responsible and have power to forbid craft which are not under control from attempting to navigate (if such a word can be used in connexion with these craft) that portion of the Huangpu where the shipping trade of North China is carried on), there are any number of small launches available for towing purposes and these should be engaged for towing timber rafts to their destination keeping to one side of the fairway in route.

Knowing the Mersey, the Thames, and the Hudson River, I have no hesitation in stating that the Huangpu River is the most trying one to navigate on account of the different types of non-giving-way craft encountered, from the across-the-bow-darting sampan to the lumbering Foochow pole junk; this includes our deadly enemy, the drifting timber raft.

There is room for improvement, a vast improvement.

WANTED USED STAMPS FOR CHARITY

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

Sir,—The success my original appeal, through the London "Universe," met with, has encouraged me to extend my field of operation in the hope that my fellow Britishers outside the "Motherland" will be no less generous than were their countrymen here in England. It may not be generally known that many charitable institutions, or orphanages, are able just to keep their doors open through the financial aid they receive by the sale of "waste" of every description contributed by the charitably disposed; under the term "waste" being included used postage stamps of any denomination and country. May I therefore ask your good readers to help me to "do a good turn" to one of these charitable institutions by forwarding me all or some of their used stamps—even if these be all British half-pennies and pennies. I am anxious to gather in a second million for the "Crusade of Rescue" Refugee.

A CLOUD OF BEETLES

To the Editor of the
"NORTH-CHINA DAILY NEWS."

Sir,—I enclose herewith three specimen beetles collected on the Bund about 11.30 a.m. yesterday. I consider that they show three distinctive characteristics, 1st has distinctive antennae, 2nd has not, but has tiger-like striped body, 3rd has distinctive green sheen to head whereas other two are copper-coloured. Wing coverts are each quite different.

Anyhow I am not qualified to give you a scientific discussion on the subject but I consider that the following is of some local and possibly, to naturalists, world-wide interest.

While walking on the Bund (incidentally exercising my dog) at about 11 a.m. on August 5, I noticed a peculiar cloud skimming low down and apparently coming from the Pootung shore. There was a strong breeze (i.e. for summer season) blowing from the direction of a little higher up the river than the International Cotton Mill, but not so far as China Navigation Co.'s wharf. Say almost due west.

The cloud settled on the grass plots of the Bund and almost immediately I noticed that all round me the grass was alive with brilliantly shining beetles.

My dog became quite annoyed as these insects buzzed and flopped all around her and this caused me to investigate the phenomenon. I walked from the Customs shed to the gate of the gardens and I found thousands upon thousands of these insects (only from opposite the Hongkong & Shanghai Bank down to the Nanking Road) and here they were in multitude.

Beyond the Customs sheds up to the Shanghai Club I saw two or three only here and there. From Nanking Road to the Gardens I saw only a few but all flying in lively fashion and not to be captured.

I send this to you as the "North-China Daily News" has always been the standard recorder of unusual occurrences even when such are apparently trivial. It is not impossible that this swarming of beetles has some significance. I have known Shanghai since 1893 and have never seen such a thing before.

Anyhow for what they are worth herewith the specimens.

I am, etc.,

A. L. Hall.

QUIET IN THE PARKS

To the Editor of the

"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—I am really ill. There is something seriously wrong with my auditory senses and I am sure you can find someone who will help me.

The other evening found me strolling in the French Park and soon I sat "beside the still waters." It had been a very hot day and I was out to cool off my fed-up and far-from-home sort of feeling. Amidst such beautiful calm surroundings, who could but be rested and at peace with the world. A sudden thought occurred to me; why is it more people do not go to these lovely gardens? If there was a charge for admission, I was sure many more people would use it. The vast Crowd cannot even pretend to enjoy a thing unless they pay and the more they pay the more they pretend to enjoy themselves. Where is true happiness to be found?

Such was the trend of my thoughts when I noticed a number of people leave the footpath and walk down the grass slope in my direction. Before I could see them distinctly I knew them to be Chinese. They looked to be a well dressed family party with a friend or two and seated themselves at least twenty yards away.

Somehow the peaceful evening was at an end for it was then that my auditory senses seemed to cause trouble. The harmonious rippling laughter of some little French girls in the distance was interrupted by the discordant shrieks of two Chinese children. Why is it that even their elders cannot speak in a subdued tone amidst such quiet surroundings, when every one else instinctively does? By the way, is it true that it is impossible for a Chinese to whisper? I was fast becoming disappointed that I ever visited the park, and my feelings were overcome with horror and disgust when I heard from these apparently educated and refined Chinese, their unmistakeable, unmentionable, uneverything else habit they have of letting one know who is near.

Imagine how pleasant it would be if, at one of the open air concerts at Jessfield Park and during one of those soft melodies, we should suddenly hear a battery of what even the educated Chinese think no more of than we do of an unavoidable sneeze, if even as much under the above circumstances.

Once and for all this is a sufficient reason as to why the Chinese, even the so-called educated and well dressed, should be barred from our Parks.

Of course they will persistently try to gain admittance but until it is possible for them to abhor what we abhor, surely we are justified in refusing their admittance.

On my way home I wondered what the definition of "To Civilize" could be. Nuttall says "to reclaim from barbarism; to instruct in the arts and refinements of civil life."

I would be grateful if any one, especially a Chinese, could tell me if there is anything really wrong with my ears. If not, then for goodness sake give the Chinese their own parks.

I am, etc.,

Tranquil.

THE SCHERER CASE

To the Editor of the

"North-China Daily News."

Sir,—I have read with interest Mr. Scherer's case, and I trust that the foreign population of China will help this man, who is now unable to help himself. It is awful to think of him lying in a Chinese prison, and it is easy to imagine that before the end of a term, he may become the victim of melancholia.

I congratulate you on giving the matter every publicity, and I hope, if necessary, (after the re-trial) that people will wake to their sense of responsibility in this matter.

Davis Cup Competition: China Easily Beaten by Australia

New York, July 31.

In the Davis Cup tie between Australia and China the first two singles were won by Australia.

G. L. Patterson (Australia) beat Lock Wei (China), 6-1, 6-2, 6-2.

P. O'Hara Wood beat Ng Sze Kong, 6-0, 6-1, 6-2.

Later.

In consequence of orders from Washington, Messrs. Fukuda and Harada, members of the Japanese Davis Cup team, who arrived here on the Olympic, were detained on Ellis Island until yesterday afternoon, when they were allowed to enter America on parole. It is alleged that their passports were improperly vised in Paris.—Reuter's American Service.

New York, Aug. 1.

In the doubles of the Davis Cup tie between China and Australia Messrs. Patterson & O'Hara Wood beat Messrs. Wei and Kong 6-1, 6-2, 6-0.

The Australians have thus won the first three maches.

The Australians were surprised by the spirited opposition of the Chinese. Kong developed a top spin off his forehand drives which enabled the Chinese twice to break through O'Hara Wood's service. The Chinese players made their best stand in the second round.—Reuter's American Service.

New York, Aug. 3.

In the Davis Cup tie between Australia and China, Patterson (Australia) beat Kong (China) 6-0, 6-0, 6-1 and O'Hara Wood (Australia) beat Wei (China) 6-0, 6-0, 6-2.

Patterson's service twisted Kong into knots. The latter's service was weak and he often double-faulted. Sometimes, however, he showed brilliant flashes.

Wei's returns against O'Hara Wood were too strong.—Reuter's American Service.

LAW REPORTS

THE POWERS OF THE SUPREME COURT

Moorhead & Halse and the Ice Company's Land: Disputed Jurisdiction

Further argument was heard in the Supreme Court last Friday before his Honour Judge Sir Skinner Turner, on the question of jurisdiction raised in the case of Messrs. Moorhead & Halse v. the Shanghai Ice & Cold Storage Co. Ld., and the Union Cold Storage Co. Ld., which is an action concerning a piece of land in Shanghai occupied by the first named company and owned by the second. In April, the Court issued an order of "substituted service" on the Union Company, which is registered in England and has no business or office in Shanghai, and defendants are now seeking to have this order set aside on the ground that it is bad in law, and that the Court has no jurisdiction over the Company and therefore its name should be removed from the case.

This was argued at length for defendants by Mr. G. H. Wright, on Thursday, and yesterday Mr. Reader Harris replied for plaintiffs. He submitted that the Supreme Court in Shanghai was the only court in the world which could have jurisdiction over the piece of land in question. It could be laid down as a principle, counsel argued, that the only power which had jurisdiction over land in a country was the sovereign power of that country, and that was an exclusive jurisdiction. China had given its sovereign power over this piece of land to the Sovereign of Great Britain, and the Sovereign of Great Britain had by orders in council under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act stated that jurisdiction should be exercised by the British Supreme Court in China. His Lordship was therefore exercising the jurisdiction of his Majesty under the Tientsin Treaty and the Foreign Jurisdiction Act, and this jurisdiction extended to "all property and all personal and proprietary rights and liabilities within the limits (of the Order in Council) of British subjects, whether such subjects are within the limits or not." Council suggested there could be no other reading to these words, and contended that if the court was given jurisdiction over the property of British subjects in China it must also have jurisdiction over the owners of that property. The High Court in England certainly had no jurisdiction over it. The Supreme Court was the only court which could issue an effective order in the case, and it might be the only court which could entertain the action. There was nothing in the Treaty, the Order in Council, or the Foreign Jurisdiction Act excluding his Lordship from jurisdiction over a person merely because he happened to be outside the limits of the principal Order.

Further argument ensued as to whether there could be service of the writ "outside the limits" and his Lordship observed that this was expressly provided for in rule 111.

Mr. Wright—That applies only to cases where a defendant has been within the jurisdiction.

His Lordship—If you are correct, the position is this: you can withdraw land from the jurisdiction of any court in the world if it belongs to a British subject who, having registered it in a non-British country, himself goes to reside in the United States.

Mr. Wright—You are assuming that no court in the United States would take jurisdiction.

His Lordship—This court is not bound in any way by a decision of the High Court of the United States, and therefore there would be no court that would have jurisdiction over the land.

Mr. Wright—The question at present is that of jurisdiction over an individual, and you must have that first before there can be jurisdiction over the land.

His Lordship—Would it be going too far to say that you have been within the jurisdiction?

Mr. Wright—Yes.

His Lordship—But you have been here by your agent, and you have admittedly registered at the Land Office for ownership of this piece of ground.

Mr. Wright—In that way, it might be said that we have been in the jurisdiction for a few minutes.

Counsel having concluded argument, his Lordship announced that he would give a decision in writing.

When Action Lies Against Persons Outside Jurisdiction

His Lordship, in giving judgment, on Thursday, said: The plaintiffs as the registered owners of B. C. Lot 4341 issued a writ against the Union Cold Storage Co. Ld. as the owners, and the Shanghai Ice and Cold Storage Co., Ld., as the occupiers, of B. C. Lot 5881 for trespass to their land, asking for a rectification of boundaries with the usual consequences as to buildings, etc., or damages. Under our rules service of a writ must, speaking generally, be personal and it was possible to serve the second defendants, the occupiers; but it was found that the first defendants the registered owners of this land were not here; they are a limited company with offices in London and having no office here. In these circumstances, on an ex parte application, I made an order under Rule 111 (b) for substituted service on the resident manager here of the second defendants, (the occupiers), being satisfied on the evidence before me that knowledge of the writ would come to the first defendants by that means. And it has been most effective, for they now apply to set that order aside on the ground that there was no jurisdiction to make it.

The Question Important.

The question is important and has been argued in open Court: if the argument is correct, it means that any land owned by British subjects in China can be withdrawn entirely from the jurisdiction of any Court in a matter like this: by, for instance, registering it in the name of a British subject residing and or carrying on business in the United States. It is a serious limitation on the jurisdiction of this Court and a considerable drawback to those who may have claims in respect of any such land.

Even in this case it may now be that no Court can exercise jurisdiction: for it seems clear on the text books that, though these defendants are within the jurisdiction of the High Court in England, that Court would not take jurisdiction. It is clear that land in China is "foreign land" and so governed as to its incidents by the law of China, the Lex Loci Rei Sitae; and for that purpose this Court even takes judicial knowledge of that law (see the Zanzibar case: 1901 A. C. 373).

For the above statement as to the jurisdiction in England I need only refer to Halsbury, Vol. 6. on pp 199, etc.:—"The English Courts have in general no jurisdiction to determine directly the title to a foreign immovable, nor can they entertain any action which substantially involves the determination of such title. Thus no action will lie in England to obtain possession of foreign land, since the question of title must be dealt with in order to discover the rights of the parties. In an action for damages for trespass to foreign lands where an issue of title is directly raised either by the statement of claim or by the defence, the English Courts are as incompetent to try the issue as they are to try an action directly brought for the recovery of the land The English Courts will not interfere where to do so would be useless and it would be impossible for the decree to be carried into effect. But English Courts have powers to exercise a jurisdiction in personam in respect of foreign immovables against persons locally within their jurisdiction in cases where there is an equity between the parties arising from contract fraud or trust provided that the decision of title be not directly involved."

An Incredible Position.

Of course it is not for me to decide upon the jurisdiction of the Courts in England: I can only say that on the authorities before me it appears that, if this Court has no jurisdiction in this case, there is no Court anywhere that has: an incredible position and contrary to all theories of jurisprudence; and not unnaturally one against which I should strive.

Now it is clear to me that this is a case in which if it arose in England an order would be made for service out of the jurisdiction: the Courts would take jurisdiction: (see Order 11. Rules 1 (a), (b), (g).) It is also clear that our rules do not provide a code for service out of the jurisdiction and it may be then that, assuming we have jurisdiction in a matter when such an order is required, we are entitled to look to the practize at home under our Rule 315. It may well be that, once it is established that a particular case is one over which this Court can exercise jurisdiction, the provisions of that Rule may be called into play. But it must be remembered that it is only in respect of matters of practice and procedure for which no provision is made that we are entitled to look to the home practice and procedure. Hence it is obligatory on this Court first to see whether the particular matter is provided for in our Rules, before we are entitled to look to the home practice. I have already dealt with this matter at some length in the case of Nootia v. 2 White-Cooper reported in 191 "North-China Herald" at p. 262. (November 4, 1916).

Now what is the jurisdiction of this Court? It is to be found in Order-in-Council 1904. Article 5: an Order passed under the Foreign Jurisdiction Acts to provide for the exercise in China of the jurisdiction acquired by the King under the Treaty of Tientsin. It is over (1) British subjects, within the limits of the Order: and (2) The property and all personal or proprietary rights and liabilities within the said limits of British subjects, whether such British subjects are within the said limits or not. (That is all that matters for the purposes of this case).

It is thus clear that some jurisdiction at all events is to be extended to person outside the limits of the Order. It is not suggested that this jurisdiction is ultra vires. The Treaty or the Foreign Jurisdiction Acts (see as to this the judgment of the Privy Council in In re Carew. 1897. A. C. 719: and 18 Cox C. C. 629). And again the exercise of such jurisdiction is the same as that exercised by the Courts in England; as to which see the list of matters in which orders for service out of the jurisdiction are made by Courts in England It is the existence of property, etc. within the limits of the order that gives the jurisdiction over the persons: it is not the presence of the persons within the limits of the order that gives the jurisdiction over the property. The argument as to the meaning of (2) above seeks to limit it to particular classes of cases only (such as bankruptcy, etc.) and to persons who have been within the limits of the Order (practically confining it to persons who have left to evade service). But I do not find any hint of such a limitation in the words nor do I discover any need to make such. How for the words extend is not necessary for me to decide to-day, but it seems to me that they clearly cover a case like the one before me. The land in question is property within the limits of the Order of a British subject: it does not matter whether he is here or not: the claim is in respect of a liability in respect of that land and it seems to me that it is exactly within the words of the Article. This Court therefore has jurisdiction.

The further question then arises: how can the Court get at a defendant not within the limits of the Order in a case in which it is sought to serve him? Our only rule in Rule 111. and this seems to provide ample means. It provides that when personal service cannot for any reason be conveniently effected (note the absence of the word "prompt" as in the Home Rule, and also the generality of "any reason"): then the Court may make one of several orders whereby service can be effected. Of these only one seems to contemplate action outside the limits of the Order: (c): which it is to be noted may not be made by a Provincial Court. Now it is clear that this Rule, and specially (b), is intended to deal with cases where service is wanted on persons not within the limits of the Order: see the proviso at the end. I therefore find the Order-in-Council giving jurisdiction in certain matters over persons not within the limits of the Order and I find a Rule of Court laying down a method whereby each persons may be served. It seems to me that is enough to dispose of this summons. The case falls within the jurisdiction Article and the procedure adopted is part of our prescribed procedure.

I am not called upon to define more nearly the limits of Article 5 (2) of the Order-in-Council. But I may say this; it appears to me that it would certainly cover all such cases as come within the jurisdiction of the Home Courts when a proposed defendant is out of the jurisdiction; and I see no reason at present to limit it to less than that.

I also want to add that I am disposed to think much might be said for the view that the Union Co. have been here, at all events when they signed the Land Register and undertook the liability still upon them of paying taxes for this land. It may be that they carry on the business of landlords here, for it seems not unfair to assume that the other defendants are their tenants.

I am glad to be able to come to this decision to-day on the wording of the Order-in-Council; for it would be inflicting an enormous hardship on would-be litigants if they had to go to England to get redress in a matter of this class from a defendant who owns land in China, pays taxes on it and in respect of it has the privileges of a voter at Ratepayers' Meetings; and with no certainty that the Courts in England would entertain the action.

The summons must be dismissed with costs.

MONEYLENDER'S WOMAN VICTIM

Plaintiff Principal Witness in Rowarth Case

Harbak Singh, who was the central figure in the sensational Rowarth trial, appeared in the Supreme Court on Tuesday in the character of money lender, claiming $30 balance of money lent to a lady client.

Defendant denied owing anything. She told Judge Grain that she borrowed $100 from plaintiff and signed a promissory note for $180, to be repaid in instalments of $18, plaintiff's usual terms. Falling behind with one instalment, she had to sign a further note for $30 and pay $13.50 court fees in order to induce plaintiff to withdraw a summons against her. The $30 he now claimed was a bribe he had made her pay for withdrawal of the case. All other instalments due had been paid.

His Honour—You are prepared to swear that?

Defendant—I do swear it.

Plaintiff—I must take her word, but—(raising his hand)—God knows about it!

His Honour—All right. Case dismissed.

HOTEL VENTURE THAT FAILED

Unlucky Sikh Partners Again in Court: Judgment Summons Adjourned

The affairs of the three Sikh partners, Sucha Sing, Gujan Singh and Bishen Singh, whose unfortunate venture in the Imperial Hotel has led to their frequent appearance in the Supreme Court, were again before his Honour Judge Grain on Tuesday defendants appearing on a judgment summons by the Wing Tai Co. for $1,154.40.

In answer to Mr. A. Covey, who appeared for plaintiffs, Gujan Singh said he had no fixed abode and lived sometimes at the Sikh church and sometimes with friends who provided him with food. He was formerly in the Municipal Educational Department, but had done no work for eight months. He had not recently sent money or jewellery to relatives in India, and the expenses of a journey which he lately made to Japan were paid by Rose & Co., an Indian concern. He was not a wealthy man a year ago. His share in the hotel partnership was $2,800. Sucha Singh put in $1,500 and Bishen $1,300, most of it borrowed money. Witness denied that since the judgment against him he had paid $2,700 to a man named Franck, but admitted that he knew this man. He also denied that he was a shareholder in a printing business at Yangtszepoo. He was willing to assign his police superannuation to plaintiffs.

His Honour—I think you will find that under his agreement he cannot do that. Perhaps that is why he is so willing to assign it, knowing you cannot get it.

Bishen Singh also pleaded inability to pay, but admitted that he was a money lender and had $500 out on loan. He was willing to make the promissory notes over to plaintiffs.

Sucha Singh told the court he also was living on his friends, who would provide him with food, but would not lend him money. He had no outstanding claims for money lent, but there was one action against him in connexion with the ghee fund.

His Honour—That was the case in which I ordered an account to be taken between this man and Amar Singh. While they were giving evidence one of their confrères got up at the back of the court and said they were both liars.

The matter was adjourned sine die, plaintiffs being given leave to apply in the event of obtaining evidence that defendants were able to pay.

TRAUMATIC NEUROSIS AGAIN

Russian's Claim for $9,000 Alleged Damages Following Motor-car Accident

Another case in which a claim for damages arising out a motor-car accident was supported by evidence of the nervous disease known as traumatic neurosis was heard in the Suppreme Court on Wednesday, by his Honour Judge Sir Skinner Turner and a jury.

The action was brought against Mr. W. J. Humphries, of 4A Wongkashaw Gardens, by Stefan Uznamski, who claimed Tls. 1,100 and $9,000 damages due to defendant's negligence. The accident occurred on the Recreation Ground during a race meeting in October last, and plaintiff alleged that the accident had caused him considerable expense and that his health had been, and would continue to be, seriously affected. For the defence, it was alleged that the accident was due to the fact that an ambulance belonging to the General Hospital approached the defendant's car at an excessive speed on the wrong side of the road, and the only course open to defendant in avoiding a collision was to accelerate his car and cross over on to the grass. There was a general denial of the alleged injuries and consequent expenses.

Mr. C. Mansel Reece appeared for plaintiff and Mr. Ranald G. MacDonald for defendant.

Plaintiff gave evidence that he was an engineer and had earned his living in Shanghai by repairing typewriters and sewing machines. On the afternoon of October 13 last he was with a friend on the Recreation Ground watching the races, and they were seated just off the path between the Lawn Bowls Club and the Recreation Club, facing the grandstand. An accident occurred during one of the races, and witness and his friend stood up to watch a motor-car bringing in an injured jockey. Just at this moment he received a blow in the back and was knocked down, and the next thing he knew was that he was lying on a bench and someone was offering him a glass of wine. He noticed that the edge of the bench was broken, and also the lamps of a motor-car. He was taken to the General Hospital and remained there for a fortnight, and he had done no work since being discharged from the hospital. He tried once, but fell down in a faint.

Cross-examined by Mr. MacDonald, witness said his earnings for two months before the accident averaged $250 a month, but in the preceding month he only earned $25, with quarters, as a watchman. He was not now able to do manual labour.

Counsel—I suggest that you were not injured at all?—I was very seriously injured. If you don't believe, try standing in front of a car yourself.

Dr. Burton was next called and stated that he saw plaintiff at the General Hospital on October 14 and examined him very carefully, as also on every succeeding day., and all he could find was that he complained of tenderness on the left buttock. There was no discolouration or abrasion of the skin, and no sign of fracture.

Plaintiff's Appetite.

In cross-examination, Dr. Burton said that prior to this date plaintiff had called at the hospital to report that he thought he was suffering from appenditicis, but witness found no sign of it. He next came and complained of chest trouble, but witness found nothing seriously wrong, and sent him away with a cough mixture. He seemed then to be half starved. He afterwards said that witness had refused to operate for appendicitis because he (plaintiff) had not money to pay for the operation, but this was quite wrong. On another occasion, plaintiff came to the hospital suffering from dysentery. During the time he was in hospital after the accident, he ate very heartily and put on weight. He complained of palpitation of the heart, after meals, but witness ascribed this to over-eating.

His Lordship—That would be possible with a half starued man?

Witness—Yes. As far as I observed, his health generally was better when he left the hospital, but he had a slight limp.

In answer to a question by Mr. Reece, witness said when plaintiff first called at the hospital he formed the impression that he was a malingerer. This impression remained, and he therefore examined him very carefully in the days following the accident. On the evening of his admission, plaintiff walked about the hospital, but when witness went to examine him next morning he said he was unable to get out of bed. It seemed to witness that he was anxious to get into hospital.

His Lordship—You don't suggest that he put himself in front of a motor-car in order to get there?

Witness—No. But I thought he was making the most of his injury.

Thought He Was Going to Die

Mr. Stibelsky an operatic singer who said that he was now a motor driver, corroborated plantiff's story of the accident. Witness himself was struck by the car, but was not injured. When picked up, plaintiff kept shouting "Oh my head," and he insisted upon being taken home because he thought he was going to die.

In cross-examination, witness said the car which was bringing in the injured jockey was not driven at an excessive speed. He estimated its speed at about 18 miles an hour. It might have been some 50 or 60 ft. away when defendant's car struck the seat.

Chronic Case of Traumatic Neurosis.

Dr. Bary, specialist in mental and nerwus diseases, gave evidence as to his examination of plaintiff after the accident. He was suffering from headache and insomnia, had a twitching of the face and eyes, and was lame on one leg. The reflexes were exaggerated, and there was a distinct diminution of feeling of the whole of the left side of his body, especially the left leg. A pin could be pushed in and he would feel nothing. "I can do it now," said the doctor.

His Lordship—Mr. MacDonald has already been invited to try one experiment. Perhaps you might try this one on Mr. Mansel Reece!

Continuing, witness said he formed the conclusion that plaintiff was suffering from traumatic neurosis, the symptoms of which were then precisely as they were in October last. This was a chronic case and might last for two or three years, perhaps a little more, or a little less, or perhaps much more. He estimated plaintiff's loss of working power at 50 per cent.

In reply to a question by a juror, as to whether the symptoms would continue or increase as long as plaintiff made up his mind not to get well, Dr. Bary said: That is quite sure. Many of these symptoms are fed by auto-suggestion. For example, many cases of shell-shock became quite cured when peace was signed and there was no fear of the patient having to go to the front again. I do not say that it was cowardice. It is a nervous complaint, and was common to all the armies.

A Russian doctor who was called in to examine plaintiff on October 29 gave evidence that he found him suffering from nervous shock and headaches, and subject to fainting fits. Witness saw him faint on four occasions, and attributed these fits to the blow on the head which he received. If plaintiff remained in his present circumstances it was possible he might never recover, and he might not even live for more than another two years. Plaintiff was in good health and physical condition before the accident and was able to work. He owed witness $1,490 for professional services, and witness had also lent him money to help him along.

This concluded the case for plaintiff.

Suing the Wrong Man

For the defence, Mr. MacDonald told the jury that however much they might sympathize with plaintiff in this distressing case, they must not allow sympathy to obscure the only issue in the case, viz., whether or not defendant had been guilty of negligence. They were not interested in the question of damages until this had been decided. The defence was that defendant had exercised reasonable care and diligence in endeavouring to avoid the accident and therefore could not be found to have been negligent. What happened was that the wrong man had been sued.

Defendant then gave his version of the affair. He said that he was driving his car towards the Recreation Club and, on taking the turn at the Lawn Bowls Club, at a speed of about eight miles an hour, he blew his horn. On turning, he saw another car approaching, on the wrong side of the road, and at about 20 miles an hour, and had to make up his mind quickly what course to adopt. Had he gone forward remaining on his proper side a collision would have been inevitable, and the only possible alternative seemed to be to accelerate and get clear of the other car. This he did, crossing over to the green. He would have gone straight on to the Police ground, but there was a little knot of people standing at the corner near the Lawn Bowls Club, and to avoid them he had to steer to the left. This put him in line with the seat upon which plaintiff and his friend were sitting, and he at once put on his brakes and stalled the engine, but could not avoid striking the back part of the seat end on. Mr. Stebelsky was thrown clear of the seat, which was pushed from beneath plaintiff, causing him to fall straight to the ground. The seat was pushed along some five feet, and the car had been pulled up before the seat stopped moving.

Letter Asking for $250

Witness described the assistance which was then given to plaintiff, adding that he called at the hospital two or three times to see what could be done for him, and went on to say that when plaintiff had been discharged from hospital he came round with a letter asking for $250. Witness referred him to someone else.

In cross-examination witness repeated that, in view of the other car coming along on the wrong side of the road at 20 miles an hour, he considered the only thing he could do was to get on the grass and out of its way.

His Lordship—Weren't you running an appalling risk in doing so, apart from any question of negligence? Supposing the driver of the other car had crossed over to his proper side, would there not have been a most almighty smash?

Witness—If I had held on my course he might have done the same.

Mr. Mansel Reece—Why did you go over on the grass at all? Why not have crossed to the right of the road only?

Witness—Because I was afraid of the speed of the other car. If there had been plenty of room on the road there would have been no need to go on the grass.

Thomas Mason was next called and corroborated defendant's story. Asked what he thought might have happened if Mr. Humphries had not crossed over to the right, witness said: "I do not think I should have been here to-day."

Plaintiff re-called, and questioned with regard to the letter which he took defendant, said the request was not, as defendant said for $250, but for $2,500. He denied that the letter described by defendant was the one he took. There was a further letter in which $500 was mentioned as suitable compensation, but this sum had been stated in error by its writer.

The hearing was then adjourned until next morning.

Humphries to Pay $600: Deliberate Breach of Ordinary Traffic Rules

The care was concluded on Thursday.

Addressing the jury on behalf of defendant Mr. McDonald said that on the question of damages, they must take into consideration plaintiff's condition prior to the accident, and Dr. Burton, who was entirely unbiassed in the matter, had told them he formed the opinion that plaintiff was a malingerer. If he was a malingerer before the accident, he was an even greater one after, because he saw it was an easier way to make money. Counsel went on to define traumatic neurosis "as an imposing synonym for ordinary nervousness." Traumatic neurosis brought enormous fees into the coffers of mental and psycho-analytical experts and was a godsend to any malingering humbug who met with an accident and hoped to make money out of it.

If plaintiff succeeded on this exaggeration of nervous symptoms, it would be open to any destitute individual in the place to go to court and say that his earning capacity had lessened because some one blew their motor horn too loudly near him. As for negligence, counsel contended, that not only had defendant not been negligent, but he exhibited great presence of mind, with the result that instead of a serious accident all that happened was that plaintiff was compelled to go to hospital for a fortnight. Defendant took the only course open to him in the circumstances.

Mr. Mansel Reece, for plaintiff, said he could not see how there could be any doubt but that defendant was supremely negligent. He lost his head at a critical moment and departed from all the rules of traffic, thus making himself a menace to human life.

Defendant Guilty of Negligence.

In the course of summing up, his Lordship said the case in some way resembled the running down of a steamer at anchor by another steamer in motion: there was negligence on the part of the one causing the collision unless he could get out of it. In this case a motor car in motion struck a peaceful individual sitting on a seat provided by the authorities and put in a position where it was supposed to be safe, and it was thus not necessary for plaintiff to prove any specific act of negligence. It was for the defendant, if he could, to excuse himself from the consequences of his act. It had been said that plaintiff was suing the wrong man, but the occupant of the other car had not been called, though it must have been perfectly well known who was in it. Nor had Dr. O'Hara, who saw plaintiff immediately after the accident, nor any member of the police, nor any other independent witness been called. Of all the manoeuvres which might certainly seem liable to cause an accident, that adopted by defendant was one. Seeing a car coming towards him, as he said at from 20 to 25 miles an hour, he immediately increased his own speed and deliberately drove across the track of the approaching car, putting himself on the wrong side of the road straight away. Moreover he went off the road with people standing about on the grass. If this sort of manoeuvre were to be allowed, it seemed certain that the court would be occupied with more accidents of this character. Defendant's duty would have been first, to keep on his proper side of the road and, second, stop: and he himself had told the court that a car proceeding at 20 miles an hour and fitted with efficient brakes could be stopped in from 10ft. to 20ft. With this course open to him, he deliberately crossed to the wrong side of the road, risking an accident, and an accident happened. His Lordship, proceeding, commented on the fact that no doctor representing the defendant was asked to examine plaintiff, and the evidence of Dr. Bary and the Russian Doctor was therefore not contradicted. When Dr. Burton examined him he had already formed an idea that the man was a humbug. Dr. Burton admitted this, and thus they saw that from the beginning he had a prejudice against plaintiff.

The jury retired to consider their verdict, and when they had been absent for an hour and a half, his Lordship announced that two questions had been addressed to him by them. They asked if they might be allowed to visit the scene of the accident, and he had informed them that it was impossible at that stage of the case. The other question was, as to whether it was necessary the verdict should be unanimous, and to this he had replied that it must be unless the parties agreed otherwise.

The foreman of the jury then asked: Can an error of judgment in any way be considered as negligence?

His Lordship—Yes, it can in a case like this where it led to a deliberate breach of ordinary traffic regulations. In such circumstances there is no doubt an error of judgment can be considered as negligence. A simple definition of negligence is the doing of something one ought not to do or not doing something one ought to do.

Witnesses Who Were Not Called.

His Lordship—There is no evidence about that. There were heaps of witnesses who could have been called. I cannot give you any information because I do not know. We are left with the suggestion by Mr. McDonald that the other car was guilty of negligence without their having been seen or heard in this court.

The jury again retired, and after an absence of a quarter of an hour returned with a unanimous verdict that the accident was caused by the negligence of defendant, and they awarded plaintiff $600.

His Lordship gave judgment accordingly, with such costs as are carried by this amount in a suit brought in formâ pauperis.

HIS GRANDFATHER'S WATCH

Lad Charged with Theft: Story of Trust Funds and a Won't Work

A sensational affair which occurred in 1908 was recalled at H. M. Police Court on Saturday when a youth named Alexander Stewart Maclean, 16 years of age, appeared before Mr. G. W. King upon a charge of having stolen a silver watch belonging to his grandfather, A. C. Peterson with whom he lived at 64a Tiendong Road.

Chief Inspector Mackintosh appeared for the police, whose witness gave evidence that the watch was stolen some time on Wednesday last and was sold by Maclean to three small boys, who scraped together $1.90 to pay for it, and then disposed of it at a pawnshop in Woosung Road for $4. When Maclean was arrested by Chief Inspector O'Toole in Minghong Road on Friday morning, he admitted taking it and selling it to the three boys.

Asked by the Magistrate why he did so, Maclean said that he "wanted some money."

The Magistrate observed that he knew something of the lad's history, his father having met his death in a brawl which occured at a bar in Broadway in 1908. Maclean's death caused a great deal of excitement at the time and several people came under suspicion, but the question as to who fired at him was never cleared up. The accused's mother died in 1913. There was the estate of the father from a life policy, worth something like $10,000, but only $900 at the time of his death. When the mother died, her estate was found to be worth only $198.

Asked what had become of this money, Inspector Mackintosh said he understood that Mr. Benbow Rowe was one of the trustees. Inquiries had been made and it was believed there was a sum of $6,000 invested for the accused. Before he was old enough to go to school, the interest was taken by his mother and afterwards it was used for his education, five years at the Thomas Hanbury School and three at the Roman Catholic School. He left the latter school about 12 months ago, and appeared to have been idle ever since. It was said that he would not work.

His Worship—He seems to be adopting Mr. Micawber's attitude.

The Magistrate decided to adjourn the case and intimated that he would probably give the accused another chance, but he warned him that by conduct of this kind he was heading directly for gaol.

There being some comment on the pawning of the watch by three small boys, the pawnbroker's assistant was called and said that it was customary to take articles from children who were able to write their names and addresses.

The case was adjourned until next morning.

Youth Admonished and Put on Probation for Two Years

Alexandar Stewart Maclean (16) appeared again before Mr. G. W. King on Monday to be dealt with for having stolen a watch and disposing of it to some his mates for $1.90 (and by them afterwards lodged in a pawnshop in exchange for $4).

In answer to the Magistrate, Mackintosh said Maclean was living with his grandfather, Mr. Peterson, at Tiendong Road, and he had promised to look after him, though the family was in straitened circumstances. Last year, $100 had been laid out to provide the youth with clothes, some of which he had pawned.

The Magistrate said he proposed to give Maclean the benefit of the Probationers' Act, on condition that he would promise to remain with his grandfather, and he would have to stop in that one place until he received permission to move. He had qualified for gaol, and was of an age to be sent there but his Worship was loath to do this. Maclean must clearly understand that a conviction was entered against him, and he would have to enter into recognizances to come up at any time during the next two years when the court might call upon him, and if he did anything wrong he would be sentenced for this conviction. He would have to promise not to go about with undesirable people or to undesirable places, and generally to lead an industrious life. If he broke any of these conditions the court would be reluctantly compelled to send him to gaol, which would mean ruin for him. He would therefore have to make the most of this one chance. Shanghai was a place where young people might easily go astray, and Maclean looked like one who would go astray unless compelled to pull up with a sharp turn. He was better off than most, there being some money to which he would be entitled when he came of age, and he should remember this and take advantage of it.

A SAILOR'S LAW SUIT

No Excuse for Practising Pugilism on Chinese: One of the Owego's Crew Fined

Sidney Hughes, a young seaman, appeared before Mr. G. W. King on Monday charged with having assaulted the No. 1 Boy at the Hanbury Institute.

Chief Insp. O'Toole informed the court that an officer was sent to the Institute, in response to a telephone message, to arrest the defendant. It appeared that arrangements had been made by the British Consular authorities to send defendant away by the Empress of Russia on Sunday morning, but he failed to go aboard and the Shipping Office accordingly gave orders that he was not to be furnished with any more food at the Institute. He turned up for tiffin, and when informed of this order, went to the boys' room and committed the assault.

Complainant gave evidence to this effect, and denied that he first hit defendant with a shoe or that he ordered other Chinese to attack him with sticks and shoes.

Mr. Gee, assistant manager at the Institute, told the court that when he went to warn defendant at 7.30 on Sunday morning that he was to leave by the Empress at 11, he found him in one of the dormitories drinking Chinese wine with other men. Hughes said that he would not go away because he had a lawsuit against his former ship. When asked to leave the Institute, he threatened to wait outside and beat up the Chinese one after the other.

Defendant informed his Worship that the ship he came out in, the Owego, a freighter, had been sold and the members of the crew were given a promise that they would be returned to Seattle, with wages and assistance, and if he had gone away on the Empress he would have lost all he signed and worked for. A lawsuit was pending and seven men were interested in it.

His Worship—But does that entitle you to hit a Chinese boy?

Defendant—No, but he made a rush at me, and I got several blows from others.

The Court was informed that defendant had received $300 and "blew it in" on the same day.

Defendant—When the ship was derelict on the Aleutian Islands.

His Worship—I don't want to hear a long story of the sea. It can be no excuse for hitting a Chinese boy on the nose, and threatening others. You must pay $10 or go to prison for seven days.

IRISH BOUNDARY CONTROVERSY

Special Legislation Forecast to Force a Settlement Unless Ulster Appoints a Commissioner: Traty's Intention Held to be Quite Clear

London, Aug. 1.

In the House of Commons to-day, replying to the Conservative leader, Mr. Stanley Baldwin, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Mr. J. H. Thomas, said that the report of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on the question of the Irish Boundary Commission had been presented to the King yesterday

The report held that the refusal of the Government of North Ireland to appoint a member of the Boundary Commission was a contingency not foreseen at the date of passage of the Act of Parliament implementing the Treaty. If the refusal were maintained, there was no constitutional means under the existing Statute of bringing the Commission into existence. The report raised grave issues. The Government were bound to honour and secure the carrying out of the undoubted intention of Parliament when it ratified the Treaty (Ministerial cheers). The Government earnestly hoped that the Government of North Ireland, even at this late stage, would appoint a Commissioner. If the hope were not fulfilled, the Government would forthwith introduce legislation giving effect to the undoubted intention of the Treaty and would press for passage of this legislation regardless of the consequences to themselves.

Not merely the honour of the Government but the honour of the country was involved in seeing that the obligation imposed on the United Kingdom was fulfilled in the spirit and letter. His colleagues and himself were not prepared to omit any step necessary to place the good faith of Parliament and the people beyond question (Ministerial and Liberal cheers).

Liberal Approval.

The Liberal leader, Mr. Lloyd George, expressed great satisfaction with the announcement. The Opposition would dissent, but he himself and all his colleagues would support the Government measures necessary to make clear to the Empire and the world that the Government were not prepared to shuffle out of a bargain on a mere question of machinery (Liberal cheers).

Colonel Ashley (Conservative) angrily asked if it was an honourable agreement with Ulster.

Mr. Thomas replied that nothing was more disastrous in this issue than passion of feeling.

The Colonial Secretary continued that at the request of the Prime Minister, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, he had invited the President of the Dail Eirann, Mr. Cosgrave, and the Ulster Premier, Sir James Craig, to meet him in London. He still believed that there was a possibility of a peaceful settlement.

Mr. Ronald McNeill (Conservative) asked if Mr. Thomas realized that the Government's assumption that this was a mere drafting oversight was not universal and would be hotly contested.

Prospects of a Fight.

Mr. Thomas said that he was convinced that any legislation on his question would be hotly contested; but it must not be forgotten, he declared, that the Treaty was not merely ratified by Parliament but endorsed at the general election. The legislation would not be introduced until after the meeting between President Cosgrave and Sir James Craig.

Captain Wedgwood Benn (Liberal) asked whether, in the event of the introduction of the bill being necessary, it would be passed in all its stages before the recess.

The Colonial Secretary said that he wanted nothing done to hinder the possibility of a settlement. For him to make such an announcement would have this effect, but he emphasized that no steps would be left untaken to prove to the world conclusively before Parliament rose what the Government intended.

Irish Fears of a Tragedy.

Mr. J. H. Thomas' statement has aroused the keenest anxiety in Ulster and in the Free State. Several of the speakers in the Dail referred to public forebodings of an approaching tragedy, but Mr. O'Higgins, the Free State Minister for Home Affairs, deprecated the tendency to "wax turbulent" at short notice. He declared that this was no case for sudden decisions or jumping at conclusions, which facts did not justify. The Dail adjourned to the 12th instant.

A statement issued by the Ulster Association says that Ulster has already made great sacrifices of territory under the Act of 1920. Sir James Craig has repeatedly intimated his willingness to negotiate with representatives of the Free State on a mutual basis. The statement concludes by saying that without defining the terms of reference of the commission, Mr. MacDonald is asking Ulster to take a leap in the dark.

Irish Leaders Coming to London.

Aug. 2.

Mr. Cosgrave is on his way to London in response to Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's invitation, while the Marquess of Londonderry, who is the Leader of the Ulster Senate, will deputize Sir James Craig, who is incapacitated by illness, at the vital discussions to-day on the Boundary question. The Marquess of Londonderry, who is accompanied by the Ministers of Finance and Labour, interviewed Mr. J. H. Thomas yesterday. The prospect of an agreement issuing from the conversations is generally considered remote. Mr. Cosgrave is likely to urge expeditious action on the part of the Imperial Government in consequence of dangerous resurgence of the Republican movement due to impatience at the delayed settlement of the Boundary arrangement. The attitude of Ulster is based on fears lest Boundary revision be not confined to rectification of the political and religious anomalies along the border and strongly opposes the Free State contention that the Boundary Commission should have wide powers of delimitation which in extreme application mean transfer of whole tracts of territory.

Mr. Cosgrave arrived here to-day and immediately went to Downing Street where he conferred with Mr. Thomas and Mr. MacDonald. The latter left 10 minutes later to preside over a plenary session of the Inter-Allied Conference, which was attended by all representatives of the Dominions.

Mr. Thomas and Mr. Cosgrave continued their conversation at the Colonial Office.

The Acting Premier of North Ireland and Colonel Spender, the Secretary of the North Ireland Cabinet, to-day joined the conference between Mr. Thomas and Mr. Cosgrave at the Colonial Office.

This is the first time that the Irish leaders have conferred since the abortive conference in April.

Failure to Agree?

Later.

The Irish conference broke up without arranging for a future meeting. The conferees are very secretive, but it is believed that they have failed to agree, and, consequently, the Government will proceed with the legislation.—Reuter.

Mr. Cosgrave has returned to Irleand.—Reuter.

Suggestion of Compromises

London, Aug. 4.

The "Westminster Gazette" states that at Saturday's meeting of the Irish Boundary Conference, the Marquess of Londonderry intimated Ulster's willingness to appoint a Boundary Commissioner if provision were made for the Commission's terms of reference to be limited in changes in border to simple frontier rectification.

The Government was not able to give the desired assurance, but offered to refer the matter to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council for definition.

The Marquess of Londonderry was not able to agree, but Mr. Cosgrave was willing.—Reuter.

Colonial Secretary's Visit to Dublin.

London, Aug. 4.

Mr. J. H. Thomas, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, to-day announced in the House of Commons that he was going to Dublin in the evening in consequence of a further communication from Mr. W. T. Cosgrave, President of the Free State Government.

Later.

Mr. Arthur Henderson, the Home Secretary, accompanied by the Colonial Secretary, Mr. J. H. Thomas, has left for Ireland.—Reuter.

Dublin, Aug. 5.

The Conference has concluded and the Colonial Secretary, Mr. J. H. Thomas, and the Home Secretary, Mr. Arthur Henderson, will leave for London by the night mail.

A communiqué says that the question of putting into operation Clause XII was fully discussed, and a statement will be made in the House of Commons to-morrow.—Reuter.

London, Aug. 6.

At a late hour the Dublin correspondent of "The Times" telegraphed that as the result of great pressure by Mr. J. H. Thomas the Free State Government had agreed to a postponement of the second reading in the Imperial Parliament of the Amending Bill as regards the constitution of the Boundary Commission until after the recess.—Reuter.

BILL TO RECTIFY IRISH TREATY

Government's Intention to Keep Faith with Free State: Appeal to the Press

London, Aug. 6.

In the House of Commons to-day, Mr. J. H. Thomas, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, announced that after a very full and frank discussion with the South Irish Government it had been decided to ask Parliament to meet on September 30, unless in the meantime the North Irish Government had nominated a boundary commissioner. The Bill rectifying the treaty was being introduced to-day and would be pressed forward.

Mr. Thomas continued that Mr. Cosgrave wrote to Mr. MacDonald on August 4 stating that after a very full consultation with his colleagues he must urge on the British Government the necessity of passing a bill rectifying the treaty before Parliament adjourned, so as finally to remove the grave doubts and suspicions which had been aroused in the minds of the Irish people by the long delay in appointing a boundary commission. Mr. MacDonald felt that it was impossible to call on Parliament at the end of the session to consider legislation which was certain to be seriously opposed, not merely in the House of Commons but in the House of Lords, without allowing time for reflexion. Therefore he (Mr. Thomas) and Mr. Arthur Henderson had gone to Dublin where they had had a very full and frank discussion with Mr. Cosgrave and his colleagues, as a result of which the Government had decided to ask Parliament to meet on September 30 instead of October 31. The Government on September 30 would move the second reading of the Bill and thereafter use all their power to pass it as law.

Mr. Thomas did not pretend that the Free State Government were satisfied, but hoped that at least they would be able to satisfy the Irish people that the British Government and people meant to keep faith. The Government very earnestly hoped that the North Ireland Government would before September 30 appoint a representative to the commission, thus rendering further progress of the Bill unnecessary.

"Let there be no mistake. The issues are grave, involving the honour and good faith of Britain. They are too serious to be the sport of party controversy." (Cheers and counter-cheers.) He hoped, therefore, that the Press and the people would refrain from action calculated to inflame old prejudices.

Mr. Thomas then formally introduced the Irish Free State Confirmation Bill, which passed its first reading.

A Heated Discussion.

Heat immediately generated. In the ensuing discussion Sir J. Simon (Liberal) asked a series of questions about the advice Mr. Thomas had given to the North Ireland Government. The Speaker evoked Opposition cheers by saying that Sir John Simon's questions sounded like an argument. A Conservative member interjected, "It is unfair; just like them!"

Mr. Ronald McNeill (Conservative), referring to Mr. Thomas's appeal to the Press, asked if Mr. Thomas expected complete silence for the next two months.

Mr. Thomas, replying, emphasized his deep indebtedness to the Free State Government's appreciation of the difficulties. He was therefore entitled to ask sections of the press, which had blazingly announced the imminent proclamation of an Irish Republic, to refrain from encouraging not merely the enemies of the Free State but the enemies of the Empire as well. The Speaker disallowed further questions.—Reuter.

PRINCIPAL AGREEMENTS REACHED AT ALLIED CONFERENCE

Decisions Outlined by British Premier in House of Commons: Tribute to Co-operation of Allied Premiers Delegates and Experts

London, Aug. 1

Members of the Third Committee state that an agreement is within sight now and that the only question is the drafting of certain papers.

The plenary conference to-morrow expects to facilitate the attendance of the Germans on Monday.

Aug. 2.

The plenary session of the Inter-Allied Conference to-day reached an agreement on all points. The terms of invitation of Germany are now being considered.

Later.

Mr. MacDonald to-day sent to the German Embassy an invitation for a German delegation to attend the Inter-Allied Conference.

Later.

A communiqué regarding to-day's plenary session of the Reparations Conference says that it has reached the decisions already telegraphed, and has adopted the report of the First Committee without discussion. The report of the Third Committee was approved after minor emendations. Mr. D. M. Dalal, the High Commissioner for India, represented the Dominions, Sir James Allen, the High Commissioner for New Zealand, and Sir Edgar Walton, the High Commissioner for the Union of South Africa, being unavoidably absent.

The jurists up to the present have not yet decided whether the decision of the reparation commission shall be unanimous or majority decisions.

Mr. MacDonald has sent an invitation to Germany expressing the hope that the German delegation will arrive in London at an early date.

Appended to the communiqué are the reports of the first and third jurists' committees, the substance of which has already been cabled —Reuter.

The German Delegation.

Berlin, Aug. 2.

The German delegation will leave for London on Monday. It is headed by Herr Marx, the Chancellor, Dr. Stresemann, the Foreign Minister, and Herr Luther, the Finance Minister, and is accompanied by representatives of Prussia and Bavaria.—Reuter.

Proposed Method of Coping with German Default

London, Aug. 3.

The most important sections in the report of the First Committee provide that if German default is reported under the Dawes scheme, the matter shall go before the Reparations Commission with an American member added. If the Commission does not reach an unanimous decision, any Commissioner may appeal within eight days to an arbitral tribunal consisting of an American as president and two other independent and impartial persons whose decision shall be final. The members of the tribunal shall be nominated for five years by unanimous decision of the Reparations Commission or, failing that, by the President of the World Court of Justice at the Hague. There can be no question of sanctions unless default is decided through this machinery. Once default is registered the Allies shall confer as to the nature of sanctions and the method of effective application. The service of the £40,000,000 loan to Germany is to enjoy absolute priority.

The Third Committee recommends, inter alia, that Germany shall be asked to accept the proposal for the establishment of a committee of an equal number of Allied representatives and Germans with power to coopt a neutral in the event of a difference to ensure observance of Reparations deliveries and commercial contracts and also provides machinery to prevent defects in the working of the plan for German payments and for detection of fraud in deliveries through German financial manœuvres. Provision is made for the Reparations Commission plus an American member to have the right to make any necessary modification in the Dawes scheme on the application of any interested Government. If it is not unanimous or if the decision is not acceptable to Germany, the matter may be referred to an arbitral committee as in the case of German default.

It is commonly expected that the German Delegation will immediately raise the question of the occupation of the Ruhr and the retention of 4,000 French and Belgian railwaymen there.—Reuter.

French Tribute to British Premier

Paris, Aug. 3.

The Premier, M. Herriot, interviewed by the London correspondent of the "Petit Parisien," attributed the success of the Inter-Allied Conference primarily to Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, who, he said, had shown himself a great statesman.

The future would show that decisions had been taken which were not only in conformity with the interests of Britain, but were likely powerfully to promote the cause of peace. Very complete cordiality had prevailed throughout the conversations and they felt that peace was now possible. It was now for Germany to show herself equally wise and bring about the final re-establishment of peace in Europe.—Reute.

London, Aug. 4.

The concord established by the Allied Conference is greeted with expressions of sober satisfaction by the London press. It is recognized that there has been much give and take. Some of the proposals are regarded as complicated but sight is not lost of the fact that there are still great obstacles to be overcome in the discussions with Germany before a complete understanding can be reached.—Reuter.

London, Aug. 4.

In the House of Commons to-day, outlining the decisions of the Allied Conference, Mr. MacDonald said that various safeguards had been taken to secure all parties against decisions which could be regarded as partial or unjust. All the Allied Governments hoped that the effect of the agreement would be to create a new spirit of co-operation on both sides, so that some points that might have still to be left open owing to the impossibility of settling them in the present state of the public mind might become negotiable by a change of that mind. The Allied representatives hoped to confer with the German representatives to-morrow.

The Prime Minister said that it was proposed at present to execute three agreements: (1) between Germany and the Reparations Commission in regard to matters within the latter's competence; (2) between the Allies and Germany regarding matters requiring direct agreement; and (3) between the Allies themselves regulating matters of inter-Allied concern.

Mr. Macdonald concluded by paying a tribute to the spirit of loyal co-operation of the Allied Premiers and other delegates and experts.

Mr. MacDonald stated that the Conference had agreed to elaborate a series of stipulations with a view to restoring the fiscal and economic unity of Germany, including restoration of the full powers of the German administration regarding the Customs, commerce and railways, which was to come into full operation not later than October 15; and also a reciprocal amnesty for acts done by individuals in consequence of the events which had taken place since November 1, 1923. He added that disputed interpretations of the experts' report and the Conference agreement would be referred to the Committee of Jurists. The Government had agreed that in the event of taking sanctions they must act as trustees for all interests created by the experts' report and, especially, not damage the security of the loan.

In Case of Default by Germany

Questioned regarding the action the Governments might take with reference to sanctions in the event of a declaration of default, Mr. MacDonald said that matters remained as left in the Treaty of Versailles; namely, when the Governments failed to agree it was possible for them to pursue their own policy. It was obviously very unsatisfactory (Opposition cheers), but the whole situation would be eased if they could get the state of unanimity necessary before a default could be declared. Members might rest assured that the question of sanctions was not likely to arise in a hurry. The loan would not be floated under the auspices of the Governments or the responsibility of the Governments, and the bankers must consult German representatives in regard to security before they could definitely say whether they would float it.

Replying to Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. MacDonald emphatically adhered to the view of the late Government that France's separate action was not sanctioned by the Treaty of Versailles. He declared that the Spa Agreement with reference to the proportion of reparations deliveries of the various Allies had not been disturbed.

Later.

The principal representatives at the Inter-Allied Conference to-day discussed the procedure to be adopted at the forthcoming meeting with the Germans. It was decided that America, Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan and Belgium should each nominate two ministers to discuss every outstanding question with two German Ministers, each Prime Minister or chief delegate always to attend together with the chief diplomatic or financial lieutenant as the occasion demands. Only one expert will be allowed to present each case, but others may be in attendance.—Reuter.

Mr. Hughes in Germany

Belin, Aug. 4.

On the eve of their departure for London, Herr Marx and Dr. Stresemann met the United States Secretary of State, Mr. Hughes, at a luncheon which President Ebert gave in honour of the visitor. Other prominent German politicians were also present.

Mr. Hughes is visiting Potsdam to-day. He will sail for America from Bremen in the evening.

The Berlin papers welcomed Mr. Hughes in flattering terms and expressed the hope that his short visit would benefit Germany.—Reuter.

Berlin, Aug. 4.

The German Delegation left for the London Conference this morning.—Reuter.

GERMAN DELEGATES IN LONDON

Prepared to Proceed with Draft Bills to Carry Out Dawes Report

London, Aug. 5.

Herr Mark, Dr. Stresemann and the other German delegates have arrived in London.

The party numbers about 40. The Chancellor, interviewed by Reuter's representative, said: "We have come with a sincere desire to assist in finding the best method of putting the Dawes report into action unaltered and in the spirit of its author. We wish to see the report carried through as soon as possible and intend contributing our part towards its loyal fulfilment. We do not doubt that we shall find the same spirit prevailing in London. If that is the case then it may safely be assumed that we will speedily come to an agreement."—Reuter.

Later.

The second stage of the Inter-Allied Conference opened at Downing Street at noon to-day.

The Allied delegates were joined by half-a-dozen German representatives, whose arrival was watched by crowds.

The conference lasted three-quarters of an hour and was purely formal. Mr. MacDonald, welcoming the Germans, hoped that it would be possible to hold the final conference on Friday.

Mr. MacDonald emphasized that the only business of the conference was to deal with the Dawes report and hoped that, by a spirit of co-operation, a successful conclusion would be reached very soon.

Herr Marx, speaking in German, said that upon the success of the conference depended the fate of Germany and Europe.

Goodwill and thorough sincerity were necessary for success. The German delegation proposed to negotiate in that spirit.

Herr Marx confirmed that the German Government regarded the Dawes report as a suitable basis for the solution of the reparations question and said that they were prepared to proceed with draft bills to carry out the report. If the conference succeeded, the German people would devote their whole strength to carrying out the obligations involved in this report.

The Occupation of the Ruhr.

Mr. Lloyd George, in the House of Commons, to-day, requested further information on a number of "serious points," in connexion with the Inter-Allied Conference, notably whether the report was true that France would remain in the Ruhr for two years. He declared that it was important to know not only whether we were going to evacuate Cologne, but whether another Power was going to send troops there, and thus make matters much worse. Mr. Lloyd George further asked whether France still claimed the right to take separate action.

Mr. MacDonald, in reply, declared that he would consult Parliament in the event of any serious question arising subsequent to the sittings of the Conference, but he did not anticipate that any serious question would arise, and also that any agreement reached would be unacceptable to Parliament. Consequently, the Premier said, the House might go on its holidays, and leave the Conference to do its work.

Mr. MacDonald, in conclusion, argued that the safeguards were so complete that if the stage of sanctions were reached there would probably be unanimity upon them. As regards the military evacuation of the Ruhr, he did not believe that French public opinion would be blind to the obligations placed upon it by the declarations of its own Government, and declared that no British soldier would remain in Cologne a minute longer than was necessary to carry out the obligations imposed upon us by the Peace Treaty.

A very good impression was created by the German Delegation at their first meeting with the plenary Conference. The speech of Herr Marx is regarded as tactful and conciliatory.—Reuter.

Request for Discussion of Military Evacuation and Rhineland Railways

London, Aug. 6.

It is learned that the covering letter with the German reply presented to the Allied Conference this morning urges that the questions of military evacuation and Rhineland railways, which the Conference has not dealt with, ought to be discussed.

It is understood that these matters are now being examined outside the Conference by the Allied representative.

Later.

The Allied Council of Fourteen to-day considered the report of the conversations between the Germans and the Allies with reference to the German memorandum.

The report is described as distinctly encouraging in character, and as narrowing down considerably the number of points which require handling.—Reuter.

10TH ANNIVERSARY OF OUTBREAK OF WAR

Germany's Day of Remembrance: Silent Tribute to Fallen Warriors

Berlin, Aug. 3.

The 10th anniversary of the outbreak of the War was celebrated all over Germany as a day of remembrance to the fallen. The flags on all public buildings in Berlin were half-masted.

President Ebert, accompanied by members of the Cabinet, addressed a huge meeting from the steps of the Reichstag, in which he declared that Germany 10 years ago had resorted to arms solely in defence of the Fatherland. He adjured Germans to rehabilitate the Fatherland. Military bands then played the funeral march, after which two minutes' silence was observed. Flags were then hoisted on the tops of poles.

The police arrested several communists who created a disturbance by singing the "International" and scattering revolutionary pamphlets. —Reuter.

THE TREATY OF MUTUAL ASSISTANCE

Holland Unwilling to Support Present Proposal of League of Nations

The Hague, Aug. 5.

The Foreign Minister, in his reply to the League of Nations declining to support the proposed mutual guarantee pact, says that the Government will aim to strengthen the legal guarantees of the League of Nations, but it does not feel justified in supporting the present proposal to create an organization based on power instead of on right, and likely to lead to international complications instead of strengthening the principle of unity and co-operation. —Reuter.

ANGLO-SOVIET AGREEMENT REACHED

Commercial and General Treaty Combined: Russia's Liability to Bondholders: Admission to Export Credit Scheme: Property Claims and Compensation

London, Aug. 2.

M. Rakovsky, the Soviet representative, has returned to London, and resumed negotiations.—Reuter.

London, Aug. 4.

It is reported that an important economic and financial agreement was concluded at this morning's plenary meeting of the Anglo-Soviet Conference under which Russia undertakes to pay £28,000,000 out of her debts to Britain.—Reuter.

London, Aug. 5.

The following communiqué was issued by the Foreign Office this morning:—

"The Anglo-Soviet Conference, having sat in committee during the whole of Saturday and Sunday, met in full session on Monday at noon and sat until 7.15 this morning. As the Soviet Delegation was unable to accept the amendments and concessions offered with regard to Article 14 of the draft Treaty, no aggreement was reached. The negotiations broke down and the Treaty will not be signed."—Reuter.

Later.

Reuter's Agency learns that the Russian delegation contended that Art. 14 would leave the way open for demanding complete recognition by the Soviet of their liability to compensate for nationalized property as a matter of right. The delegates declared that the Soviet had rejected the principle involved as far back as the Genoa Conference, but they had now made certain concessions, although their attitude was generally unaltered. The breakdown means that the other miscellaneous questions discussed will also remain unsettled.

Later.

Notwithstanding the gloomy communiqué issued by the Foreign Office relative to the breakdown of the Anglo-Soviet conference, it is noteworthy that none of the Russians have as yet arranged to leave. Observers in London state that it is probable the breakdown is in no way so definite and complete as at first thought.

Aug. 6.

The news of the break-up of the Anglo-Russian Conference has not caused surprise and does not evoke much regret. It was even received with gratification in some quarters. —Reuter.

London, Aug. 6.

In the House of Commons to-day, Mr. Arthur Ponsonby, the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, who was greeted with Ministerial cheers as he rose, declared that a settlement had finally been reached with the Russians this afternoon.

The first intimation of the settlement was made by Mr. J. R. Clynes, Lord Privy Seal, who apologized for Mr. Ponsonby's inability to make the promised statement at the moment because modifications were necessary owing to the fact that the Russians had signed at the last moment.

Mr. Ponsonby, subsequently announcing the agreement, stated that a commercial treaty and a general treaty were involved. An unusual departure in connexion with the commercial treaty was that we took account of the Soviet's monopoly of foreign trade and granted to a limited number of trade delegations diplomatic immunity for themselves and for the existing office of the Trade Delegation.

Debts and claims had occupied the chief place in the negotiations. The Government had been faced with the Soviet decrees of repudiation of nationalization, while we were determined that the legitimate rights of British citizens should be recognized.

The general treaty, Mr. Ponsonby said, contained the Soviet admission of liability to bondholders and an assurance that the Soviet would negotiate with bondholders (loud Opposition laughter), and he believed that they were in process of negotiating with a very considerable number.

The commercial treaty conferred on Britain most favoured nation treatment, in return for which Britain admitted Russia into the export credit scheme.

Mr. Ponsonby, dealing with the general treaty, stated that both sides would appoint members to a commission which would investigate property claims and deal with the question of compensation. When the bondholders were satisfied and the British Government were satisfied regarding the lump sum for miscellaneous claims and when there was an agreed settlement regarding the property claims these agreements would be embodied in a subsequent treaty arising from which the Government would submit to Parliament a proposal for guaranteeing a loan to the Soviet. Meanwhile both Government debts and intervention respecting claims would be put into cold storage. He hoped that the treaty would be signed to-morrow.

Settlement on Broad Lines.

The speaker went on to say that the question of the definition of territorial waters must be left for international settlement, but we had secured a satisfactory fisheries agreement.

Mr. Ponsonby paid a tribute to M. Rakovsky's intense wish to reach a settlement, He declared that the Government had not attempted to reach a settlement in figures, but to establish machinery with a view to reaching the necessary settlement. He declared further that the settlement was an instance of the Government's international policy to avoid acrimonious discussion on petty points, and to seek settlement on broad lines, based on conciliation and co-operation so as to convince European peoples that the Government at least were using their power to establish peace and brotherhood.

"An Utter Farce."

Later.

The speeches made in the House of Commons to-day in the Russian debate were mostly ironical in character. Mr. Ronald McNeill (Conservative) congratulated Mr. Ponsonby on the fact that four months' onerous negotiations had resulted in the information that the Soviet and the bondholders had agreed to negotiate. He said the whole thing was an utter farce, and the promise to guarantee a loan was a scandal.

Mr. Lloyd George complained of the lack of information, and twitted Mr. Ponsonby on going to sign to-morrow something of which he had not the ghost of an idea to-night. He asked how much of the debts we were going to write down, and what was the extent of the proposed loan. He declared that the Liberals would oppose the proposal to guarantee a loan which we would not grant to any other of the Allies.

The debate on the Russian question in the House of Commons was adjourned till to-morrow on the pressure of the Opposition, who contended that the debate showed that the House opposed the agreement, which ought not to be signed until the House had seen the text.

Scorn and Derision.

London, Aug. 7.

A scornful reception has been given to the proposed Anglo-Soviet treaties both inside the House of Commons and outside.

Mr. Ponsonby's speech was several times interrupted by derisive laughter.

Mr. Lloyd George's unsparing denunciation of the treaty, which he described as a fake, finds considerable, though apparently not unanimous, party support. The Conservatives, on the other hand, are united in condemnation of the treaty.

Adjournment of the debate was pressed to enable Mr. MacDonald to attend and address the House to-day.

A peculiar fact was that, subsequent to Mr. Ponsonby's speech in the House of Commons, Viscount Haldane, the Lord Chancellor, questioned by Marquess Curzon in the House of Lords, professed ignorance that any agreements had been reached.

The Government's only friends in the morning press are the "Daily News," which is mildly sympathetic, and the "Daily Herald," which is in high feather.—Reuter.

GOVERNMENT DEFEAT THREATENED

Consternation in the House

Later.

The official announcement of the Anglo-Soviet negotiations on Tuesday was followed by the official announcement of their success yesterday evening, but when Mr. Ponsonby stated the terms of the agreement surprise was succeeded by mystification.

Parliament had met for the penultimate day. It was a remarkable session. Members were under the impression that the Russian Conference after its final all-night session had resulted in a hopeless breakdown.

Suddenly Mr. Clynes announced early in the evening that an agreement had been reached and signed. The House gasped. Mr. Clynes's statement was subsequently denied and re-affirmed in the lobbies. Messages flew between the House of Commons and the Foreign Office and a report came back that the resumed Conference was still sitting and that a conclusion had not been reached.

Later in the evening Mr. Ponsonby arrived at the House from Whitehall. He announced that an agreement had been reached. It had been a race against time. He was obviously ill at ease whilst explaining the nature of the preliminary agreements designed to lead to the ultimate agreements.

The Government will probably resign if it is defeated in the debate on the Russian Treaty to-day.—Reuter.

THE NAVAL BASE AT SINGAPORE

Another Unsuccessful Attempt to Reverse the Decision of the Government

London, July 30.

The Conservatives have made another attempt to reverse the Singapore decision. Mr. L. S. Amery (Conservative) in the House of Commons to-day, moving a reduction of the naval vote as a protest against the naval programme of the Government, urged a comprehensive scheme of replacement and reversal of the decision as regards Singapore. He said that the importance of Singapore did not lie in the Pacific, but in the Indian Ocean, which it would effectually cover from outside invasion.

Lieut.-Commander Kenworthy (Liberal) thought that the Government was absolutely right. He believed that there was a liberal-democratic movement in Japan which would respond to an invitation to a disarmament conference.

Commander Bellairs (Conservative) said he was of the opinion that if we were to bear this burden of armaments, the Dominions ought to help us.

Mr. Ammon, Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Admiralty, stated that the Premier was fully occupied with other matters, but as soon as possible every step would be taken to convene an international conference. Meanwhile the Government would maintain what it considered the right margin of safety, without doing anything which might be considered provocative.

Mr. Ammon said that all the signatories to the Washington agreement had abided by it. Nobody had made a greater reduction than Britain. He saw no reason for revision of the Singapore decision. He denied that there was strong feeling in Australia, where, he said, there was a division of opinion on the matter. Mr. Ammon pointed out that in view of the distance between Australia and Japan, it was not so easy for the latter to wreak her will on Australia as might be thought. He said that Singapore gave Mr. MacDonald something to bargain with and failing a satisfactory decision we should regretfully have to establish a base.

Mr. Amery's motion was negatived by 226 votes to 182.—Reuter.

ENGLISHWOMAN SHOT DEAD IN MEXICO

The Gallant Mrs. Evans Foully Murdered: Villains Escape with $2,000 Booty

Mexico City, Aug. 4.

Mrs. Evans, the woman who was at the bottom of the Anglo-Mexican trouble which led to the withdrawal of Mr. Cummins, the British Chargé d'Affaires, from Mexico, was shot dead yesterday at Texmelucan, Puebla, on the road leading to her hacienda. The murderers are believed to be Agrarians spurred on by anti-foreign agitators. She was shot in the left side and fell from her wagon. Her hair was caught in the wheels and the body was dragged some distance and her face was badly mutilated. Herr Strauss, the German manager of the estate, was seriously injured. The assailants escaped with a payroll of $2,000.—Reuter's American Service.

United States Authorities Conducting a Thorough Investigation

The Federal troops and the mounted police are scouring the territory in the vicinity of Mrs. Evans' ranch for the murderers, It is officially thought that the attack was made solely from motives of robbery, and was not due to agrarian agitation to force her consent to a division of the ranch. —Reuter's American Service.

Washington, Aug. 4.

London, Aug. 4.

In the House of Commons to-day Mr. Ramsay MacDonald was warmly bombarded with questions regarding the Government's intentions in connexion with the murder of Mrs. Evans. The Premier declared that the United States Chargé d'Affaires at Mexico City was taking up the matter with the Mexican Government. He was requesting all possible information and the House could depend on his acting on it when he got it, but he was not able to say what could be done until full information had been received.—Reuter.

Motive Not Robbery: Several Suspects Arrested: A Case for Compensation

London, Aug. 5.

In the House of Commons to-day, questioned again relative to the murder of Mrs. Evans, Mr. MacDonald said that an officer of the British Legion who had been sent to the ranch to investigate had reported that the motive had not been robbery and that the Mexican Government were acting energetically and had made a number of arrests. Mr. MacDonald had informed the British Ambassador in Washington that the Mexican Government should be made to realize their responsibility for this tragic occurrence. A claim would certainly be made for suitable compensation. —Reuter.

SATURDAY'S TELEGRAMS

DEBATE ON ANGLO-RUSSIAN TREATY

Premier's Anxiety for Immediate Signature: Promise to Lay Treaties before Parliament for Acceptance, Rejection or Amendment

Lonon, Aug. 7.

Parliament, which should have adjourned yesterday, was forced to meet to-day in consequence of the vigorous Conservative and Liberal opposition to the Russian treaty yesterday evening.

At the outset of the debate to-day the Opposition secured a ruling by the Speaker that the abortive draft treaty on which the Russian negotiations broke down must be published.

Sir Robert Horne (Conservative) evoked angry Ministerial cries and Opposition cheers by urging that the agreed draft treaty should not be signed till Parliament had reassembled.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald said that he wished to sign the treaty to-day. The Prime Minster emphasized that signature of the treaty did not involve the sanction of the House of Commons. The Government pledged themselves to produce the treaties and lay them before Parliament for acceptance or rejection. They were anxious that not a clause, provision or line of the treaties should be operative until the House had sanctioned them. The House, in fairness, ought to allow the agreement to be signed; otherwise an extraordinary and intolerable precedent would be established. He could not assent to it. The Opposition were unable to point to a single thing that would come into operation as the result of the mere signature of the Govenment to the treaty.

The whole Liberal front bench, including Mr. Lloyd George, left the House at this point, presumably to consult regarding their attitude.

The Premier's Pledge.

Mr. MacDonald, after pointing out that the House had had to accept or reject the Lausanne Treaty as it stood, gave a pledge that the Government would not follow the Lausanne precedent. They would not insert a clause that every word, line and provision of the present treaty must be accepted en bloc or rejected altogether. The House could amend, consider, pass or reject what had been done.

The Prime Minister particularly urged the Conservatives not, rashly on the last day of the session, to set a precedent in regard to the negotiations.

Mr. E. D. Morel (Labour) said that the whole of the Labour Members enthusiastically supported the Prime Minister in refusing to be placed in a position of inferiority in negotiations as compared with his predecessors. He characterized Mr. Lloyd George's attitude in attacking the treaty and pretending to sympathize with the Russian people as revolting.

Sir Robert Horne stated that the world's belief that the signature of British Ministers would be confirmed by the House of Commons obviously did not appertain to the case of a minority Government.

Mr. MacDonald interrupted, pointing out that he had pledged that this treaty could be amended.

Mr. Jowitt (Liberal), while criticizing the treaty, indicated that the Liberals were not likely to support the Conservatives in their effort to delay the signature.

The Prime Minister then left the House.

Mr. Clynes asserted the constitutional right of the Government to complete the initial stage in an honest endeavour to restore Anglo-Russian relations. He appealed to the House to pass to adjournment discussion.

Later.

The Russian debate fizzled out when Mr. Lloyd George supported the appeal of Mr. Clynes to discuss adjournment.

Mr. Lloyd George said that the grounds for yesterday evening's adjournment had been complied with when the Prime Minister stated that the treaties would be available to the House of Commons. He therefore supported Mr. Clynes's appeal that the House should discuss adjournment.

The House of Commons thereupon passed the third reading of the Consolidated Fund Bill, finally passing the financial provisions for the year.

It is unlikely that any vote as regards Russia that the Opposition may press during the adjournment debate will have any political significance, even if the Liberals support the Conservatives, which is unlikely; consequently the Russian debate is virtually dead. A vote is unlikely.

Parliament Adjourned

London, Aug. 7.

Parliament has adjourned until September 30.—Reuter.

Later.

Parliament adjourned after a brief resumption of the Russian debate initiated by Mr. Lloyd George, who challenged Mr. Ponsonby, to state a single subject of dispute settled by this so-called treaty, and opposed guaranteeing a loan to Russia.

Mr. Ponsonby replied that the agreement secured for the House of Commons every right and safeguard. They were making a satisfactory beginning by establishing machinery giving an inducement to the Soviet Government to settle rapidly, because not a penny would be guaranteed until all points of the agreement had been settled.

Asked what would be the amount of the loan, Mr. Ponsonby replied that loan negotiations would only be possible after a second treaty. He was unable to give the House any idea what it would be. It was for the Government to judge the amount when liabilities had been satisfied.

The Russian Point of View

M. Rakovsky, interviewed to-day, said that the treaty was an immense step forward. It was the first time that the Soviet Government had given its pledge to satisfy the interests of the different categories of British claimants who had lost by the revolution. He said that it was a profound mistake to consider the proposed loan as a concession entirely favouring Russia. Without it any extension of Anglo-Russian trade would be impossible; but the political side of the treaty was far more important than the economic. It renewed Anglo-Russian friendship on a solid foundation.

Mackerel to Catch Sprat.

Later.

A study of the text of the proposed Treaties with the Soviet led to the conclusion in several quarters that they are more in the nature of agreements to try to arrange Treaties than treaties. Renewed opposition to their ratification is certain on the reassembling of Parliament.—Reuter.

The news leaked out whereupon protests were raised. Meanwhile, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, advised of the efforts of the French Ministry, decided to renew the pourparlers with the Russians.—Reuter.

FROM THE FOUR WINDS

A NEW RECORD IN AMERICAN POLITICAL CONVENTIONS

The Great Democratic Fight: Sixteen Days of Unparalleled Bitterness and Discord: Powerful Influence of the Ku Klux Klan

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Washington, July 10.

For 16 days the attention of the American people has been rivetted upon the Democratic National Convention, the most turbulent, bitterly contested, and in every way most extraordinary political convention in the history of the country. A keen struggle for the presidential nomination had been fully expected, but the constant succession of disorderly and often riotous scenes, due to unbridled ambition and religious animosities, was wholly unlooked for.

The opening of the Convention was not inauspicious from a party standpoint, Senator Harrison, of Missi-sippi, and Senator Walsh, of Montana, the temporary and permanent chairmen, rousing the delegates, alternates and 16,000 spectators to a high pitch of enthusiasm by their denunciation of the "impotence and corruption" of the Republican party, a corruption that had compelled the indictment of President Harding's Secretary of the Interior, and forced the resignation of the Attorney-General and the Secretary of the Navy, who had retained their portfolios when Mr. Coolidge became President. The opening speakers furnished other material for the use of the party in the coming campaign in their comments upon the Finance Bill, which, notwithstanding the Republican majority in both Houses of Congress, was in the main a Democratic bill, forced upon the Republicans by the Democrats, with the aid of the farm bloc, the bill recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury being contemptuously rejected.

The League of Nations.

The discussion of the platform brought up the first controversial question in the League of Nations. The Democratic party is so fully committed to the League, which formed the principal plank in its platform in 1920, and holds the memory of President Wilson in such affectionate regard that the number of delegates favourable to taking a distinctly backward step was very small. But in the oft-quoted words of President Cleveland it was a condition and not a theory, by which the Convention was confronted. It has always been maintained by the party leaders and conceded by many Republicans that the election of 1920 with its seven million majority for Mr. Harding was no conclusive test of the sentiment of the country regarding the entrance of the United States into the League. There was a strong pro-League sentiment among Republicans, and a number of the foremost men in the party, including ex-President Taft, ex-Attorney-General Wickersham, Mr. Elihu Root, President Lowell of Harvard, and others equally influential, urged that fact upon Mr. Harding, who replied that he was not opposed to the League on principle, and that if elected he would endeavour to bring about an association of nations that would serve the same purpose as the League. That, however, he never did and never attempted to do. But he had gained his point. Republicans favourable to the League were given the assurance that they might consistently vote for Mr. Harding, as an association of nations, with the United States in the leading rôle, would surely come. The consequence was that practically the entire pro-League wing of the party gave Mr. Harding their votes.

No Clear Issue Again.

History will not exactly repeat itself at the forthcoming election, but there will still be Republicans whose party allegiance will not allow them to vote for Democrats. Furthermore, prohibition, the financial policy of the Government, the demands of organized labour and of the farmers, and other questions will so divide public attention with the League that once more there will be no definite expression of public opinion regarding one of the greatest questions submitted to the electorate.

The National Committee wrestled with the problem for many hours, a majority of its members finally agreeing upon a plank reaffirming the faith of the party in the League as an agency for the promotion of international peace, but expressing the desirability of taking the question of the relation of the United States to the League out of politics, and submitting it to the American people in the form of a referendum. Seven members of the Committee headed by Mr. Newton D. Baker, Secretary of War in the Wilson cabinet, who made the only really great speech at the Convention, presented a minority report, urging the immediate entrance of the United States into the League, upon such conditions as the President with the advice of the Senate might deem proper. The question was argued in the Convention more ably and more temperately than any other that had come before it, and in the end the plank recommending a referendum was carried by 742½ votes to 353½.

The K. K. K.

The Convention passed at once from the promotion of international peace to the provocation of national strife. As readers of the "North-China Daily News" are doubtless aware, there has come into existence in the last few years an oath-bound secret order known as the Ku Klux Klan, that is anti-Catholic, anti-Hebrew, anti-negro, and anti-foreign-born. The constitution declares these four classes of persons, numbering (without allowing for duplications) about 45 millions, unfit to hold political office of any kind. The order, which is said to have a million members, is extremely aggressive. In all their public appearances, usually at night, the members are masked and hooded, and with the exception of the principal officers, who bear fantastic titles, they are unknown and unidentifiable. Calling themselves the Invisible Empire they terrorize entire communities, driving peaceable citizens from their homes at dead of night, and committing still more serious crimes.

Although the organization is utterly at variance with the spirit of American institutions and is regarded by the great mass of the American people as a grave menace to the country, the Republican Convention entirely ignored it. No such course, however, was open to the Democrats, on account of the large Catholic and foreign-born element in the party, especially in the great cities of the eastern states. At the Convention the problem narrowed itself down to the question whether the Klan should be denounced by name or should the Convention content itself with condemning secret societies setting class against class. A majority of the National Committee favoured the latter course, submitting a plank reaffirming the principles of religious liberty, insisting upon obedience at all times to the orderly processes of law, and condemning any effort to arouse religious or racial dissensions.

A One Vote Majority.

The submission of this plank to the Convention created a tremendous uproar, which was intensified when a minority report was submitted retaining the plank offered by the majority, but adding to it a declaration condemning secret political societies and pledging the party to oppose any effort on the part of the Ku Klux Klan or any other organization to interfere with the religious liberty or political freedom or to limit the civic rights of any citizen or body of citizens because of religion, birthplace or racial origin. For four hours the alternative planks were argued, while 18,000 men and women howled and shrieked and screamed and fought like Bedlam let loose. Never before had the famous Madison Square Garden witnessed such a scene nor can the entire history of political gatherings show its parallel. For four hours the tumult continued until at two o'clock on Sunday morning a vote was taken and it was found that the majority report, omitting any reference to the Klan by name, had been carried by a majority of one. As about 400 of the 1,098 votes are authoritatively stated to have been controlled by the Klan the wonder is that the vote was so close. There is a story that a woman who was opposed to the Klan but was reluctantly persuaded at the last moment to vote for the majority report was heart-broken when she discovered that her vote had turned the scale.

The Spirit of Bitterness.

Although the plank adopted by the Convention condemns unequivocally the principles of the Klan, the fact that a still stronger plank was rejected put the Klan in the position of having gained a notable victory, and the anti-Klan in that of having sustained an equally notable defeat. Accordingly the adjournment over Sunday did nothing to allay the bitterness that had been engendered, and when the Convention assembled on Monday there was an entire absence of the spirit that should have animated the representatives of a great party seeking to choose from among 16 candidates the man most likely to lead them to victory.

For many months it had been recognized that Mr. William Gibbs McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury for six years in the Wilson administration and President Wilson's son-in-law, and Governor Alfred E. Smith, the idol of the New York Democracy, would be the leading candidates for the Democratic nomination for the presidency. While not known to have been officially endorsed by the Klan, Mr. McAdoo had secured in advance the support of nearly all the States in which the Klan is strongest.

On the other hand, Governor Smith is a Roman Catholic and an anti-prohibitionist, both of which facts were in his favour rather than against him in the group of populous states of which New York is the centre. But the mere fact of the Governor's candidacy enraged the Klan and anti-Catholics in general; so both sides were embittered, and notwithstanding the fact that the Governor and Mr. McAdoo were certain to control between them four-fifths of the total number of votes, it was freely predicted before the voting began that neither of them could be nominated. No such idea, however, possessed either of the two candidates or the great mass of their loyal supporters. It took nine days and 103 ballots to bring them to a realization of the folly of continuing the struggle.

Mr. Bryan's Blunders.

The balloting began on Monday morning, June 30, the first vote giving Mr. McAdoo 431½ and Governor Smith 240½, with 426 votes distributed among 14 other candidates, in many cases by way of compliment. Fifteen ballots were taken that day, the last giving Mr. McAdoo 479 and Governor Smith 305½, the scattering vote falling to 313½.

On leaving the hall that night the delegates read in extra editions of the newspapers an interview given out during the afternoon by Senator Reed, of Missouri, who from a sickbed had vigorously denounced one of the leading candidates, declaring that, should the candidate alluded to be nominated, the Democratic party might find itself in the position of having to conduct its campaign from a federal courtroom, the candidate being almost certain to be indicted on a serious criminal charge. The following day the McAdoo vote dropped to 415½. That afternoon Mr. W. J. Bryan made what was considered the greatest mistake he ever made in a life so many people regard as abounding in political blunders. He obtained permission to address the Convention in the interest of harmony, and then made a speech strongly supporting Mr. McAdoo. His speech provoked an outburst of rage. Abuse was heaped upon him, men shook their fists at him and at times he had difficulty in making himself heard, the interruptions almost culminating in a riot.

After three days' fruitless balloting, suggestions began to be made to put an end to the deadlock. One was an adjournment of the convention to some other city. Another was that after each ballot the candidate having the fewest votes should be dropped. A third proposed the abrogation of the two-thirds majority rule and the substitution for it of a rule requiring only a majority of the votes of the delegates to nominate a candidate. All these suggestions, however, were so obviously in the interest of Mr. McAdoo that they failed of adoption.

The final ballots of the following three days (the 61st, 70th and 77th) gave Mr. McAdoo 469½, 526½ and 513, and Governor Smith 335½, 334½ and 367, the scattering vote falling to 118.

So grave had the situation now become that that night and the following day (Sunday) a conference of the party leaders was held in the hope of finding a way out of the increasing embarrassment. At this conference 15 of the 16 candidates, all of them, except Mr. McAdoo, released their supporters from their pledges, "as completely as if the names (of the candidates) had been withdrawn." When the Convention reassembled on Monday Mr. McAdoo was still obdurate, but his vote fell to 333½, while that of Governor Smith rose to 361½.

The Beginning of the End.

The following day, or rather at 2.40 on Wednesday morning, Mr. McAdoo finally released his supporters, his vote having fallen to 190, or little more than half that of Governor Smith. That was the beginning of the end. The same ballot, the 100th, had seen the vote of Mr. John W. Davis rise to 203½, and despite the paradoxical behaviour of a number of delegates who did not know their own minds, the ex-Ambassador's nomination at the next session was practically assured.

When the delegates reassembled it was easy to see that the battle was over. The large number of lady delegates who had been among Mr. McAdoo's most faithful and noisiest supporters were meekness itself. The 101st ballot gave Mr. Davis 316 votes and Senator Underwood 229½, Mr. McAdoo having only 52. The 102nd ballot saw the Davis vote rise to 415 and the Underwood vote to 307, that of Mr. McAdoo falling to 21. Whether the 21 included the men who were going to follow their leader "until Hell froze over" I have no means of knowing.

The 103rd and decisive ballot gave Mr. Davis 818 votes, Senator Underwood 109½, and Mr. McAdoo 11½. On its announcement, Mr. Davis's nomination was made unanimous. The delegates were so exhausted physically and many of them so impoverished in pocket that there is little doubt that had Mr. Davis been for any reason unavailable, the choice of the Convention would have fallen upon Senator Underwood, notwithstanding that he is not only opposed to the Ku Klux Klan, but is also favourable to a modification of the prohibition law.

Convention's Choice Approved.

Except in agricultural, labour and socialistic circles—important exceptions, it must be admitted—the choice of the Convention has been everywhere applauded.

But the political disaffection that recently overspread the western states shows no signs of abatement, and moreover the Convention was formally notified that unless Mr. McAdoo was nominated union labour would support Senator La Follette, who was nominated as a Progressive by a group of radicals who met at Cleveland at the very time the Democrats were assembled at New York. The only thing for the Democrats to do therefore was to give Mr. Davis a radical 'running mate' in the person of the candidate for the vice-presidency. And in the choice it has made the Convention has subjected itself to as much ridicule as it won commendation by the selection of its candidate for the presidency. How far the delegates were moved by a desire to conciliate Mr. W. J. Bryan, who had declared in advance that the nomination of Mr. Davis would be a calamity, it is hard to say; but in nominating Mr. Bryan's own brother, now Governor of Nebraska, for the office of vice-president the Convention selected a man who is said to possess all the faults of the more widely known member of the family.

GUEST TICKET TO DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL CONVENTION

The originals of the above reproduction, printed by a banknote company on paper similar to that used in the Treasury, were most anxiously sought for by the thousands who visited New York and waited through the week's deadlock until Mr. Davis was finally nominated.

THE FALL OF THE FAN

An Elegance of Life Now Passed Away

Thus the "Daily Telegraph:" It is a rude and practical age. Our manners have not that repose which marked the people of yesterday and the day before. We disdain the elegances of life. We have no style. Our earnest modern women disdain the arts by which the fair used to rule. And so we find the Master of the Fanmakers' Company sorrowfully declaring that henceforth the only fans which the members of the Guild will deal with are those which rotate and ventilate. He tells us that the pretty craft of the fanmaker, the artist in ivory and chicken-skin, in lace and feather, has been killed by foreign competition. No longer can the Foreign Warden of the Guild seize, as Queen Anne's charter to the Fanmakers provides, all foreign fans exposed for sale in the cities of London and Westminster without the licence of the Company. So to those useful but less graceful articles, the ventilating fans, the Guild must needs confine its attention. Foreign cheap labour may have done its part in ruining the British fanmaker, but we cannot hold the British woman guiltless. The chivalry of the Master has persuaded him to make excuses for her which she does not deserve. It is notorious that the nice conduct of the fan is a lost art. What should our brisk Amazons know of hiding behind a fan or looking over it, of using it to rebuke a man's presumption or wicked wit? The vision is grotesque. To every age its own qualities. Our ladies have a hundred excellences which would make their grandmothers gasp and stare. But she who is an athlete who dares do all that may become a man in work and play, cannot have the airs of Lady Teazle or the graces of Millamant. The golden age of the fan was brief in England. Fans there have been, as the curled Assyrians of the Museum remind us, for uncounted centuries. We find Henry VIII.'s ladies using them, and the Elizabethan poets talk about them: but, as a traveller of that time thought it necessary to explain that people in hot countries used fans to cool their faces, it seems likely that the instrument had not gone far beyond the Court in England. The Fanmakers' Company obtained its charter at the beginning of the 18th century. But that time the fan was as necessary to a fine lady as conversation, and a good deal more necessary than reading and writing. We know from Addison's jests how elaborate was the drill of the fan. The signals of the semaphore are clumsy and complex compared with those with which the Belindas and Angelicas teased their admirers and mocked their rivals. These pleasant tasks, no doubt, are still performed by the fair. But with what a difference! In the golden age of the fan, to be a woman was an art.

THE INTERNATIONAL HORSE SHOW

Show Such as the World Cannot Surpass: Britisth Win in Close Fought Contest

By Brig.-General C. D. Bruce, C.B.E.

Three o'clock on the hottest afternoon this summer, 78 in the shade. "Well, that's nothing to kick about in the way of heat," I can hear a murmur from Shanghai. Perhaps not. But 78 dressed up in London clothes, a black morning coat and tall hat is not to be lightly borne. The cool white drill or the even more cool flannel of June in Shanghai makes all the difference.

The vast amphitheatre at Olympia was packed to its utmost in spite of the heat. From its glass roof to the flower-bedecked tan ring tier upon tiers of seats met the eye. Filled, too, with the exceedingly becoming frocks of the 1924 season. London has a reputation to keep up for "good-lookers." Nor has this summer belied her reputation.

The piéce de resistance this brilliant afternoon was the Officers International Jumping Competition for the Prince of Wales' Cup. Teams of three from the armies of Great Britain, America, France, Italy and Switzerland. Everyone who loves a horse has made or intends to make the pilgrimage to Olympia. It is the Mecca not only of Mohammedans, but of all admirers of the horse at its highest level. That the Mongol pony has not yet figured there is probably due to an oversight on the part of Mr. H— M— or other staunch supporters. But now that "Old Bill" is destined to end his days in the peace and seclusion of Lord Roseberry's paddocks, no doubt the oversight will soon be made good.

No Such Horses Anywhere.

Where in all the world can such horses be seen as at Olympia? Hunters, chargers, ponies, hacks, jumpers of the highest class. Was not six feet eight inches the record jump only this week? Coaches and coach-horses there still are, though even Mr. Barron's coach and well-known team of chestnuts looked a somewhat prehistoric mode of progression as he tooled them smartly round the arena.

It was close upon four o'clock when the Band of the Royal Marines struck up "God Bless the Prince of Wales." Englishmen and foreigners alike rose, hatless, to their feet to do honour to the "First Gentleman in Europe." "Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown" we know, but all the world also knows that in the prospective wearer of this particular crown the Empire possesses one of its greatest assets. The Prince of Wales walked quietly to the front of Royal box, a slim, boyish, figure, then stood gazing down over the huge concourse of people surrounding the arena. When the band finished he sat down, incidentally doing a good old-fashioned "mop" while he settled comfortably in his seat to watch the jumping.

Uniform Style All Through.

To practical horsemen few things are more interesting to see than an exhibition of varying styles of horsemanship. With the picked representatives of five European nations it might have been supposed this would be the case. But it was otherwise. In the early days of Olympia our own army representatives were conspicuous by their loose hunting seat and long stirrups. The Belgian and French officers by what was then irreverently known as the "monkey on a stick" seat. The Italians have always had a style apart. In no army is the training and turning out of high-class chargers more studied. This year America had sent of her best, and needless to say, her best was very good indeed. But the style of one was the style of all.

Another curious similarity lay in the uniforms of the various International teams. One had to look twice to be certain which team were in the arena. In far-off, prewar days, continental uniforms vied in brilliancy of colour with the Plumage of the cock pheasant. At Olympia this year one saw a drab, inartistic, but very efficient, dull level of colour. Khaki, a dead grey, and dull blue, so alike as to be almost indistinguishable. Between our own and the uniforms of the American team there was, to the ordinary observer, no difference whatever. All the world seems to have adopted "Sam-Brown" belt and the English cut of uniform and breeches. Only between the caps and kepis could any difference be noticed. Ours looked the most comfortable. The somewhat heavier-topped Italian kepi with its yellow piping was a land-mark. On the other hand the only competitors to lose their caps during a round were two of the British team.

Beauties All.

Prior to the main "turn" a grand parade took place of hunter prize winners, and what a sight these were! More than a dozen horses of the highest class. Horses of such size and scope and quality as would make any man's mouth water. A 13-hand China pony may show, at times, if not much quality all the good points of an English hunter. But the good big 'un as we all know will always beat the good little 'un. Rippingale, the property of Lady Irene Curzon from Melton Mowbray, a bright bay gelding 16.2 and full of quality seemed another type of animal altogether. But I would not care to be on the back of Rippingale at Shanghai during a paper-hunt finish, even though I was an aspirant for a red coat.

Once more the huge arena doors opened and the impedimenta for putting up the jumps appeared. Everything at Olympia is done in style, so it was no surprise to find the open wagon carrying the impedimenta drawn by a pair of smart browns ridden by an immaculate postilion. The latter wore an old-fashioned tight post-boy's jacket, a beaver hat, white breeches and top boots.

A Formidable Test.

Anything more calculated to put a horse off jumping can hardly be imagined than the irregular circle of fences over which they are tested. The obstacles themselves are, some of them, like no fence any horse ever saw. Then there is the band, the surrounding cheering crowds, the banked-up flower beds, and at night the artificial light. Remarking upon this to a well-known official at the close of the performance, he replied:

"Quite right. It takes the very best horsemen and the cleverest horses in the world to get round without a mistake. That's what we cater for." His English may perhaps have been faulty but his answer was unarguable.

In addition to the usual swing-gate, painted loose brick wall, and bush fence, there are a hog-back style and a fence which to anyone who has not seen it beggars description. Instead of three upright bars, one below the other, the bars in this fence are placed thus—in plan—so that to clear all three bars at different heights from the ground a horse must stand back and jump some 20 odd feet in width, frequently nearer 25 feet, and five feet six inches in height. He can, of course, see daylight all through the fence, nor is there anything to show him when and where to take off. That more mistakes are not made at this abnormal fence is a wonderful test of the cleverness and adaptability of the horses and to the artistic handling of the riders. What the actual height of each fence may be is not stated. But none appear less high than the shoulders of the judges standing close to them, and two or three looked even higher.

Of the jumping itself no praise can be excessive. If asked to select one horseman as the best individual performer, the writer's choice would fall on Lt. Col. G.F.H. Brooke on "Daddy Longlegs" one of the earliest enthusiasts at the Olympia tests. But there were members both of the United States and Italian teams who ran him close. It was very sporting of the Swiss Army authorities to permit a team to compete at all, and the Swiss officers made a good show. But the horses distinctly lacked the long and careful training bestowed upon those of the other teams.

A Thrilling Finish.

For nearly two hours the thousands present followed and cheered to the echo every good round of the Competition. Towards the end of the afternoon excitement became intense. The knowing ones who had been keeping each competitor's marks could barely separate the two leading teams. The English division were once again called in, and but for a bad mistake on the part of Captain de Fonblanque on "War Bady" seemed to hold the prize within their grasp. Then came the turn of the Italian officers. Their leading pair, Captain Count Borsarelli and Major Tappi, gave a finished exhibition, and at the end of these two rounds spectators still held their breath in suspense. Captain Cacciandra the last of the Italians began equally well but a heavy blunder at the final gate let the side badly down.

Then while the judges totted up the marks excitement reached boiling point. How did they stand? What were the final marks? What about the American team? But it does not take long to get a decision at Olympia. Everything there goes like clock-work. When the British number went up vociferous cheering broke out all round the arena. People rose to their feet wildly waving and cheering.

Down from the Royal box stepped the Prince lightly, accompanied, not quite so lightly, by Lord Lonsdale and the inevitable long cigar. Again the big doors swung open, and to a hurricane of cheers in rode the British team. Smiling all over they accepted winning rosettes from H.R.H. and departed. Then came the runners-up the Italian team, to receive the red rosettes and a very warm reception also. The U.S.A. team were placed third. Eleven and a half: 14 and a half: 16 and a half were the final figures, which speak volumes for the closeness of the competition between the three leading teams.

A League of Nations may be the world's final hope of peace. But such contests as Olympia provides go a long way in promoting International harmony among sportsman of all countries.

OUR SCOTTISH LETTER

Centenary of Lord Kelvin: An Original Genius: Winston in the Trenches

From Our Own Correspondent.

Edinburgh July 2.

Glasgow is celebrating the centenary of Lord Kelvin, the great physicist. He was not born in the city on the Clyde, his earlier years were spent in the North of Ireland; but from the age of six until his death it was the centre of his activities, for nearly seven years as a student, for over half a century as a Professor and latterly as the venerable Chancellor of the University.

Carlyle's celebrated dictum that genius was an infinite capacity for taking pains is less applicable to Kelvin than to almost any other of its author's contemporaries. Not that Kelvin did not take pains—his life was one of constant application and unremiting pursuit of knowledge—but on the testimony of all his fellow-scientists he was so richly endowed by nature that his achievements owed unusually little to the labours of other men working in the same field. His mathematical capacity was such that he was able to neglect the majority of treatises already written on a subject he commenced to explore and to master it on his own lines by deductions from first principles and the force of his intellect was so penetrating as to have led him, 50 or even 70 years ago, to foresee scientific developments which only the past decade has brought to practical application. To a degree which has rarely, if ever, been equalled, he united a profound mastery of scientific principles with exceptional skill in their practical application. Probably it is this combination of qualities which gives him his peculiar position among great physicists. For while the professional scientist remembers him by such things as his statement of the law of the dissipation of energy, he is famous to a far wider circle by the improvements he made in the mariner's compass, by his sounding machine, his tide predictor, and, above all, by the services he performed in the sucessful laying, after many difficulties and disappointments, of the first Transatlantic cable. "The life and soul of science," he said in one of his public addresses, "is its practical application." The words could stand as the motto on which he based the whole of his scientific offorts.

Lord Kelvin's ideal condition for happiness as expressed on many occasions was "To live among friends."

Dr. John Brown, of "Rab and His Friends" fame, who had been Thackeray's host in Edinburgh, wrote to a sister-in-law—"He (Thackeray) was delighted with your William Thomson (Kelvin), and said he was an angel and better, and must have wings under his flannel waistcoat. I said he had, for I had seen them."

Many a tale is told of Kelvin's class-room manners. The "snaffle" that the lecturer must fix in the teeth of his mind was powerless with this Professor. Once off, his mind would bolt, leaving the young gentlemen helpless on the benches. In the diary of a student of the period one finds this—"Attended a course of lecturer on the pendulum by Sir William Thomson and learned only that it wags."

There is the story of the eggs, expressive at once of the Professor's confidence and his absorption on the matter in hand. One of the annual features was an experiment which, like the country conjurors, required eggs. We will not trouble Physics for its exact explanation; the point was that eggs when spun lengthwise upon a table will tend to rise on end, the exception being when the egg is boiled, when it exhibits no such spectacular tendency. Very well, one day a wag boiled the eggs before the Professor arrived, and, charmed with his cunning, awaited the result. No jest ever failed more completely. Lord Kelvin was in no way puzzled. When the eggs refused to get up at his spinning, he merely observed quietly—"As you will observe, gentlemen, these eggs have been boiled." There was no pause, no flicker of doubt that some exceptional hen had laid an abnormal egg.

Another side of this great men is reflected in the first message transmitted by the Kelvin instruments across the trans-Atlantic cable:—"Europe and America are united by telegraph. Glory to God in the highest on earth peace and goodwill towards men." It must be said that the terms of this message more nearly express the splendour of the occasion than the laconic "Hello, Great Britain!" (Was it not something like that?) which opened the first communication by wireless.

It was one of Kelvin's most remarkable characteristics that the immense gulf in ability and attainment which separated him from ordinary men never affected his native modesty. To the end he was unassuming, ready to make allowances, patient even with opposition of a stupid kind, and the most courteous of opponents, "Gentler knight," declared Huxley after their controversy over the age of the earth, "never broke a lance." What tribute could be nobler?

Labour Party's Golf.

The Labour Party contains few sportsmen, and is singularly devoid of golfing talent. In the Cabinet itself the two principal golfers are the Premier and Lord Thomson and the pair were indulging the passion away up at Spey Bay during the recess. As for the other players in the party, "Ramsay" could probably take them all on collectively and play their best ball. Some years ago, when he used to play a lot with a Liberal M.P., Mr. MacDonald was a steady and consistent performer. His chief characteristic was his desperate keenness. Every effort was strained in the desire for victory. This never-say-die spirit was exemport, the Premier took off his coat to it, and exulted in the freedom which the Yankees admire on the links. He is a good wooden club player, as befits a man with a smooth, steady and fairly round swing, but he carries a sufficient number of the other shots to make him a formidable opponent off a handicap of nine.

Of the Air Minister's prowess less is known, but Lord Thomson certainly has the physique of a good player. For years Mr. J. H. Thomas has coquetted with the game, but candour compels me to say that he has never mastered it. His style is of the forceful type. "Jamie" likes to let out at them. Disaster does not discourage or deter him.

"Uncle Arthur" Henderson has never played, and declines absolutely to be seduced. His favourite game is lawn tennis, of which he is no mean exponent. But his two M.P. sons are enthusiastic beginners.

It is rather surprising that Mr. Wheatley, the leader of the Clyde brigade, should not have taken up this traditionally Scottish game, but, as a matter of fact, none of the group has ever had anything to do with it. They prefer something more exciting—like bowls. Only one Scot in the Ministry possesses a set of clubs. He is Mr. Tom Kennedy, one of the Scottish Whips.

Churchill in the Trenches

Impressions of Mr. Winston Churchill in the trenches as commanding officer of the 6th (Service) Battalion of the Royal Scots Fusiliers in the end of 1915, are the subject of a book by an anonymous writer. In "With Winston Churchill at the Front," Captain X. says the battalion was in billets when the new colonel took charge, and he at once started reforms. He called the officers together. "War is declared, gentlemen," observed Winston, "on the lice." With these words did the scion of the house of Marlborough first address his Scottish officers. From day to day the C. O. introduced little innovations, and by the end of ten days he had produced a manifest smartening up on every side.

The battalion went to "Plugstreet," which had an unpleasant reputation at this period, and was not considered by any means a cushy spot. "From the day of our arrival it was apparent to all that Winston's motto was to be 'Work' in the sense of trench-building and trench-repairing and improvement. . . Very early in our occupation of the Plugstreet trenches a whizzbang came through the roof of the farm in which the Battalion Headquarters was, and very nearly blotted out the colonel and his retinue. "One of the brigade commanders visited the farm after that stronghold had been considerably knocked about and various protective works destroyed. The General at once opened out about their defective conditions. 'Look, here, Churchill,' he fussed, 'this won't do, you know. There's no protection at all here for the men. You ought to get something done; look at that sentry there—it's dangerous, you know, it's positively dangerous.' 'Yes, sir,' Winston replied, 'but, you know, this is rather a dangerous war.'"

Mr. Churchill was under no misconception as to his importance. It was noted by officers and men that when the battalion was in the trenches there was a lot of shelling, whereas the relieving battalion had things very quiet. This seemed to them proof that the Germans knew who was in command. But the colonel would have none of this. "I am just as well known in Germany as Tirpitz is in England, and they don't like me there; they hate me. If they knew I was in the line here they wouldn't send over a few shells like this. They would turn on all their guns, and blot the place out. They would love to do that."

Always original in his choice of hats, it may be noted that Mr. Churchill, throughout his stay in the line, wore not the ordinary tin hat, but the much more ornamental French helmet.

Scottish Church Union

The union of the principal Presbyterian Churches in Scotland has taken a long step forward. When the Church Bill was last before the Peers there were signs of trouble ahead. But still it had an easy and unanimous passage through the House. A long list of amendments dealing with the property and endowments of the Church of Scotland were agreed to with practically no discussion. This was largely due to the tact and management of Lord Haldane, who had been able to meet all the objections by a compromise with the landowning interest. Mr. Macmillan, the Lord Advocate, had also a large share in the negotiations which ended so happily. The candour with which the Archbishop of Canterbury referred to the almost incredible spectacle of Scotsmen of one crowd remaining apart for over 80 years had a powerful effect upon the House. His speech was a trumpet call to unity, and in the opinion of this great Scotsman, who has so long been head of the Anglican Church, the union which is now well above the horizon will prove to be of great worth to Scotland.

A CALENDAR OF CRIME

The Condemnation of Vaquier the Byfleet Murderer: Wembley Gives an Opportunity to the Blackmailer: Chance for New Cinema Star to Make Millions

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

London, July 4.

The chief interest this week has been the trial of the Frenchman, Vaquier, for the murder of Mr. Jones at the Blue Anchor Inn, Byfleet, with whose wife he had carried on a liaison. It will be remembered that he poisoned him with strychnine, which he put into the bottle of salts which Mr. Jones was accustomed to take in the morning after a night's heavy drinking. The Police Court proceedings did not disclose anything of very great novelty. Everyone was waiting, however, to see if the prisoner possessed any real defence, since he had throughout the case constantly indicated that if really pressed he could point to the real murderer. For the first time on record he did so at the trial, and stated that the villain of the piece was the late Mr. Jones's solicitor, who, he stated, had instructed him to buy the strychnine, had actually administered it, and was himself a lover of the widow. In the circumstances, the Court naturally called the solicitor, who turned out to be a Mr. Bruce Miller, a well-known solicitor carrying on business in Basinghall Street, London. He denied every allegation made by Vaquier, and he was practically not cross-examined at all. It is clear, therefore, that even the defence regarded the prisoner's statements as a delusion. The Jury were absent for about 90 minutes and had no difficulty in returning a verdict of guilty. In view of the favourable comments of the French press on our methods of justice and the trial generally, I may quote the remarks of Mr. Justice Avory in pronouncing sentence of death:

"You have been convicted by the Jury of the most serious crime known to the law of any civilized country. I can see no reason whatever to doubt the righteousness of that verdict. You have been tried according to the law and procedure of this country which are more favourable to the interests of the accused than the laws of other countries, and you have had further the advantage of being defended by one of the most able and experienced counsel at the English Bar. Having been so convicted, it is my duty to pronounce upon you the sentence which is prescribed by law for this wicked and detestable crime.

A Strange Character.

Vaquier seems to have been a man of some ability and consummate vanity, and there is no doubt whatever that he has exercised a great influence on women with whom he has come in contact. Up to the last he seems to have believed that he would not be convicted, and when liberated, he was reckoning on being allowed to return to France to publish memoirs of his experiences in this country. There is little doubt that he will be executed, and there are many people who think that the woman, although not concerned in the murder, really adopted a reprehensible line of action throughout.

Vaquier kept his nerve throughout the whole of the trial, save at the end when he broke into a passionate outburst, while he had showed the most remarkable courtesy and deference, to all throughout the whole proceedings. The revulsion of feeling which he is undergoing is, therefore, not unnatural. Since his arrival at Wandsworth prison he has been on a diet of milk, meat extract, and fish. He cannot sleep and his appetite has deserted him. The condemned cell has been transformed into a hospital, and its occupant is never left for a second, night and day. It is learned that he is suffering from nervous collapse, and for hours at a time he sits with his head buried in his hands.

The Blackmailer's Chance.

The Wembley Exhibition seems to have brought to London a considerable number of people of a very undesirable type, in fact the police have clearly authorized a statement dealing with blackmailers, who, despite the heavy punishment usually imposed on conviction, are increasing more than ever. A number of well-dressed young men, who seem never to work but always to have money, are at present suspected by the police of levying blackmail on innocent people, and their movements are being closely watched. As an instance of the impudence of the blackmailer, an incident which occurred recently may be quoted. A man well-known in the theatrical and film world was spoken to in a quiet street off the Strand shortly before midnight, by a well-dressed young man. Almost immediately the stranger was joined by two other young men, who declared that unless money was immediately paid over, the victim woud be given in charge. The victim refused resolutely to part with any money, so a policeman was actually called, and a charge preferred. The man was taken to Bow Street, when a charge was definitely made. Two of the blackmailers gave their names and addresses, and then departed. They were to appear next morning to give evidence before the magistrates, but they failed to appear, and it was found that the addresses they gave were fictitious. Not until their victim had been detained for 15 hours was he released. The advice of a high police official is:

"If you are threatened with blackmail, no matter what the circumstances, go directly to the police. Threatening letters should never be destroyed. They should be taken to the police.

"In themselves the letters may be of no consequence, but taken in conjunction with the hundreds that are in the archives of Scotland Yard, they may be of great use in ridding society —at all events for a time—of one of the pests who are making a living by levying blackmail."

Visitors to London should, therefore, be warned to look out for this particular type of offender.

We have had some very big law cases recently dealing with alleged misrepresentation in respect of company promoting, the latest unsuccesful action being connected with the sale of shares in the firm of De La Rue & Co. We have had a very large number of offences in which jewellers' shops have been smashed with bricks and trays of jewellery stolen. There was one case this week in Bow Lane in the City, but in this instance both the men were caught, though all the diamond rings thrown into the street were not recovered.

Theatres Actually Paying.

The theatre are not doing quite so badly as was at one time thought. Although this year is not so good all round as last year, there probably never was a season in which there were so large a number of firm and conspicuous successes among the theatres from a financial point of view. There are a dozen "shows" which are doing good business week-in, week-out, and seem, for one reason or another, to be above the influence of the weather or Wembley. They are:—

Diplomacy,
It Pays to Advertise,
Madame Pompadour,
Leap-Year,
Toni,
In the Next Room,
To Have the Honour,
Our Betters,
The Mask and the Face,
The Rat,
Little Revue,
Punch Bowl.

There are several others which are doing quite satisfactorily even on their worst nights.

Of course attention will be attracted to the failures by the withdrawal of "London Life" at Drury Lane, but that was a badly-chosen play and neither wet weather nor the absence of Wembley would have made much difference. Something similar might be said of most quick withdrawals.

The British National Opera Company is still doing well at His Majesty's, while Gilbert and Sullivan always draws crowded houses at the Prince's no matter whether the chief artists change or not.

Wanted a New Charlie.

I think there is a little slump in cinema going, mainly due to the fact that there are too many medium American films. I am certainly inclined to think that there is accuracy in the remarks of Mr. Jack Root, personal representative of Mack Sennett Comedies, who has arrived in England on a hunt for a new comedian.

"The film badly needs new blood, especially in comedy," he said, 'and the man who suits my requirements can be made a millionaire in a very short time. He must be short of stature and fairly good-looking, and able to make the world laugh. If he does it he will have a bigger salary than the President of the United States, and in three years I will make him a millionaire. I have my eye on a well-known London man and also two men in Germany. You see, nationality and language are no bar in film comedy."

Only a very few concerts pay, but picture galliaries are on the whole doing better, while the Zoo has never been so well-attended for years, and the crowds who go to cricket matches are as numerous as ever, although the standard of play is not particularly high, while the charges for admission are still far too much. Thus at Lord's it still costs 2/- for admission and only to see a second-rate match. This may perhaps explain why the attendance at the Varsity Match this year has not been very good—the play of both the Universities has been nothing exceptional.

Fortunes for Rodeo.

I ought to add that the Rodeo Cow Boys sailed for home to-day. The show has been a very great financial success. About 500,000 people visited it and the three promoters between them have probably made £60,000 after paying all expenses. The summonses against the Rodeo performances were dismissed by a majority of the local magistrates, and the popular view may be summed up from the appended extract from the "Daily News:"

Whatever view may be taken of the propriety of the steer-roping contests as a public or private exhibition, few people will deny that the Rodeo as a whole provided a fascinating revelation of daring horsemanship and that the risks run by the cowboys themselves were at least as great as those in which the animals were involved. The one [illegible] of the show which created [illegible] uneasiness in the mind of a people unaccustomed to see cattle [illegible] treated was withdrawn from the public gaze as soon as this uneasiness was effectively expressed. To the cowboys, whose everyday work on the ranch includes the roping of steers as a part of the routine of duty, our fastidiousness may appear unintelligible, and not a little hypocritical, in a country which hunts the stag, the fox and the hare, and courses the rabbit sometimes in circumstances of revolting cruelty. It is, nevertheless, a sound instinct which distinguishes a necessary operation on a farm from a public entertainment, and it is to be hoped in this country, at all events, the distinction will always be observed.

SNAKE THROWS MEN INTO RIVER

Fight to Death with 32-Feet Anaconda: Native Swallowed

Stirring stories of struggles with monster Anacondas in the Amazon were told by Mr. Antonio Bergelt, who captured the "16-footer" recently installed at the Zoo.

Acting as collector in Brazil for Mr. G. Bruce Chapman, F.Z.S., of Tottenham Court Road, it is the business of Mr. Bergelt to secure specimens of such creatures as are likely to interest visitors to European menageries.

In the Amazon his canoe was twice upset, and the party had to swim for the shore surrounded by the huge snakes, which spend most of their time in the river.

"I had as companions on the expedition an Englishman named Morris and half a dozen Indians," said Mr. Bergelt, "and whilst passing Maroyo Island, on the Amazon, we noticed the head of a large Anaconda protruding from the water.

The Capture.

"The Indians have a great dread of these snakes, and, becoming panic-stricken, they upset the canoe, pitching us all into the river.

"On reaching the bank we watched the movements of the Anacondas, and found that they congregated in the water under a tree trunk spanning a creek like a bridge.

"Here they were quite still with their heads above the surface, so we fashioned a pole with a noose at the end and, clambering along the fallen tree, caught one round the neck and hauled it to shore, where we tied it to a tree until we had constructed a box to put it in.

"The snake which is the one now at the Zoo, was 16ft. long and as an anaconda is, I should say, twice as strong as a boa constrictor of equal length, the packing of our captive was as difficult as it was dangerous. (The anaconda, though not venomous, can inflict a severe bite, whilst, being a constrictor, it is capable of crushing a man with ease.)

Family of 24.

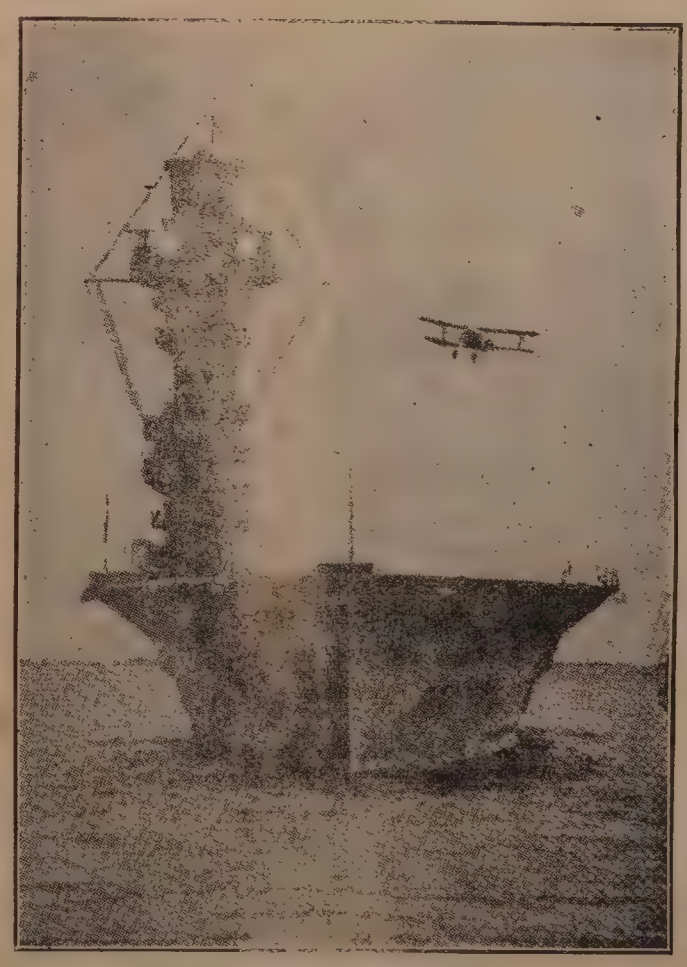
"We captured a second anaconda at the same spot, and this gave birth to 24 young ones on the way to the coast.

"The largest anaconda we encountered was fully 32ft. long, but as we had no means of dealing with a live snake of this size we killed it. We came across this one, with several others, whilst crossing the river with a cargo of pigs. The anacondas, in their eagerness to make a meal of the pigs, came alongside the canoe and craned their necks over the side. Once more we were upset, but no one was harmed."

Mr. Bergelt explained that anacondas rarely attack man unless interfered with, but he recorded an exception.

Eaten Alive.

"A mounted messenger conveying a large amount of money from one town to another had been missing for some days," he said, "A search party found his horse grazing in a clearing of the forest. Near by a huge anaconda was basking in the sun. The party killed the snake, and upon opening it they discovered the body of the unfortunate messenger, with boots, clothing and equipment intact. The skin of the actual speciment is now in a Museum."



H. M. S. HERMES

This strange-looking vessel is an aircraft carrier just constructed for the British Navy and no doubt one of the weird new craft which attacted so much notice at the recent naval review at Spithead. She is of 10,950 tons displacement, has a speed of 25 knots and carries an armament of 10 5.5-in. guns and four 4-in. anti-aircraft guns. The feature of the ship is the shifting of the superstructure and the mast to the extreme starboard side amidships to allow of a clear deck from bow to stern for aeroplanes to rise from and land on. The vessel can carry a large number of aeroplanes and is equipped with workshops. The hangers are in the hull, and the 'planes are raised to the flying deck in electric lifts. An aeroplane about to land will be observed in the photo.

OLD LONDON

The House Where Pope Bade Farewell to London

A scheme is on foot between the London County Council and the Westminster City Council to widen Berkeley-street at the total cost of £85,000. It is proposed to cut off a narrow strip of land on the western side of the thoroughfare, between Piccadilly and Lansdowne-passage, and to erect thereon a number of shops and flats. Shops and flats do not suggest anything very attractive, but they could not be worse than the dismal, dirty brick boundary of the gardens of Devonshire House. Let it go; it is one of the eyesores of London.

Berkeley-street, formerly known as Berkeley-row, boasts a respectable antiquity for it dates from 1642, when it marked the western extremity of Piccadilly. Beyond lay the open country, the western road, with plenty of mud under foot. The street, and Stratton-street also, was built by Lady Berkeley on a portion of her grounds, much to the disfavour of Evelyn, who had been consulted about the changes:—

"I went to advise and give directions about the building two streetes in Berkeley Gardens, reserving the house and as much of the garden as the breadth of the house. In the meantime I could not but deplore that sweet place (by far the most noble gardens, courts, and accommodations, stately porticoes, etc., anywhere about towne) should be so much straightened and turned into tenements."

But he finds some excuse for Lady Berkeley's action since a similar fate has overtaken the pleasaunces of Clarendon House, and the fact that these two streets increased Lady Berkeley's income by £1,000 per ann. in mere ground rents.

"To such a mad intemperance [he adds] was the age come of building about a city by far too disproportionate already to the nation."

Berkeley-street, an it would, could boast of one or two famous residents in the past. Cosway was living here when he first attracted the notice of the Prince of Wales, whose portrait he "drew in little." To a house here was carried Mr. Chaworth, after the duel with Lord Byron, the great uncle of the poet, which had resulted over a quarrel as to the best way of preserving game. Here, too, at No. 9, Pope, anxious to be near his friend Lord Burlington, came to live, and to compose his "Farewell to London."

Dear, damn'd, distracting town, farewell!
Thy fools no more I'll tease.
* * *
Why should I stay? Both parties rage;
My vixen mistress squalls;
The wits in envious feuds engage;
And Homer (damn him!) calls.
* * *
Adieu to all, but Gay alone,
Whose soul, sincere and free,
Loves all mankind, but flatters none,
And so may starve with me.

In a short time he had shaken the dust of London off his feet and had gone to live at Twickenham.

THE STORY OF A CHURL

A Sermon Preached on July 20, 1924, by the Rev. A. N. Rowland in Union Church, Shanghai

"The man (Nabal) was churlish." (1 Sam. 25.3).

That is to say he had a certain form of bad temper. Now bad temper is a sin that denies the discipline of Christ and makes room for the devil. Temper is God's good gift to us, but like many others it is easily spoiled. It may be short or sour, fiery or gloomy, caustic or obstinate. It may break out in rage or keep smouldering on. But always it makes for mischief and demoralization, and not least the churlish kind.

"Churl" is a historic word. Being the old Saxon word for "man," it was applied by the Norman conquerors to people who did not answer to the call of chivalry. It came to signify a lack of manners and refinement, coupled with indifference to high standard and the common good. But "Time brings its revenges," and when chivalry faded away it was found that the people in charge of affairs were chiefly those who were immersed in business, captured by the "cares of the world and the deceitfulness of riches." The poor have many faults, but they are not characteristically churlish. You are likeliest to find Nabal to-day among those who have possessions and pretensions, sometimes called the "nouveaux riches."

The Ways of the East.

The story of Nabal is vivid enough, but it might be misunderstood if read from a Western standpoint. David the uncrowned chief makes a requisition upon him with all politeness. But why should he give a cent to this prince of bandits however debonair? Why should a peaceful farmer be held up to ransom for his riches? It might seem then that Nabal was an ill-used man. But the truth is different.

In East and West there is a common sense of obligation to the general good in proportion to the benefit received. Society is a kind of insurance against the evils of unregulated selfishness. It secures that a man keeps what he has, and if he has much more shall be given, for which security he must make some return.

This is where East and West diverge. It is the mark of the West that rates and taxes are paid for safety and for maintenance. But in the East the method is different though the principle is the same. There is no stable government to pay officials and to guarantee security and justice. But the farmer makes his terms with power wherever he can find it and in return for protection pays in hospitality and tribute. Here is an illustration from "Fire and Sword in the Soudan."

Hospitality in Darfur.

In those troubled days that culminated in the heroic venture of Chinese Gordon, Slatin Pasha set out on a march against Sultan Harun with 200 blacks and some Turkish horsemen, when he discovered they had brought no rations. His Soudanese staff reassured him however, saying "Wherever you go in Darfur you'll find something to eat." And sure enough as they came to a village in the evening the local sheik brought them corn and a large dish of asida. Slatin says "I called up a clerk to give a receipt to serve as a voucher for the remission of taxation, but the good man declined it, saying it was not only his duty to give the corn, but that the rights of hospitality demanded it."

Such a story makes the case clear against Nabal. It was a small thing to acknowledge David's protection, seeing it might have been translated into brigandage. And Nabal becomes the type of the man who ignores his social obligations.

The Modern Churl.

Now we have all come across the Nabal type—the kind of man who puts his gains into his pocket without a word, but makes a song about meeting his obligation. He is prepared to live by the labours of others, to enjoy the benefits of economic solidarity, and the amenities of our common social life, but is staggered by the suggestion that, beyond all rates and taxes [illegible] morally in debt to the [illegible]. He lives and perhaps flourishes [illegible] good-will and credit, but sees no reason why he should contribute any of his own. He hates the pulpit to speak of these things, being anxious not to know the social bearings of the Gospel.

A man buys a plot of land, let us say, and a 100,000 neighbours come to live about it. Its value goes up a hundred-fold in consequence. Is he not indebted to the community? Not that the unearned increment should be taken from him, but if he does not use it in the public interest he deserves to lose it. Or take a case that is not touched by treatises on political economy. A lady, let us suppose, marries a man who has the art of getting on, and by reason of his standing in public or commercial life she has pretty well all she wants and a large measure of recognition and esteem as well. Is this a ground for arrogance, and does it not occur to her that by the superiority of her fortune she is the more a debtor? What she can give is not a question of charity but of justice, and should be offered with a humble heart.

Now these principles are fundamental to the Christian faith, yet there are nouveaux riches and their flunkeys who look upon them with incredulity and prefer to keep company in spirit with Nabal the churl. It only remains then to consider the consequences of this disposition as given in this old mirror of social life.

Give the Man a Chance.

(1) The first fruit of churlishness is cynicism. "Who is David," was Nabal's rejoinder. "There be many servants nowadays that break from their masters." His error lay in refusing to consider the individual, to think of David apart from a class. It was always the way with our Lord to draw the man out of the multitude, and give him a hearing, but it is the habit of the cynic to push the individual into the ruck of a class or race that rouses dislike. "Who is so and so?" "He is only one of those Germans—Niggers, Chinks"—it depends on the connexion. Or "he is one of these bloated capitalists," or "one of these aggressive working men," The Prince of this world blinds the eyes of his people so that they do not see the real situation. The fashionable lady who insists on her dress being ready by a certain day and objects to paying the bill in a reasonable time, sees nothing amiss but the tradesman's effrontery. It is so much easier to excuse ourselves than other people, and the churl soon learns to cal his creditors knaves, for we are sure to slander those we wrong. The churlish heart discounts the value of the entire human race. Even David once said that all men were liars. But he said it in his haste and confessed his sin. And certainly we need to repent of our cynicism.

The Last Dishonour.

(2) The second fruit of churlishness is isolation. Nabal was a lonely man in his household, and first with his employees who said "He is such a man of Belial that one cannot speak to him." The Bible always treats servants sympathetically, and has no use for the man who regards them as if they had no claim. The punishment of hard masters is their isolation. Lady Astor spoke a true word the other day. "Those men who have built up their businesses without any thought of those who have helped them to do so often go to their graves unhonoured and sometimes cursed." Man's greatest boon is fellowship and to lose that is worse than losing life. Such was the end of Jay Gould who moaned from under the burden of his millions, "I cannot remember ever having had a good turn done me, and I'm not surprised, for I've had to shove down every one I met."

But Nabal was divided even from his wife and that was his last dishonour. Abigail knowing from experience the perversity of her husband had to take her own line for the good and even the safety of the household. "Go and I will follow," she said to her steward, "but she told not her husband." It is dreadful when a wife has to meet churlishness with secrecy. It is the way to many a divorce before the great divide of death. Life flows between them like a cold river without a ford.

> They both walk on in their grassy places
> On either marge of the moon-lit floor,
> With the moon's own sadness in their faces
> Where joy is withered, blossom and bud.

So Abigail had the shame of saying concerning Nabal. "I pray thee regard not this man of Belial; as his name means 'fool,' so is he."

The Root of Churlishness.

I have reminded you of the ugly and hateful end of churlishness in order that we may greatly dread its obscure beginnings and watch against them. It is due to a blind absorption in one's own affairs, especially in material things. Life is mutual obligation, and if our fellows are not viewed and treated as partners and associates they come to be regarded as superfluities, inferiorities, rivals, enemies. And then a man lives in a false world as Nabal did. Against all the folly of the selfish heart stands the mind of Christ. He helps us to approach our fellows, to appreciate them. He bids his disciples stand on the threshold of other lives and say in effect.

SPEND THE BOXER MONEY ON SOMETHING PRODUCTIVE

Education Not So Much the Primary Need as Railways and Road Construction Which in Turn Will Yield Funds for Education

(CONTRIBUTED.)

Peking, July 29.

We certainly do not condemn wholesale those out-and-outers who are pressing for the whole of the remitted Boxer funds for one particular purpose, be it education or any other. But what we desire to point out is, that the greatest need relative to this money is a sense of proportion.

There is roughly the huge sum of about £70,000,000 available from Boxer sources if all the Powers follow in the wake of America and Russia. In regard to the disposal of this huge sum there is a strong section who are determined to devote it exclusively to education. They contend that education is the foundation of a nation's prosperity, and is at the present moment China's most vital need. They speak as though the whole future of the Republic depended on the immediate rushing of the whole of the nation's youth into schools. We yield to no one in the conviction that education is of paramount importance, and, if the other vital interests of the country were provided for, even the stupendous sum to be released from the Funds mentioned would not be a cent too much for education. Provided of course that the organization existed for the wisest use of the money, a matter in regard to which we venture to doubt, or that economic conditions were at present favourable.

We wish, however, to urge one or two considerations, which, in the opinion of many people qualified to know, should cause a halt and inquire if the use of the whole of the available money for education is really wise.

Roads and Railways.

The economic factor is an element which cannot be ignored in this reference. Industrial expansion as expressed in the existence of roads, rail or other is a condition "sine qua non" even for educational development. They are the arteries of the national organism. One consideration, which we do not remember to have seen mentioned previously, comes to our mind. Long experience in organizing schools under Government auspices enables us to speak with a certain amount of authority. There are hundreds of villages in China where private and semi-private charity has provided schools and teachers. The schools concerned are lower and higher primary, the foundation of higher grades. They remain comparatively empty, simply because economic conditions in the villages make it impossible to free the children of school age from necessary domestic and farm duties. Take one branch, the raking and scraping of grass and weeds for fuel. At least one youngster from each faimly is required for this essential work, the family pot must be kept going and the children must be employed. It is pathetic to see the competition among these youngsters and a whole day's raking and scraping only yields enough for the couple of meals to be cooked, and in winter for the k'ang which heats the house.

Impoverishment All Round.

The tragedy is, that in some of the provinces where this waste of labour is entailed there are abundant supplies of coal, but the communications are so inadequate that it cannot be put down where it is needed at cheap enough rates, and so the young people of the villages are perforce bound to the rake when they might be in school or employed in productive operations.

Take another reaction of this wasteful and needless policy. The ground is improverished by raking which pulls up those natural binders of the soil, the roots in such a way that excessive erosion during rains washes the best part of the soil into the local streams and rivers thus causing silting and consequent flood. With good roads education would be served bringing cheap fuel into the village and liberating children now required for raking. The soil would retain its rich surface properties and the danger of flood would appreciably and almost immediately be lessened.

Consider on the other hand, the multiplication of schools which would if Boxer Funds all suddenly devoted to say Higher Education, turn out teachers by the thousand but who on account of the economic disabilities just enumerated could not possibly be absorbed as quickly as they could be produced.

The same remarks apply to the excessive deforestation which is going on in many parts of China due to the struggle for fuel, and which, by cutting down young trees, deprives the country of not only soil binders but of large and numerous trees with all their possibilities for precipitating atmospheric moisture and so ensuring regular and non-torrential rainfall which, under the present conditions of deforestation, is impossible.

Economic Slavery.

It is the existence of these soil-destroying activities which by impoverishing the land that perpetuates the intense struggle existence, which in its turn makes these activities necessary. A vicious circle of economic slavery is induced. The soil capital is being wasted instead of conserved, and good roads would go far to solve the difficulty. It will be seen that those who advocate the use of Boxer money for roads are not essentially antagonistic to education, they are really more far-sighted than the out-and-outers, simply because their policy is one of proportion and thus contributes to the mutual benefit of equally insistent needs.

There is no need to enlarge on the perils of large numbers of graduated students for whom no suitable employment could immediately be found, if the production be suddenly inward. The example of India where the British Government and the larger Missionary Societies have been lavish in expenditure on education is an example we wish China to avoid. In that country education has to a large extent been proceeding more rapidly than industrial expansion and the uplift of economic levels. The result is a large body of educated but unassimilable men whose activities are turned in the direction of stirring up political strife and embarrassing the Government which has made them. Already we see the possible beginnings of a similar state of affairs in this country and to increase the danger by overproduction would be bad statesmanship.

We have already expressed the doubt of China's ability immediately and wisely to use the enormous sums to be released, assuming that other Powers will follow the example of America, Russia and England. The sum total from all sources spent on education in this country during 1923 was $59,424,567. Assuming £60,000,000 or $50,000,000, to be the sum eventually available, this would give an average addition of $50,000,000 per annum for the next 10 years over and above the present expenditure. Two things should be borne in mind in view of [illegible] figures. The organization would break down under it and there would be grave risk of waste, or [illegible] would be the temptation of indulging in an orgy of erecting expensive plants which in turn would spell augmented annual income. Supposng the money could, without waste, be immediately adapted for education then in the absence of adequate communications the economic barriers which are preventing the people from advancing so as to be able to free children for schools would still continue. If a sane and cautious policy of funding the money, or investing it so as to ensure a steady income for education is sought, what better investment could there be than in railways or roads which would provide as sound an investment as any other and at the same time assist the country to attain to the prosperity which would enable schools to be attended by children at present bound by the necessity of engaging in earning money?

Business Men in Favour.

The whole sum still unallocated could be made for a loan to be applied at once to railway construction and as the payments by the Powers came in the loan could be liquidated and the country would have a going concern freed from dividend demanding capital and the earnings would form a permanent endowment for education. This is the suggestion we put forward, and we are in a position to state that it has the support of a large section of Chinese Government officials as well as leading bankers and merchants in many parts of China. It does not introduce the discordence of pitting one set of interests against any other, but by aiming at proportion will mutually benefit at least two of China's most pressing needs, education and communications. Control of expenditure would be as easy under this scheme as under any other and the Chinese would not object to any adequate method of such control.

AS THE TWIG IS BENT

["The children particularly enjoyed the remarkable representation of the bombing of the Houses of Parliament and of Westminster Cathedral."—From an account of "the first presentation of 'the aerial attack on London,' given before an audience of 600 children at the Admiralty Theatre, Wembley Exhibition."]

When little Willie saw the bomb
Destroy the H.O.C.
He was (and so were Jane and Tom)
Beside himself with glee;
And when St. Paul's went up in smoke
(A very fine production)
How Willie did enjoy the joke
Implied in its destruction!

London Bridge is falling down,
To Willie's vast delight;
From Kensington to Camden Town
The fire's a splendid sight;
And when the Abbey disappeared—
A pretty swift removal—
My word, how Willie sat and cheered
To show his warm approval!

* * * * *

When little Willie bombs his aunt,
Or sets the house aflame,
For once at least the movies can't
Be saddled with the blame.
Before the Bench the lad will go;
And there to that assembly
"It wasn't films," he pipes; "oh, no—
I saw it done at Wembley."

THREE British sloops of war of the "Flower" class, which have been out of commission for some time, are ordered to be prepared for foreign service. The Daffodil and Heliotrope will be fitted out at Pembroke Dockyard, and the Delphinium at Sheerness. The Daffodil and Delphinium were paid off in July, 1919 and the Heliotrope in December, 1920.

A plea is being made against the extinction of the gorilla, the "next of kin and poor relation of man." The main body of gorillas inhabits the tropical forests of the Congo and is at the mercy of every "sportsman" who can secure a licence from the Belgian Government. The race of gorillas is in imminent danger of being wiped out and one contributing cause is the alliance between sportsmen and museums, though as often as not gorilla hunting is for the sport of the thing, though many regard the killing of such animals as pure murder.

MR. LI HSIEH-YANG AND THE SUMMER PALACE

Chinese M.P.'s Unfounded Attack on the Emperor: A Slander Exposed

BY R. F. JOHNSTON

(Tutor to H. M. the Ching Emperor).

The Chinese newspapers of July 23, 1924, published a series of Five Questions addressed to Government by Mr. Li Hsieh-yang, a member of the House of Representatives in Peking, on the subject of various rumours which have been circulating recently regarding innovations at the Summer Palace. In the course of his remarks, Mr. Li made certain charges of a very serious nature against the Manchu Emperor and also against myself. These charges were admittedly made on a basis of mere rumour, yet it does not seem to have occurred to Mr. Li that he should first have ascertained whether the rumours were true before denouncing the Manchu Emperor and his English Tutor on the strength of them. No English translation of Mr. Li's questions, as far as I am aware, has yet appeared in the foreign press, hence it is on the Chinese oriyinal that I base my own remarks. But even if foreign editors treat Mr. Li's questions with the contempt they deserve, the letters which I have received from foreign newspaper correspondents and others during the past few days show that the questions have not escaped the attention of foreigners who can read Chinese. Moreover, it is evident that a good deal of misunderstanding exists in foreign circles regarding what is actually being done at the Summer Palace, and it seems desirable that this misunderstanding should be cleared up. For these reasons I have drawn up the following memorandum, which not only embodies the general purport of Mr. Li's questions and my own replies to them, but also contains a detailed account of present conditions at the Summer Palace and the steps which are now being taken to alter them.

Mr. Li prefaces his first question with a reference to newspaper reports that the Summer Palace is being converted into a commercial emporium, under the direction of the Manchu Emperor's English Tutor. Tenders are being received for the lease of lands and premises, with a view to the establishment of various commercial enterprises, such as five foreign restaurants, five Chinese restaurants, two photographic studios, 10 tea-houses, public baths, a recreation ground, and four residential hotels outside the walls. He declares that in dealing with the Summer Palace in the way described, the Manchu Emperor has violated the terms of the Abdication Agreement, which designated the Summer Palace as the Emperor's place of residence. He asks whether the Government sanctioned his action, and whether it authorized General Nieh Hsieh-fan to surrender control of the Summer Palace to the Imperial House.

An Untrue Insinuation.

The obvious answer to this question is that the Government did not sanction any violation of the terms of the Abdication Agreement and that no such violation has been perpetrated. Nor did the Government authorize General Nieh to surrender his control of the Summer Palace, because its administration was never in his hands and he had therefore nothing to surrender. The Summer Palace is part of the private property of the Manchu Imperial House and no attempt has ever been made by the Republican Government, or any of its responsible officers, to deny the right of the Imperial House to administer the property in any way it thinks fit.

In his second question, Mr. Li asks whether the Government approves of the Manchu Emperor breaking the terms of the Abdication Agreement by turning the Summer Palace into a commercial emporium.

I suggest, as a fitting answer, that as the Emperor has no intention of transforming the Palace into a commercial emporium, it is unnecessary to consider what the attitude of the Government would be in such a contingency. It may be added, however, that the Government could hardly legitimately interfere, if the Imperial family, besides using the Palace as a temporary or permanent place of residence, were to develop some of its commercial possibilities. That the Government has no objection in principle to the commercial development of imperial properties is clear to anyone who is acquainted with the present condition of Hsiang Shan (the "Hunting Park") and T'ang Shan, both of which properties have been leased by the Imperial House to persons who are or were high officials of the Government itself, and have been commercialized by those officials on a very considerable scale. So far as I am aware, neither Mr. Li nor anyone else has raised any objection to the erection of hotels and dwelling-houses by Republican officials in the leased properties, though on aesthetic grounds their protests would have received the ready support of all Chinese and foreigners who realize how terribly the natural beauty of those parks has been sacrificed to the interests of commercial exploitation.

Base and Cowardly.

In his third question, Mr. Li asks whether the Government is willing to acquiesce in a commercial development of the Summer Palace which by increasing the financial power of the Manchu Emperor may bring upon the country the calamity of a monarchic restoration.

Before I proceed to reply to this question, I cannot refrain from drawing attention to the base and cowardly insinuation that if the Manchu Emperor possessed the necessary financial power, he would, in defiance of the will of the people of China, attempt to restore the monarchy. I can only suppose that Mr. Li is judging the Manchu Emperor by the standard of his own nature, and is vividly conscious that if he himself were in the Manchu Emperor's place, and had gold enough, he would not hesitate to buy his way back to the throne.

But perhaps we should not pay Mr. Li the poor compliment of taking seriously his suggestion that an income derived from the commercial exploitation of the Summer Palace could provide the Manchu Emperor with the necessary financial basis for a movement aimed at the overthrow of the Chinese Republic. Mr. Li's faith in the stability of Republican institutions in China would be weak indeed if he honestly feared they could be endangered or overthrown through the instrumentality of a financial power based on the sale of tea, fish, lemonade and picture-postcards at the Summer Palace, or even on the profits of a dozen hotels and restaurants. In sober fact, there is just a hope that by carrying out various much-needed and long overdue reforms in the administration of the Palace estate, and by a reasonable development of existing sources of income (a development which will by no means ruin the Palace as a place of residence for an Emperor), those in charge of the property may with difficulty succeed in making it self-supporting. Even then it is to be feared that there will be little or no surplus left out of which to pay for the adequate upkeep of the buildings, many of which, through unavoidable neglect, are already beginning to show signs of decay.

An Uncalled for Charge.

I hope Mr. Li's anxiety (if he spoke seriously and not in jest) about the possibility of the surplus revenues of the Summer Palace being used to destroy the Republic, will now be set at rest. His question is, however, accompanied by some comments which should not be allowed to pass unnoticed. He makes a charge (wholly uncalled-for and out of place) against the Manchu Emperor of being in wrongful occupation of the Imperial Palaces in Peking, and asks how long this state of things is going to be tolerated. He seems to imply that the Emperor is maintaining himself in those Palaces in defiance of the efforts of the Republican Government to turn him out. Here again it is difficult to believe that Mr. Li can be serious. Has he such a mean opinion of his Government's sense of public duty, or of its power and prestige, that he believes it capable of tamely acquiescing in an act of usurpation by a defenceless boy, who in spite of his empty title of Emperor is without financial, military or political resources, and whose person and liberty are wholly at that Government's disposal? How can the Manchu Emperor be said to be a defiant usurper of a "Forbidden City" from which he could be ejected at an hour's notice by a single police constable armed with a warrant from President or Cabinet?

Mr. Li makes another quaint comment, to the effect that if the Summer Palace is provided with popular attractions, the Chinese people will gradually forget the circumstances in which it was originally built,—that it was erected out of naval funds, and therefore stands, and should always stand, as a memorial of one of the most ignominious episodes in modern Chinese history, her disastrous defeat, 30 years ago, at the hands of Japan. Mr. Li is apparently one of those foolishly ignorant persons who believe that if naval funds had not been diverted to the construction of the Summer Palace, China's navy would have been strong enough to defeat that of Japan. China's naval and military weakness at the time of the China-Japan war was due to many causes, some of them dating from a period long anterior to the time of the late Empress Dowager. I am far from wishing to suggest that China's collapse was not partly, indeed very largely, due to the incapacity, corruption, ignorance and folly of the Court during the closing decades of Manchu rule; what I wish to emphasize is simply this, that the construction (or rather reconstruction) of the Summer Palace was only a minor and relatively unimportant cause of China's defeat. Had that Palace never been rebuilt, had the best possible use been made of all the funds at the disposal of the Naval Board, the war might have lasted a few days or a few weeks longer, but the end would have been the same. In that case China to-day would have had nothing to show for her increased expenditure at that time. A larger number of her warships would now be rotting at the bottom of the sea, and there would have been no Summer Palace to delight the eyes and refresh the minds of countless Chinese and foreign visitors.

The Attack on Mr. Johnston.

Mr. Li may have been indulging in somewhat elephantine pleasantries when he constructed his third question with its irrelevant addenda, but he can hardly plead a similar excuse for the terms of his fourth. This question embodies an extremely grave charge against myself. He has "heard" that I make a grossly improper use of my position as Tutor to the Manchu Emperor by encouraging him in various unlawful activities, and by inciting him to work for a restoration. Mr. Li asks whether anything of these unholy doings has come to the ears of the Government. Whatever the official answer to this question may be, I hope the Government will call upon Mr. Li to produce the evidence upon which he bases this scandalous and lying accusation. If the Government on its own initiative takes no steps in this direction, I trust His Britannic Majesty's Minister will request it to do so. If it were proved that I, a British subject, were or had been engaged in fomenting a political revolution in China, the lightest punishment that could befall me would be my immediate expulsion from Chinese soil; nor would the British Government think it necessary to delay action until it had received from the Chinese Foreign Office an official request for my deportation. On the other hand, if Mr. Li fails to produce any evidence that I have been guilty of so gross a misuse of my position and opportunities in the Forbidden City, I hope it is not improper to suggest that the Chinese Government should call upon him to offer me a public apology for his baseless insinuation or accusation. If he is a gentleman, he will, as a matter of course, offer that apology without waiting to be called upon to do so. He will also be most anxious, if he is a gentleman, to offer his deepest apologies to the Manchu Emperor for suggesting that His Majesty is willing to employ as his Tutor a foreigner who seeks to involve him in dangerous political intrigues.

An Anti-British Motive.

I fear there is reason to believe that this question of Mr. Li's was deliberately framed with a view to stirring up anti-British sentiment in China, for he laboriously drags into it a reference to alleged British encroachments or usurpations in Tibet. Apparently my suspected attempts to foment a new Chinese revolution under the nominal leadership of the Manchu Emperor are connected in some mysterious way with deep-laid British schemes to reduce China to the same sort of vassalage to which British guile is supposed already to have reduced Tibet. Mr. Li's wild statements about matters of which he evidently knows very little suggest to me the whimsical notion of a Dalai Lama and a Manchu Emperor wriggling together like two Summer Palace fishes in a close-meshed net of British intrigue. I suppose Mr. Li regards me as a wicked instrument of a malevolent Government in the carrying out of sinister schemes whereby Peking and Lhasa are to be chained together and made to drag the chariot of British imperialism over a roadway strewn with the writhing bodies of Chinese and Tibetan slaves. Anti-foreign agitators are at liberty to make what use they like of these pleasing pictures, which if handled by a skilled draughtsman, and judiciously displayed, might prove very effective in rousing the patriotic indignation of the ignorant masses of China against the horrors and manifold iniquities of Western Imperialism.

In his fifth and final question, Mr. Li wants to know whether the blame for the Emperor's alleged commercial exploitation of the Summer Palace should be borne by General Nieh Hsien-fan or is accepted by the Government. He declares that the Manchu Emperor has forfeited his right to the Summer Palace because the Abdication Agreement designated it as his ultimate place of residence and he has failed to make use of it as such.

Even if it were true that the Emperor intended to turn the Palace into a thriving centre of commerce and industry it is more than doubtful, as I have already pointed out, whether the Government would have the right to forbid him to do so. In any case, the Government could not honourably use this as a pretext for confiscating the place: the most it could legitimately do would be to inform the Imperial Household of its reasons for objecting to the proposed commercializing schemes and request it to devise other means of meeting the expenses of maintenance. One such means, obviously, by which those expenses might be met would be by inducing the Government to pay at least a small fraction of the millions of dollars which it now owes the Imperial House under that very Abdication Agreement of which Mr. Li has unexpectedly constituted himself so eager and zealous a champion.

The obvious answer, then, to Mr. Li's final question is that no blame whatsoever attaches either to the Government or to General Nieh for what is now taking place at the Summer Palace, and that no wrong, injustice or breach of contract has been committed either by the Manchu Emperor himself or by those who are responsible under him for its administration.

The Actual Facts.

Having dealt with Mr. Li's questions to the best of my ability, I will now, as briefly as possible, indicate the actual facts which have been so grossly distorted as to give rise to the absurd rumours that the Summer Palace was to be converted into a hive of commercial activity.

Let me first mention the existing sources of revenue. As all visitors to the Palace are aware, there is a charge of $1.20 admission. Though many thousands of people of different nationalities visit the Palace every year, the income from this source is far less than it should be, for more than a third of the proceeds are paid to certain departments of Government for the upkeep of the road from Peking to the Summer Palace and for the services of a military guard. Moreover, multitudes of persons (sometimes more than 2,000 in a single month) are admitted free, on the strength of "introductions" from various influential military and other officials. Personally I should like to see the price of admission-tickets materially reduced, so that the Palace grounds might be visited by those thousands of Chinese residents in Peking to whom $1.20 is a prohibitive fee. No such reduction, however, can be effected without the friendly co-operation of the military authorities who now take so large a proportion of the present proceeds; and perhaps Mr. Li and his Parliamentary friends, who apparently object to the Manchu House making an effort to popularize the Palace, would find my suggestion too democratic for Republican China.

To proceed with our enumeration of sources of income. A small additional revenue is obtained from admission-fees to the Jade Spring Park, which is under the same management, and to a few buildings and gardens within the Summer Palace grounds which are not always or necessarily open to the general public. Tea and light refreshments are sold in various pavilions and appropriate resting-places, and a small proportion of the proceeds reaches the Palace coffers under a clumsy and unsatisfactory system which admits of serious leakages. Under similar unsatisfactory systems, the Palace derives a few dollars from the sale of tickets for boating on the lake and from the fees payable to semi-official guides.

Heavy Annual Deficit.

Outside the Palace walls are a number of houses which were formerly occupied by persons employed in and about the Palace. Of these, some are empty and are falling into decay; others are rented at ridiculously low rates which barely repay the cost of upkeep. Some houses are occupied by military officers of the Republic who pay no rents at all on the plea that for months past they have received no pay from the Government that employs them. Small rents are received (or rather should be received) from certain rice-fields and other farm-lands in the vicinity of the Palace, and rent is also payable (but has not been actually paid for six years) in respect of a soda-water factory in the Jade Spring Park. The whole revenue of the Summer Palace and its adjacent properties is far below what is required for upkeep and repairs, and there is a heavy annual deficit which has to be made good out of the impoverished exchequer of the Imperial Household.

The Reforms in View.

The reforms which are now being initiated amount, at the outset, to little more than the reorganization of existing income-producing arrangements and the adoption of some Western methods for the stoppage of leakages and the elimination of "squeeze." An attempt is being made to collect arrears of rent, though it is to be feared that in most cases the attempt will be unsuccessful. (It would take a long time to explain why this is so, but the main trouble comes from the lack of proper supervision and incompetent management in the past.) Boating on the lake is to be re-organized, and the four clumsy ferry-boats which now constitute the lake-fleet will be supplemented by a few light craft of foreign design, such as sculling-boats and canoes. Some of the beautiful state house-boats used in the Empress-Dowager's time will be repaired and made available for the use of Chinese and foreign visitors. Guides will be properly trained and will be strictly prohibited from making exorbitant demands, as heretofore, on the visitors who employ them. A Complaint and Suggestion Book will be provided. The space in front of the Palace gates has been cleared of the hordes of dirty and greedy hucksters and self-appointed guides who till lately infested it. The service of light refreshments will be continued, but will be re-organized under efficient management, so that visitors may count on being properly and courteously served under clean and attractive conditions. The rights of rearing fish have been leased to a Chinese expert (not to a foreigner, as certain newspapers falsely alleged) who will be responsible for checking manifold abuses such as the theft and illicit sale of fish by Palace employees and their confederates outside. A Chinese firm of photographers has been granted the exclusive right of taking and selling professional photographs in the Palace grounds, in return for which he pays a reasonable quarterly fee. The only innovation here consists in the fact that the privileged photographer will in future pay his fee direct to the Palace treasury instead of to Palace servants. Amateur photographers will not be hampered or restricted in any way. Arrangements have been practically completed for lending an empty building (never used as a dwelling-place) to a well-known Chinese firm of caterers, whose function it will be to provide visitors with good Chinese and foreign food, at reasonable prices. Hitherto there has been no place either inside or outside the Palace grounds where visitors could get lunch. This has always been felt to be a serious inconvenience, for the Palace and its grounds are very extensive, and it is impossible to explore them all during the few hours that elapse between one ordinary meal-hour and the next. When Mr. Li pays his next visit to the Summer Palace I do not think he will complain if he finds that there is one place (not ten, as his facetious newspaper told him) where he can satisfy the pangs of a healthy hunger.

Figments of Imagination.

As to the other new features mentioned in the Chinese papers in which Mr. Li places so naive a trust—the ten tea-houses, the baths, the recreation-ground, the four hotels and theatre at the palace gates, and such-like—I can only assure him that they are, and will probably remain, figments of the journalistic imagination. I am personally of opinion that there is room for one small hotel outside the Palace walls, close to the main road, but no steps to establish one there will be taken without the full knowledge and concurrence of the local civil and military authorities, especially in view of the proximity of military barracks and two large educational institutions. It has also been suggested that a small country hotel, for visitors to the Western Hills, might with advantage be established in the charming grounds of the Jade Spring Park, but in view of the lack of suitable accommodation there, this also is a projcet that must for the present remain in abeyance. Meanwhile, we have now under consideration the applications of a Cabinet Minister and two other well-known Chinese gentlemen for the lease of residential building sites within the Jade Spring grounds, and provided they will undertake to erect no foreign or semi-foreign monstrosities, it is probable that their applications will be granted. Perhaps Mr. Li will raise objections to this on the ground that the Manchu Emperor's financial position will thereby be improved to the extent of a few hundred dollars a year, and that he may use the money for plotting against the State. If so, now is the time for him to speak.

A Few Questions in Return.

Mr. Li Hsieh-yang, as the records of his Parliamentary career show, is very fond of asking questions. I wonder whether he is equally fond of answering them! In the hope that such is the case, I venture to propound five questions which I hope he will see his way to answer at his convenience. I am well aware that he is in a position to ignore the questions of a mere foreigner, who lacks Parliamentary privileges. Still, there are many people, Chinese and foreign, including some members of Parliament, who would be glad to have from him clear and unambiguous replies to these simple questions of mine, and I hope he will not refuse to answer them merely because he is under no obligation to do so. In the case of his own five questions, he required the Government to reply within three days. I should not dream of following his example by imposing a time-limit, though I trust his answer will be forthcoming without unnecessary delay.

1.—In his questions, Mr. Li more than once accuses the Manchu Emperor of breaking the Abdication Agreement. May we assume from this that Mr. Li regards the Agreement as still in force? It should not be necessary to ask this question, but in view of some of the curious assertions and statements made by him in a recent newspaper controversy, his attitude towards the Agreement is, to say the least, an ambiguous one. He has certainly conveyed the impression to a good many people that in his opinion the Agreement ceased to be valid several years ago. Now, apparently, he has changed his mind, recognizes its validity, and has become its champion. Is this so? Or does he merely recognize its validity when it happens to suit the purpose which he has in view at any particular moment?

2.—If Mr. Li regards the Agreement as a mere "scrap of paper" which has lost its force or never had any, on what grounds does he arraign the Emperor on a charge of violating its terms? Mr. Li's accusations against the Emperor are explicitly based on the latter's alleged infringement of those terms. How can anyone violate an agreement that does not exist? Surely it is not Mr. Li's contention that the Abdication Agreement, though not binding on the Republic, is still strictly binding on the Emperor?

3.—If Mr. Li admits that the Agreement is still binding, and binding on both parties, is he prepared to assert that the Republican Government has never transgressed its terms in any particular? If he admits (as unfortunately he must) that the Republican Government has failed in certain respects to fulfil all the obligations towards the Imperial House which it undertook in that Agreement, why does he aim his charges of breach of contract against the Emperor alone?

Mr. Li's Gross Contempt.

4.—Though Mr. Li is filled with indignation at what he conceives to be breaches of the Abdication Agreement by the Manchu Emperor, he seems to be curiously oblivious of the fact that he himself is consistently guilty of treating that Agreement with the grossest contempt. This is strangely inconsistent conduct for one who has become its self-appointed champion. As he is well aware, it was specially provided in the Agreement that the Emperor was to be treated by the Republican Government with all the respect that it would accord to the sovereign of a foreign State on Chinese soil, and that he was to retain his full imperial title indefinitely. These particular stipulations (whatever may be said of others) the Republican Government has never failed to observe to the best of its ability. In the Chinese journalistic world, the usage of the various newspapers is apt to follow their political affiliations. Some papers clearly take the civilized view that staunch Republican principles are not incompatible with courtesy, and always refer to the Emperor and the Imperial House in terms which besides being respectful have the additional advantage of being legally and technically correct. In their columns, the Emperor is described as Ch'ing Ti, of which the nearest and most convenient English rendering is "Manchu Emperor." Other papers, owned by political factions or interests whose view seems to be that in this glorious and emancipated age of liberty, equality and fraternity (or perhaps I should say "comradeship") all honorary appellations and distinctions of rank must be scrupulously ignored by every good democrat, take evident pleasure in referring to the Emperor with deliberate discourtesy. In the case of the foreign newspapers, the inconsistencies of their references to the Manchu Emperor are probably due, in most cases, to sheer ignorance. For many years they usually spoke of him as "The Boy Emperor" and "The Young Emperor," terms which in themselves are inoffensive enough but necessarily lose their appositeness with the passing years. Well-informed correspondents now usually write correctly of "the Manchu Emperor;" but even important organs such as the "North-China Daily News," and the "Peking and Tientsin Times" still often use the technically incorrect term "Ex-Emperor." This, I suppose, is mainly due to the fact that in Europe we have had no experience of a sovereign who after abdication or dethronement still retains, with the express concurrence of the revolutionary Government which displaced him, the legal right to the title of King or Emperor. But the fact that there is no European precedent does not justify Western newspapers in ignoring the peculiar arrangement whereby the Manchu Emperor retains the full imperial title though without a vestige of imperial authority in the State. We may disapprove of the arrangement or we may laugh at it, but there is no justification for refusing to recognize its existence and its legal sanction.

A Studied Rudeness.

Now in view of the general tone of Mr. Li Hsieh-yang's persistent attacks on the Manchu Emperor and Imperial Family, which certainly give the impression that he is actuated by other motives than a pure and disinterested zeal for the public good and the triumph of right and justice, we shall hardly expect to find him going out of his way to treat the nineteen-year-old Emperor with anything remotely resembling chivalrous courtesy; but in view of his position as a member of the Legislature he should at least aim at scrupulous accuracy in his phraseology where legal niceties are concerned, and especially when, from his place in the House, he is addressing questions to the Executive. Nevertheless, Mr. Li not only studiously ignores the Emperor's right to the imperial title but constantly refers to him by his personal name, a practice which, as all Chinese and many foreigners well know, is a very grave breach of decorum. I am surprised that the Government, which as I have said is always careful to refer to the Manchu Emperor in proper terms, has not long ago pointed out to him that in addressing questions to the Government on matters connected with the Manchu Emperor he should be careful to refer to him in the terms which the Government itself recognizes as legal and correct. If Mr. Li refused to take the hint, the Government would be fully justified in declining to answer his questions until they were couched in the proper language. Will Mr. Li now be good enough to explain how it is that while he sternly rebukes the Manchu Emperor for alleged breaches of the Abdication Agreement, he himself regularly treats at least one of its clauses with studied contempt?

Fatuous Tittle Tattle.

5.—My last question is a very simple one. Will Mr. Li tell us whether he took any steps to ascertain the accuracy of the newspaper stories on which he based his charges against the Manchu Emperor with regard to the Summer Palace? If not, is he so simple-minded and lacking in worldly wisdom as to accept all newspaper tattle at its face-value? If he is, I can call his attention to a recent newspaper paragraph which surely would have provided excellent material for another Parliamentary question. Within the last few weeks it has been stated in many Chinese newspapers that the Manchu Emperor called at my private residence in Peking, for the purpose of discussing with me in private the question of his going abroad. In the Chinese section of the "Far Eastern Times" the paragraph was headed "Hsuan T'ung secretly plots to go abroad" (宣統密謀出洋): and in the English section of the same paper (July 21st) the following remarks appeared: "The latest report is that the boy Emperor has been for two days closeted with Mr. Johnston in the latter's house.....working out a plan to facilitate the boy Emperor's departure abroad, on which his heart is set."

Now the true facts of the case are that on July 16 last the Manchu Emperor, accompanied by his father-in-law, did me the honour of calling upon me, and remained at my house about 20 minutes, during which time not a single word was spoken by the Emperor or myself or anyone else on the subject of a visit to foreign lands. Let us observe how this single brief visit has become the basis for a statement that the Emperor was "for two days closeted" with me in my house. The statement that the purpose of the visit was to hold a secret discussion regarding an alleged desire of the Emperor to visit foreign countries was a pure invention. It was also a singularly fatuous invention, for it implies a belief that in order to hold a secret conference with me it would be necessary for the Emperor to visit me at my private house, in spite of the fact that in the Forbidden City I see His Majesty alone nearly every day. Further, the reader is allowed to assume that the Manchu Emperor's attempt to hold a private discussion with me in my house was foiled by journalistic enterprise: otherwise, how could the subject of our alleged secret plotting have got so speedily into the papers? Evidently the walls of my house are well provided with ears. The basis of truth that the story contains is, then, a very slender one; but that, presumably, would not have deterred Mr. Li from making it a subject for Governmental enquiry if it had come to his notice. He seems to have missed a great opportunity.

Truth Quite Easy to Learn.

I fully admit that it is often so difficult for private individuals to ascertain the truth or falsity of newspaper statements that it is necessary, when important interests or issues are involved, to appeal to Government to institute inquiries and communicate the results to an anxious public. But in the case of Mr. Li's question about the Summer Palace, no such difficulty existed. The Summer Palace is situated only a few miles from Peking and can be reached by motor-car in half an hour. Had he come direct to the Palace (it would have occupied less time than it took him to indite his questions, and would have given him a delightful respite from his arduous and disinterested Parliamentary labours), he would have been promptly admitted and (I hope) treated with courtesy and consideration. Another half hour spent in the Palace grounds would have convinced him that he might save himself the trouble of asking unnecessary questions in the House. I hope that if in future he finds himself in any perplexity about what is being done at the Summer Palace he will not hesitate to adopt my suggestion and come straight to those who can give him all the information that he can reasonably require. Should I still be in administrative charge of the Palace when he comes, I hope he will condescend to consider himself my guest; and though I shall be unable to offer him the choice between the bills of fare of ten restaurants, I trust he will have every reason to be satisfied with the culinary capabilities of one.

POETS OF THE 20TH CENTURY

An Introduction to De La Mare

BY LEWIS CHASE.

The author of this article is a recognized authority on modern poetry and has lately been giving a fascinating series of lectures on the subject at St. John's University, Jessfield.

Mr. Walter De la Mare is Huguenot on the father's side, Scottish on the mother's, and as he adds, "English on the others," He was born in Kent, in the southeastern part of England, in April 1873. For many years he "worked in the City," which vaguely means that he earned his livelihood uncongenially in one form of business or another.

For a long time, however, he has been intimately associated with the writing life of London, in such capacities as reader and literary advisor to publishing houses, and as occasional and staff contributor to all sorts of periodicals from daily newspapers to quarterly reviews. No one is better informed on the newest books dealing with letters than he, a fact which is taken advantage of by the "Edinburgh Review," for which he does a regular article on current literature,) by the Westminster Gazette," and by the Literary Supplement of "The Times," for which he is a "leader writer." Much of this "stuff" is frankly journalistic, composed for a day and a day only, but its author is regarded in Britain not only as more than a mere journalist, but as being, indeed, one of the best literary critics of the decade. It is high time that the best of his work in this kind should be put between covers. It was doubtless in recognition of his critical ability that he was appointed to one of the honorary professorships of the Royal Society of Literature and to membership in the Academic Committee (the recently founded British counterpart of the French Academy). He has written a play or two, short stories and novels, and since it is primarily as a poet that his fame seems to be spreading, especially in America, it seems curious that his prose book, "The Return," should bring forth his first official recognition, as it were, for "style and promise." I refer to the bestowal upon him, the first year of its establishment, of the prize offered by Prince Edmond de Polignac. Later recipients of this honour were Messrs. John Masefield, James Stephens, and Ralph Hodgson.

I once asked Mr. Hodgson if he were ever going to write a long poem. He replied that he feared that he might never write a good long poem. I then asked, "Why not?" He said, in effect, that he had not known early enough Walter De la Mare, who might have shown him how to do it,—De la Mare, with his training and technique. It is in itself no mean tribute to the poet of "The Listeners" that the poet of "The Bull" should thus by implication allude to him as his master, but it is a significant indication of the respect amounting to deference in which Mr. De la Mare is held by his fellow-craftsmen. There is, I believe, none of the younger poets whose circle of admirers is quite so choice. I refer not only to the professional critics many of whom are in surprising accord in this matter; but to that larger number of amateurs, of lovers, (though still not large enough) to whom certain notes particularly appeal, and whose approach to poetry in general is marked by sensitive discrimination.

The reviewer for the "Spectator" says that "The Listeners" is full of many notes. Sometimes he writes little apologues instinct with tender simplicity. Again he follows the old fairy magic, with the richness of fancy we have known before in his work. "The Dwelling Place" and "Ages Ago" show this side of his talent. But [illegible] quality is his wistfulness, his sense of the things not [illegible] ness that the glowing world is a thin cloak which hides the greater verities. According to Mr. D. Figgis there is scarcely [illegible] whose poems leave [illegible] impression on [illegible] De la Mare's. Delicately wrought, exquisitely carved, there [illegible] of words in them, [illegible] so seldom is, part [illegible] inspiration that seldom fails. In the opinion of Mr. E. V. Lucas, Mr. De la Mare is one of the two living poets who has "magic."

The following are some selections from the the work of De la Mare.

[FROM "THE LISTENERS."]

EXILE.

Had the gods loved me I had lain
Where darnel is, and thorn,
And the wild [illegible] nightlong strain
Trembles in bows forlorn.

Nay, but they loved [illegible]; and I
Must needs a stranger be,
Whose every exiled [illegible]
Aches with their memory.

DREAMS.

Be gentle, O hands of a [illegible]
Be true: like a shadow [illegible]
In the starry dark [illegible]
Are your eyes to me.

But words are shallow, [illegible]
Dreams fade that the [illegible]
And youth fades out [illegible]
In the dark eyes [illegible]

What can a tired [illegible]
Which the wise of [illegible] dumb?
Save to the lonely [illegible] child.
'Return again, [illegible]

BE ANGRY NOW NO MORE.

Be angry now no more!
If I have grieved thee—if
Thy kindness, mine before,
No hope may now restore:
Only forgive, forgive!

If still resentment burns
In thy cold breast, oh if
No more to pity turns,
No more, once tender, yearns
Thy love: oh yet forgive!

Ask of the winter rain
June's withered rose again:
Ask grace of the salt sea:
She will not answer thee.
God would ten times have shriven
A heart so riven;
In her cold care should be
Still unforgiven.

NOD.

Softly along the road of evening,
In twilight dim with rose,
Wrinkled with age, and drenched with dew
Old Nod, the shepherd, goes.

His drowsy flock streams on before him,
Their fleeces charged with gold,
Where the sun's last beam leans low
On Nod the shepherd's fold.

The hedge is quick and green with briar,
From their sand the cronies creep;
And all the birds that fly in heaven
Flock singing home to sleep.

His lambs outnumber a noon's roses,
Yet, when night's shadows fall,
His blind old sheep-dog, Slumber-soon,
Misses not one of all.

Its are the quiet steeps of dreamland,
The waters of no-more-pain,
His ram's bell rings 'neath an arch of stars,
'Rest, rest, and rest again.'

[From "Songs of Childhood."]

ENVOY.

Child, do you love the flower
Ashine with colour and dew
Lighting its transient hour?
So I love you.

The lambs in the mead are at play,
Neath a hurdle the shepherd's asleep,
From height to height of the day
The sunbeams sweep.

Evening will come. And alone
The dreamer the dark will beguile;
All the world will be gone
For a dream's brief while.

Then I shall be old; and away;
And you, with sad joy in your eyes,
Will brood over children at play
With as loveful surmise.

[From "The Listeners."]

THE LISTENERS.

'Is there anybody there?' said the Traveller,
Knocking on the moonlit door;
And his horse in the silence champed the grasses
Of the forest's ferry floor:
And a bird flew up out of the turret,
Above the Traveller's head:
And he smote upon the door, again a second time;
'Is there anybody there?' he said.
But no one descended to the Traveller;
No head from the leaf-fringed sill
Leaned over and looked into his grey eyes,
Where he stood perplexed and still.
But only a host of phantom listeners
That dwelt in the lone house then
Stood listening in the quiet of the moonlight
To that voice from the world of men:
Stood thronging the faint moonbeams on the dark stair,
That goes down to the empty hall,
Hearkening in an air stirred and shaken
By the lonely Traveller's call.
And he felt in his heart their strangeness,
Their stillness answering his cry,
While his horse moved, cropping the dark turf,
'Neath the starred and leafy sky;
For he suddenly smote on the door, even Louder, and lifted his head:—
'Tell them I came, and no one answered,
That I kept my word,' he said.
Never the least stir made the listeners,
Though every word he spake
Fell echoing through the shadowiness of the still house
From the one man left awake:
Ay, they heard his foot upon the stirrup,
And the sound of iron on stone,
And how the silence surged softly backward,

The city of Durban, recently celebrated its centenary. It was on June 26 and 27, 1824, that Lieutenant Farewell, R. N., and Messrs. Cane and Ogle reached Natal from Capetown, and made their abode close to the site of the present Town Hall of Durban. Eleven years after the arrival of the first settlers, Capt. Allen Gardiner appeared on the scene. He had come out from England to the missionary work amongst the Zulus; but, being refused permission to live in Zululand, he decided to comply with the request of the setters at Port Natal, or the Bay of Natal, as it was then variously known, and to live there, choosing as his home the top of the ridge, overlooking the bay, at the junction of the present St. Thomas and Ridge Roads. This he called Berea, and the name has since been extended to the whole of the upper residential portion of the town. In the same year, 1835, he called a meeting of the settlers, who then numbered no more than 30, at which it was decided to lay out a township and to call it Durban in honour of Sir Benjamin D'Urban, the then Governor of the Cape. That was really the beginning of the present great city. It was not until 1854, however, that the municipality was formed. At that time the rateable value of the town was £4,487. It is now £17,409,696. The population of the city is about 150,000.

THE AMATEUR PHOTOGRAPHER

I.—On the Choice of a Camera

By R. V. Dent.

This series of brief articles is expressly written for the amateur photographer who wants to secure good pictures—almost always of the "record" variety—but who has neither the inclination nor the time to devote to the necessary study of the various sciences employed to produce one of the most marvellous things within the power of man—a photograph.

Therefore throughout this series no attempt will be made to go deeply into the subject of photography nor will technical explanations or masses of formulae be given; they can be had wholesale from text-books and every packet of films and papers gives the best formulae for their use. We shall drive straight to our goal—the accomplishment of 95 successful pictures from each 100 films exposed by the camera-user who knows little beyond the fact that exposure to light of a sensitive film behind a lens in a light-tight box results in a photographic negative of whatever was in front of that lens provided the focus was right, the quantity of light permitted to pass through the lens neither too little nor excessive, and the latent image thus impressed on the film subsequently developed.

In short, we are writing for those who press the button and get others to do the rest. Though no button-pressers can ever consistently maintain the quality of results reached by the serious workers who are thoroughly acquainted with the artistic, technical, optical, and chemical side of photography and who have been through the mill, yet the quality of work that is frequently done by camera-users with almost no technical knowledge is a proof that for ordinary amateur snap-shotting a little knowledge helps a great deal and is very useful.

These few words are to encourage the tyro and disarm the formidable criticism of our local experts who may think we skim too lightly over the surface.

The majority of our readers own one or more cameras. All should know the capabilities and the limitations of their instrument for in this knowledge lies their power.

There are innumerable different cameras designed for different purposes, but fundamentally a camera is nothing more than a light-tight box fitted with a lens, with various means of allowing light to pass through that lens. All types have their advantages and drawbacks. For the tourist and snapshotter there can be no question that the folding roll-film type specially designed for their use, quarter-plate (3¼ by 4¼) size with a good moderately-fast lens and a fully-speeded between-the-lens shutter is the best choice they can make.

To explain in detail precisely why this is the most suitable instrument would take pages; briefly, the type is amongst the simplest to use, the expense of operation is very moderate, and roll-film is almost a necessity to the amateur without a dark-room and has the inestimable advantages to him of being daylight-loading and obtainable almost everywhere. To the worker that cares to develop his own films they are the only film-medium that can be conveniently developed in daylight. Such a camera is light in weight and can be carried all day without fatigue, especially in a case. If a camera becomes a nuisance it is apt to be left at home. The quarter-plate size is recommended as being large enough to give contact same-size prints which are worth looking at without enlargement and can be enlarged to almost any extent. Buy the very best lens you can afford, but do not think that because it has to be a cheaper quality it will be no good. Not so—your limitations are greater, but except for fineness of definition and slight curvature with consequent shortcomings for enlarging, such lenses can do very satisfactory work.

A moderately fast lens means a lens with a maximum aperture of about (Anastigmat) F 6.3 or F. 7.7, or (Rapid Rectilinear, Universal System) U.S.4. The meanings of these symbols we shall discuss in a later article. The third main type of lens is the meniscus, a simple concave piece of glass mounted behind the shutter. This is the cheapest form of lens but within its limitations is not to be despised; its greatest drawback is lack of speed which only permits fully exposed negatives in bright sunlight with a slow shutter speed, or by a time-exposure. Calculate their speed as F. 16 or U.S. 16.

If a faster lens can be afforded, say an anastigmat working at F. 4.5 then quarter-plate is slightly large and the 3¼ by 2¼ size is extremely satisfactory, as the exact focussing required for a lens of such speed renders their use in the larger sizes difficult when the only means of focussing is by scale. Of course the lens can be used stopped down but in that case it is no faster than any other lens of a similar aperture. The best focal length for all round work is the length of the diagonal of the picture-size; thus about 5½ inches for quarter-plate size; hand-cameras are usually fitted with lenses of about this focal length though it is too short for landscape work.

The advantage of an anastigmatic lens over a rapid rectilinear is that the former is much more highly corrected for chromatic aberration due to various light rays not all focussing at the same point, and also anastigmats can be made to work at far higher speeds than the less corrected lenses, thus permitting more light to pass in a given time with consequent briefer exposures. But remember that all lenses of the same relative aperture to their focal length work at the same speed for all practical purposes, the only exceptions being crystal and quartz lenses.

Another advantage of the quarter-plate size is that it is good for composing pictures vertically or horizontally. When one side of the picture is far longer than the other—e.g. postcard size—it is very difficult to compose satisfactorily and the finished print needs a considerable amount of trimming down if it is to have any pretensions to being a picture. 5 by 4 is a good size but costs more to operate and is far more risky to use when one is entirely dependent on a focussing scale and a ground-glass screen is practically a necessity.

A good shutter is a very wise investment; next to the lens it is certainly the most important part of the camera in practical work. The expert would sacrifice all the very high speeds running up into the several hundredths and to the thousandth of a second for a good reliable series of slow shutter-speeds, say, one second, half-second, fifth, tenth, fifteenth, twenty-fifth, fiftieth and hundreth and with a two-hundreth for very special occasions. The high speeds are of no use to any but the speed specialist with an ultrarapid lens and absolutely useless for serious work with ray-filters.

Therefore look for the slow speeds and disregard the very high, as in practical work they are used ninety-nine times to every once the high speeds might be thought necessary—and the chances are that on the hundreth occasion the result is a failure unless you are an expert.

If you have a really good lens with a poor shutter, a new first-class shutter, fitted by the makers, is a good investment, but if one takes the trouble to learn how to give very brief time-exposures (which we shall discuss when we deal with exposure) a great deal can be done with the very simplest kind of shutter.

Re Plates and Film-packs—both have their advantages, the former in particular. The latter present no advantages over roll-film in actual practice though in theory they do, and they need a darkroom for development. Plates are the best film-support of all and will do all that any other film-medium can do and have many advantages, their sole disadvantages being weight and breakability. They can stand many treatments that a film cannot (which treatments, however, should not be needed if the exposure and development were right) but a darkroom is a necessity and the snapshotter had best be content to leave them alone until he is more properly entitled to be called a photographer.

The reflex camera, where the picture is visible right-side up on a ground-glass screen until the moment of exposure, is the nearest approach to an all-round camera that can be made, especially if various lenses are available. But is bulky except in the miniature sizes, heavy, and expensive. The serious worker needs a reflex, but the tourist does not.

These, and the folding "press-cameras," have focal-plane shutters; that is, a blind which passes across the face of the film at the focal-plane, i.e. where the rays of light from the lens are focussed. Splendid cameras, but more suitable to the serious worker who is out for pictures and must get them sunshine or rain.

Lastly, remember that a good worker with an inferior camera will produce far finer photographs than the duffer with the best camera made, so the important thing is to learn how to use what you have as almost any camera if in working order will give good pictures in the hands of an expert.

The bane of photography are the innumerable accessories which are most of them of no real use and finally end up in the rubbish drawer. Avoid accumulating accessories; they will not give you good pictures and the danger of having masses of apparatus and no photographs is very real! The snapshotter needs only a case, a tripod, a sky-filter and perhaps one other light-filter, a lens-shade which he can make himself, and last, but perhaps most important of all, a reliable exposure-meter or calculator. Get these accessories, and use them. They are essentials; most other things are luxuries which finally form a ruinous litter of junk.

The real photographer of course needs dark-room equipment according to the class of work he is doing, but he is usually past the "accessories delusion" stage.

In our next article we shall give practical information as to how best to use such a camera as we have discussed above.

BOOK NOTES AND NEWS

It is claimed for Mr. Henry Greenly, author of a fascinating little book on "Model Railways", that he knows more about model railways than anyone in England. For a century his family has been connected with stage-coaches and railways, and he has designed and built many miniature "lines." His present book (which is in Cassell's "model" series) simply illustrates the meticulous and extraordinary pitch of perfection to which the model railway can be brought. It has the remarkable total of 390 photographs, diagrams, and drawings, for many of the latter of which the author's daughter is responsible. The style is bright and easy, and an amusingly-instructive section is that on railway-signalling as applied to "models."

"The Brothers" (by Mr. John Sillars), is a tale of the Isle of Arran, unusual and picturesque. It has a touch of originality (in spite of the fact that feuds between brothers have given stories to the world for countless years) in that there is a departure from the usual triangle, although a beautiful girl is concerned with both James and John, to her sorrow. Jane is a fine character, noble and steadfast. She is in the position of a servant, but has the dignity of good blood in her veins, and a high courage. It is usually the engaging scapegrace brother who brings shame on such a girl, and the steady and home-keeping one who shelters her. Here the situation is reversed. Harum-scarum John has no eyes for Jane but a brother's eyes. It is James who marries her in secret and throws her off at once at the first rumour against her name and the parentage of her child. The tale is vividly told and has a freshness about it that brings the winds of Arran blowing in our faces
